Selig Regular Program for Week of January 4-9

A Two-Reel Selig Drama. Released Monday, January 4

The Strange Case of Princess Khan

Written by JAMES OLIVER CURWOOD
Production directed by EDW. J. LE SAINT

An unusual and engrossing picture-play dealing with Hindu occultism and mysticism, which is exposed by a clever investigator. He finds a Hindu princess kept in a state of hypnotic trance by a charlatan, whom he foils and exposes. The pictures are most realistic, one scene representing the immersion of an automobile, with its occupants, through a broken bridge into a river. There is fighting; a hot automobile pursuit and sufficient love making. STELLA RAZETO, GUY OLIVER and JACK McDONALD play the leading roles.

Latest European War News Pictures

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 89

Released Monday, January 4 One Reel

New and up-to-date vivid motion pictures of the biggest war the world has ever seen. Taken by our own camera men on the European battlefields. Also views of other important world events.

A Selig Western Comedy-Drama

A Militant Schoolma'am

Released Tuesday, January 5 One Reel

A Selig Drama

In the Line of Duty

Released Wednesday, January 6 One Reel

Admirers of Selig picture-plays will be introduced to a new heroine in this picture—MARION WARNER—who plays the part of "Helen Brant," society editor on a newspaper. WILLIAM STOWELL plays the part of the society burglar. It is thrilling. exciting and interesting.

Latest Authentic War Pictures

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 90

Released Thursday, January 7 One Reel

Our intrepid and fearless camera men have photographed another batch of vitally interesting and thrilling war views on European battlefields. First time shown in America.

A Selig Farce Comedy

The Strenuous Life

Released Friday, January 8 One Reel

ROY L. McCARDELL has written an exceptionally funny story for this picture, the characters in which are portrayed with admirable fidelity by LYLLIAN BROWN LEIGHTON, ELSIE GREESON, LEE MORRIS, WM. SCOTT, and others. It is a burlesque on "the feature thriller" and is well worth seeing.

A Selig Jungle-Zoo Drama

Further Adventures of Sammy Orpheus

Released Saturday, January 9 One Reel

Those two Selig favorites, THOMAS SANTSCHI and BESSIE EYTON, do some excellent work in this picture, which also features elephants, lions and other of the Selig Jungle-Zoo wild animal actors. The scenes are entrancingly beautiful with their wealth of jungle landscape and desert.

Story Appearing in the Leading Metropolitan Newspapers
Photoplay Showing at the Better Theatres Everywhere

Mr. Exhibitor:

Watch for sensational developments in the new episodes of "Zudora." The early episodes of this wonderful photoplay are constructed to lead up to some of the most remarkable pieces of acting in the history of motion pictures.

James Cruze, who is playing the leading masculine role in "Zudora," will be shown in a dual character, more powerful than that portrayed by Richard Mansfield in "Dr. Jekyl and Mr. Hyde." Mr. Cruze will show a dual personality in episode #7, from then on playing the part of the hero and the part of the villain.

The portrayal of the hero will be one of the most sensational things in motion pictures. In this part, he will eclipse his best as "Jimmie Norton" in the "Million Dollar Mystery."

The new sensations in "Zudora" will come with such startling rapidity and such a multitude of thrills that the public will be keyed to the highest pitch of expectancy.

We do not want to keep all the good things to ourselves; hence, we are letting you know, a little in advance, just what to expect on "Zudora."

This picture is breaking all records everywhere, and we intend that it shall set a new mark for photo serials.

Yours very truly,

THANHOUSER SYNDICATE CORPORATION,

W. E. Shallenberger
Vice President.

WES-M.

Vol. XIII CHICAGO, JANUARY 2, 1915 No. 1

A Delightful Eclectic Comedy-Melodrama

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

WITH Ernest Truex to furnish the fun, and a group of nihilists the heavy drama, Pathe-Freres have produced a comedy-melodrama that should meet with great success. "The Bomb Boy," as it is called, is three reels in length, original in plot construction, and staged with all the skill and good judgment at the command of Director George Fitzmaurice.

The story begins in two separate threads, one, a juvenile romance, and the other, an anarchistic plot. Gradually their action broadens, and by the time the end of the first reel is reached they have blended into one story, whose momentary gasps and flurries of suspense and excitement caused by the anarchists are alternated with bursts of laughter provoked by the antics of the irrepressible messenger boy, Jimmie.

After seeing the picture one feels that he or she has been entertained by a play depicting two strongly contrasted sides of life, presented without recourse to either the burlesque or the spectacular. The comedy is comprised of amusing, simple incidents of the every-day variety, and the melodrama embraces all of the secrecy, organization and desperation that anarchistic bodies are credited with having.

In Ernest Truex's impersonation, Jimmie, the messenger boy, is a most likeable fellow, and radiates the curiosity, enthusiasm and good humor that is making its impersonator so popular in "The Dummy" on the legitimate stage. Elaine Ivans plays the part of Mame, Jimmie's sweetheart, and Carl Harbaugh the part of Terry Turk, the amateur fighter with a local reputation and a gaping coterie of boy admirers. Eleanor Woodruff enacts the role of the dangerous nihilist, Anna Karensky, and M. O. Penn is unrecognizable behind the flowing beard of the Grand Duke Sergius. The settings and photography are fully up to the standard set by the players.

While Terry Turk is being admired for his ring prowess by his boy friends, winsome Mame passes, and Terry deserts his gallery to make her acquaintance. After a few preliminary blushes, stutterings and weak attempts at conversation, Mame and the pugilist become friends and saunter off together. Jimmie, the messenger boy suitor for Mame's hand, in passing a notion store, is attracted by a bolt of pretty ribbon displayed in the window. He buys a yard of it for Mame, and continues on his journey, happy in his anticipation of the pleasure that the girl will be sure to show on receiving his gift.

His meditations are interrupted by seeing Mame and Terry enter a summer garden. He follows, and attempts to induce his sweetheart to leave her new friend by offering her the ribbon, but she scorns him. Terry has already presented her with a wrist-watch. Jimmie leaves, downcast, and shortly afterwards two of Terry's girl friends enter. This breaks up his romance with Mame, and she leaves in a huff.

Jimmie's next errand takes him to a mysterious old house with a message. The door is opened by a man with a revolver in his hand. This arouses the boy's curiosity, and he determines to learn more of the place and its occupants. Later on in the day he is sent down to the dock to meet an incoming steamer, and receives a package from one of the passengers to deliver to the mysterious house. The passenger is Anna Karensky, a nihilist, and the hat box she gives Jimmie contains a bomb which she feared would be found among her effects, knowing that detectives on the steamer suspect her identity.

After delivering the box Jimmie sneaks around to the side of the house, climbs up the fire escape, and hides in the closet in the room next to the conference room of the nihilists. He overhears their plans to assassinate the Grand Duke Sergius, who is staying at the Grand Pacific hotel, at seven o'clock that night. One of the nihilists, a waiter in the hotel restaurant, is assigned the task of placing the bomb. Jimmie escapes from the house, enlists the aid of a policeman, and chases the nihilist-waiter, but he eludes them. The messenger boy then takes the ferry over to New York and, on failing to get the grand duke on the telephone, hurries to the hotel.

He arrives shortly before seven, rushes into the grand duke's room, and finds the bomb hidden in the chafing dish. He hurries outdoors with it, and is forced to jump from a hundred-foot cliff into the lake below when the fuse of the infernal machine begins to sputter at seven o'clock. As a reward for his bravery Jimmie receives a medal from the grand duke which he promptly transfers to Mame on learning that she has rejected Terry for him.

Edward Abeles in "The Million"

The Famous Players will end the old year auspiciously by releasing Edward Abeles in a film version of Henry W. Savage's successful farce production, "The Million," on the very last day of 1914. This famous melodramatic farce has won the distinction of possessing more laughter and wholesome fun than any comedy of recent years. The continuous mirth proceeds equally from the action, caricatures and situations of one of the most novel and ingenious plots ever presented on the stage or screen. If the old philosophers are right, and "laughter is wealth," then "The Million" is well named. The subject also presents one of the most remarkable examples of character acting supplied in many years, in the impersonation of "Le Baron," the crook, by Edward Abeles. In the course of the story he is called upon to portray no less than six entirely distinct characters. With the assumption of each impersonation, Edward Abeles not only presents a wholly varied physical appearance, but lends to each of the six roles a totally distinct personality—first as the crook with the police baying at his heels; then as Ike Damskinski, the second-hand clothing dealer of the Bowery; and following these two characterizations, in rapid succession as the duplicate of the singer, Donatelli, in which he convinces Donatelli that he is seeing things; as a reporter, changing from the bearded Damskinski to a dapper newspaper-man; as the waiter at the road-house, and finally as a blonde cabaret dancer.

Sheldon Lewis With Pathe

Sheldon Lewis, whose interpretation of "Dutch Joe" in W. A. Brady's big production of "Life" at the Manhattan Opera House is attracting such favorable notice, has been signed by Pathe to take a prominent part in the new serial "The Exploits of Elaine." Mr. Lewis was born in Philadelphia of German - American parentage and had hardly got beyond the nursing bottle stage before he announced to his parents his intention of going upon the stage. He secured an engagement in a small role at the Girard Avenue theater in Philadelphia. Better and better engagements followed, among them leading roles with such stars as Dorothy Donnelly, Frances Starr and Blanche Walsh, as well as with Ada Rehan in Shakesperian plays. When the endowed playhouse in Chicago, the first in America, was started he was secured to play in dramas by Maeterlinck, Henry Arthur Jones and other famous playwrights. He was also with Mrs. Fiske in "The Pillars of Society" by Ibsen as well as "Becky Sharpe" and "Tess of the D'Urbervilles." When Augustin Daly died Mr. Lewis was under a five years' contract with him; Mr. Daly told him when the contract was drawn up that he would make of him the greatest character actor in America. Such a statement from such an authority as Mr. Daly is high praise indeed.

Sheldon Lewis.

He is the husband of the beautiful and talented actress Virginia Pearson. Mr. Lewis always insists upon playing a character according to his own interpretation. Of studious temperament he analyzes each motive and trait of the part and endeavors by every inflection of the voice and every action to disclose the mind and character beneath. That he adds unusual talent to the fine cast of "The Exploits of Elaine" goes without saying.

C. M. Thall has been appointed manager of the Kleine branch office at Minneapolis, Minn. He succeeds Harry Rowe, resigned.

Wallace Reid of Mutual, and his wife, Dorothy Davenport, won a tango contest recently.

An Exceptional Human Interest Story

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

A DELIGHTFUL two-reel human interest drama is the release of the American Film Manufacturing Company for December 28 entitled "When a Woman Waits." Its plot is not in the least pretentious, for it simply follows the life of an ordinary girl through the hardships of a dreary home life until she alone is left in the home that once sheltered her parents, sisters and brother, but the feeling injected into every movement the players make carries one beyond the mere screen characters

The work of Miss Winnifred Greenwood as the girl-woman about wnom the story revolves is an almost perfect example of what can be accomplished by an artist through the medium of the silent drama. In the early scenes she appears as a carefree girl of about eighteen years and then develops before one's eyes, through the succeeding episodes, into a worn-out woman of forty or more. Quite a large cast, including Ed Coxen, George Field, John Steppling and Charlotte Burton, appears in support of Miss Greenwood and all add to the interest of the film by their natural and highly effective acting

The happy Graham family.

There is only one incident in the entire production which could rightly be placed in the "thrill" class and that comes at such an unexpected moment that it will probably raise many an interested audience out of their seats. The girl's lover has gone into his mine in a hillside when suddenly the entire embankment caves in. It is a splendid "punch" and one that lingers in one's memory because of its clever handling. There is little to speak of in the way of settings, except a scene in a railroad roundhouse. Most of the scenes are taken in the living room of the girl's home, the atmosphere of this set being excellent and highly appropriate.

Alone.

The photography is of the American standard throughout and one effect that is decidedly unique is the illustrating of the contents of a letter within the sheet upon which it is written. Numerous fade-outs and visions appear at appropriate places, thus giving an artistic touch to a film of many sterling qualities.

The happy home life of Agnes Graham, her parents, two sisters and a brother is the first thing disclosed in the film. The three latter children attend school while Agnes helps her mother about the home. Ben Hewitt, who works in the railroad shops with her father, is in love with her and when he asks her to become his wife she agrees. The death of her mother, however, throws the responsibility of her sisters and brother on Agnes' shoulders and she tells Ben that they must postpone their wedding. He agrees to wait for her, even though it may be years before the obstacle is removed, and leaves for the west to seek his fortune. For a while letters pass between them and then suddenly she hears no more from him and her letters to him are returned from the west.

Time passes and years drift slowly by. Her little sisters and brothers grow to womanhood and manhood and her father reaches the stage where his age no longer permits him to work. Still her faith in her lover remains unshaken and daily she gazes lovingly at the bridal gown which she has made. Then the older of her sisters is married and, at the request of Agnes, wears the gown to the altar. A short time later her father is called by death and Agnes' sorrow increases.

Ben and Agnes' father leave their work for home

Then the younger sister marries and leaves home and finally her brother leaves the fold to prospect in the west. He promises Agnes he will send her word of Ben and not long after she receives his first letter. Its contents shatter her last fond hopes, for her lover's life had been taken from him in a landslide years before. She dresses herself in her bridal gown and goes into the room in which her sisters had been married. Before her eyes the vision of her own marriage to Ben comes and for a few moments she is happy. Then she awakes, the crushing truth dawns upon her and she falls to the floor, dead.

Strenuous Acting Necessary

Verily is the life of a motion picture actor full of perils and mischances, as William Farnum, the robust star of the Box Office Attraction Company's production extraordinary, "Samson," recently discovered at the cost of smashed knuckles and a sprained wrist. In one of the great scenes of "Samson," in which William Gillette and Constance Collier scored a sensational success at the Criterion theater, New York, Brachard, the Samson of finance, and a titanic power in the money world, is repulsed by his wife who slams her boudoir door in his face.

Infuriated, Brachard, in whom still exists the elemental strength that made him in his younger days a brawny dock-laborer, beats in the portal with his bare fists. Mr. Farnum, who is an athlete and a skilled boxer, with muscles always in the pink of condition, insisted upon playing this scene literally. The only concession he made to his cuticle was to have his knuckles "taped" just as a professional boxer's sometimes are. The door was of oak, with stout chestnut panels. Mr. Farnum squared off and at his first blow demolished the panel with one vigorous wallop. The crowd of employes of the big William Fox studios who had assembled to watch the door smashing feat cheered him roundly. Then came a second crashing blow; this time it was aimed at the solid door frame. The door collapsed from its hinges; but as it sank to the ground Mr. Farnum gave utterance to a loud "Ouch!" His knuckles were smashed and the ulnar ligaments badly sprained.

Followers of the Mutual program will be glad to know that the Beauty company is getting ready for another "cook" picture which promises to be quite as funny in a way as "When Queenie Came Back."

A Curious Coincidence

Among the productions listed for future release by the Vitagraph Company is "Lifting the Ban of Coventry," a stirring military drama in five reels by Col. Jasper Ewing Brady of the Vitagraph Company. The play opens at the Military Academy, West Point, goes to Fort Clark, Texas, thence to Fort Hamilton, New York, and ends with a thrilling battle picture in the Philippine Islands. The production is under the capable direction of Wilfred North, assisted by Col. Brady. A curious coincidence: Ned Finley plays the part of Col. Berry and in the opening reel is commandant at West Point; later he is commanding officer at Fort Clark, Texas. On December 11 Col. Brady had as his guests at the Vitagraph plant Col. Frederick K. Sibley, 14th U. S. Cavalry, Mrs. Sibley, Commander Crossley, U. S. Navy, and Mrs. Crossley. During the pleasant hour at the Vitagraph it was discovered that Col. Sibley formerly was commandant at West Point, and at the present time actually commands Fort Clark, Texas. The accompanying photograph shows the real colonel and the actor assuming the part; and be it said in passing, Ned Finley lends a dignity and grace to the part which at once stamps him as a most excellent interpreter of the army colonel. He looks every inch the officer and gentleman he portrays.

Col. Sibley and Ned Finley.

Smallwood Company to Coast

The Smallwood Film Corporation, producer of Grandin films in the United film service will within a few days time send a company to Los Angeles for the winter months. Ray C. Smallwood, Miss Ethel Grandin and John Brownell are among others who will make the trip to California. Arrangements have already been made for a studio where the company will make two-reel comedy dramas featuring Miss Grandin.

Irene Warfield Engaged

Pretty Irene Warfield, formerly leading ingenue with Essanay and laterly playing opposite Robert Edeson in Belasco's "The Girl I Left Behind Me," was engaged this week by B. A. Rolfe to appear opposite Orrin Johnson in the production of the famous play, "Satan Sanderson" which will be the next release of the Rolfe Photo Plays Company through the Alco Corporation.

Harry Benham, the "John Storm" in Thanhouser's production "Zudora," recently won a Ford runabout in a popularity contest in Iowa.

"The Strange Case of Princess Khan"

REVIEWED BY NEIL G. CAWARD

HYPNOTISM with all its weird mystery is the theme of the Selig multiple reel release for Monday, January 4, entitled "The Strange Case of Princess Khan," an excellent example of its kind.

Seldom is a producer able to get over so much real atmosphere of the weird and mystic as is the case in this picture. In several of the scenes where Sadi Khan, the Hindu mystic, is exhibiting his power to the specially invited guests of Mrs. Carewe, it is a safe prediction that one may be able to hear a pin drop in the theater when these scenes are on the screen. Stella Razeto, Guy Oliver and Jack McDonald are the featured players and all of them are above criticism.

As the story opens we are shown a ball, given by Mrs. Carewe in honor of Philip Dawson, a celebrated author, recently returned from a tour around the world. Mrs. Carewe also has as an invited guest Sadi Khan, a Hindu hypnotist, and later arranges with him to give an exhibition of his hypnotic power. This performance to be given for a few specially invited guests.

Later the guests are taken to the home of the Hindu charlatan and have the opportunity of seeing him, after arranging his guests about in a semi-circle and binding their hands behind their backs, produce before them the Princess Khan, whom he alleges is nothing but an apparition of an Indian princess whose body has been dust for more than 200 years.

When the guests are inclined to believe the princess real, Sadi Khan asserts that it is only because they have been hypnotized and imagine they have seen the Indian princess, but Dawson, who is one of the guests, finds, upon returning to his chambers, that a strand of golden hair from the princess' head has been left on his coat sleeve and accordingly once more returns to Sadi Khan's apartments and offers the Hindu $1,000 to again produce the so called Princess Khan, as he feels a great interest in the apparition.

The Hindu accepts the offer and Dawson, seating himself on a tabouret and placing his hat on the floor at his feet, is again bound and hypnotized, and again sees the beautiful princess appear.

Dawson is satisfied. He believes that the princess is no apparition, but real flesh and blood, and, later, on going out finds that a note has been dropped in his hat which reads as follows: "Once a week my uncle kills my senses with a powerful drug. At all other times I am under his hypnotic spell. I am writing this while my normal self, in the hope that it will reach a friend. I am half-English. He calls me Princess Khan. God send me help."

With this in his possession, Dawson summons the police and after they have failed to find anything out of the way in Sadi Khan's house, summons his friends to aid him in finding the persecuted girl. Sadi Khan, alarmed by Dawson's activity, seizes the princess, who is of course a real girl, bundles her into an automobile, and sets out to escape from the city. Dawson and his friends see them depart and immediately jump into their own car.

After a lengthy chase the machine occupied by Sadi Khan and his accomplices dashes headlong into a river, off a broken bridge, and it is only by the narrowest margin that Dawson and his friends escape a similar fate. They succeed, however, in rescuing the English girl alive and take her to Dawson's apartments. They quickly discover that she is under an hypnotic spell and several of the physicians who are called to attend her say that they have no means of awakening her, the Hindu being dead, but Dawson, recalling the reference to a drug in the note he received, visits the police station and there procures a vial of medicine which had been found on the body of Sadi Khan when it was dragged from the river. With this the princess is awakened and eventually becomes the bride of Philip.

"The Crucible"

"The Crucible," a four-part Famous Players' production of late release, has as its leading lady Marguerite Clark, who, as little Jean Fanshaw, is thrust into the local reformatory, buffeted about among its inmates, and emerges unscarred by the moral combat. Instead her character is steeled by coming in contact with and conquering the demoralizing environment of the institution.

The story, by Mark Lee Luther, has, as compared with the photoplay version staged by Edwin S. Porter and Hugh Ford, just one disadvantage—Marguerite Clark is not in it. It is the combination of Miss Clark's scintillating personality and talent, able direction, and a story with unusual dramatic possibilities that makes the play one long to be remembered as distinctive and unconventional.

The supporting cast is carefully chosen, both for type and ability, and has among its members Harold Lockwood in the role of Craig, the manly young artist; Helen Hall as the fire-brand, Stella; Justina Johnstone as Amelia; Lucy Parker as Mrs. Fanshaw; and Barbara Winthrop as Miss Van Ostyn. The high standard of the photography is in harmony with the excellence of the acting and settings, but this cannot be said of the rebellion in the reformatory laundry. It contains plenty of action and flying missiles, but not enough of the violence expected in an uprising against organized authority.

Vivacious, fun-loving Jean is sentenced to a year in the reformatory for an unfortunate accident in which her sister's arm is cut by a sickle held in Jean's hand. She escapes, and in the woods meets Craig, an artist, who advises her to return and serve out her time. She does so, and is released some time later for suppressing an uprising among the girls. After experiencing and withstanding bravely some of the world's hard knocks Jean and Craig meet again. But once more Jean leaves him, believing that the stain of the crucible will impair his future and happiness. One day while moody Craig sits down on a bench near the river, dreaming of a little girl whom he loves and who has twice slipped away from him. His attention is attracted by the sound of crying, and, turning, he beholds the girl of his dreams sobbing out her loneliness at the other end of the bench. This time Jean does not escape from Craig, nor does she want to.

Signs With Dyreda

The Dyreda Art Film Corporation is congratulating itself on signing Frederick De Belleville to act in a feature motion picture, which will be produced under the direction of J. Searle Dawley. Mr. De Belleville is one of the best known and most justly popular actors in this country and has long occupied an exceedingy important place on the American stage, having been leading man for Minnie Maddern Fiske, James O'Neill, Rose Coghlan and other stars too numerous to mention. He is an actor of force, vividness and discretion, and his methods are as legitimate as they are graphic and telling. His portrayals of the extremely difficult roles of Nortier in "Monte Cristo," and of Des Prunelles in "Divorcons," caused considerable favorable comment throughout the world. Mr. De Belleville will be seen for the first time in motion pictures in the feature, "A Daughter of the People," which will be released through the World Film Corporation some time in January and will be eagerly looked forward to by the many who have seen him on the legitimate stage.

Edison Star's Narrow Escape

But for the quick thought and quicker action of Edward Earle, Mabel Trunnelle would have lost a quantity of her beautiful black hair recently in the staging of a rescue scene for "The Lesson of the Flames," one of the Edison "Olive's Opportunities" series. Mr. Earle was carrying Miss Trunnelle down a rope from the third story window of an old factory, when, just as the pair were opposite the second story window, a puff of flame issued from it and enveloped them. Miss Trunnelle's hair was ablaze in an instant, but Mr. Earle smothered the blaze with his hand and arm, pluckily assisted by Miss Trunnelle. Luckily they were swinging directly in front of the camera at the time, and it received the full benefit of the unexpected piece of realism.

Fundamental Principles

TRANSFORMED BY FEATHERSTONE

This is the first of a series of articles which will be of particular interest to those who would like to become familiar with the scientific and artistic principles underlying the motion picture, but who, for lack of time, must forego the pleasure and profit of extended study. The writer is an authority, but the subjects treated being of general interest, and as a rule free from technical expressions they should prove as interesting to the average reader as to the expert.

PRINCIPLES OF LIGHT AND OPTICS AS APPLIED TO THE MOTION PICTURE.

IN tracing the causes behind the modern motion picture, we will begin at the end and go backwards. First let us go into an up to date photoplayhouse and sit way up front. What is the first thing we see? Is it a screen with a picture on it? If so it must be a poor screen or poorly arranged, otherwise it would be invisible, or at least unnoticeable. At any rate we see a picture. How do we know it is a picture? Because it resembles other "pictures" with which we are familiar, and like them it is on a flat surface, and resembles something which it is not.

It also differs from other pictures in that it moves. But how does it move? Does the whole picture move? Or do only certain pictured objects move? In a good picture only such things move as would move if the scene were real, but on account of many difficulties with which we shall become familiar after a while, usually the whole picture moves more or less, and in several different directions as we can plainly see if we look sharply.

The causes of these erratic movements we will take up presently, but in the meantime let us consider the picture itself, and learn what it is and how it got there. First of all it is a complicated arrangement of so-called light and shade, or bright places and shadows. The arrangement changes continually, and we are conscious that there is being unfolded a series of thoughts, which, before reaching our brains, must have journeyed through strange territories and by unusual vehicles.

We shall trace the thoughts back to the thinker—the scenario writer—and shall inspect the vehicles—or "media"—by which they have traveled to the screen and into our eyes and brains, before being added to our own store of thoughts and memories.

The picture seems to be a continuous representation, but upon close inspection we occasionally notice a slight jerkiness of fast moving objects in the foreground, and begin to suspect the true nature of motion pictures, that they are made up of a series of slightly different pictures with so short an interval of time between them that the human eye is deceived, especially if the story is interesting, for then we shall be less critical.

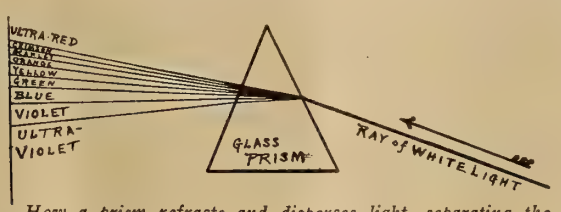

Fig. 1. How a prism refracts and disperses light, separating the colors from white light (much exaggerated).

If, now, we look upward and backward toward the rear of the theater, we will see streaks of light reflected from the dust in the air, and these light streaks shift about like the "high-lights" in the picture. They also all seem to come from a bright spot which marks the location of the projection machine. Through this machine runs the film at the rate of from sixteen to twenty pictures per second, each picture being a photograph 1 inch wide and ¾ of an inch high. A powerful electric arc light shines through the film, and, by the aid of special lenses similar to those of a microscope, projects the magnified picture on the screen; a picture 15 feet high being 200 times the height and width of the film picture, and 40,000 times the area. Therefore the light passing through the film image must be at least 40,000 times as bright as the illuminated screen.

WHAT IS LIGHT?

Of all the forces that are utilized in producing the motion picture the most important is light, for it not only projects the enlarged images on the screen but it makes the image in the first place. How it does these things would make a wonderful story, more interesting than any scenario, but the scenery and characters are so strange that it is very difficult to get well enough acquainted to harmonize them with our ordinary everyday ideas.

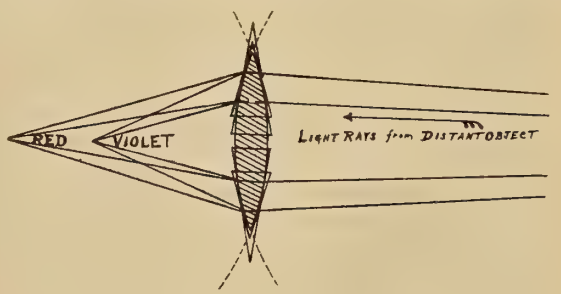

Fig. 2. How a lens brings light to a focus.

Such characters as ether waves, electrons, and molecules (pronounced mol'-e-cules), and such scenery as magnetic fields, objectives and emulsions may lack the so-called "human element," but they are mighty important, and the better we are acquainted with them, the more thorough will be our work as we try to use them in perfecting the motion picture.

Light itself is an effect on the mind through the brain and the eye, and without the eye there would be no light. Of course there would be the forces which, entering the eye, cause light to be seen, but these forces are not light, any more than the waves of air which enter the ear are in themselves "sound." Let us see then what it is that enters the eye when we see light. It must be something which travels, for we can prevent its reaching the eye by holding an opaque object between us and its source. The fact is that it travels very fast indeed, something like 186,000 miles per second, which would be more than seven times around the world, so for all practical purposes in photography and the projection of pictures it may be said to travel instantaneously.

ETHER WAVES.

Scientists are not agreed as to just how light travels, or to be more nearly correct, just how the radiant energy which we see as light is propagated through space, as from a so-called light-source to the eye. The commonly accepted theory has it that light is caused by "waves in the ether," and the ether is described as a substance filling all space, that is at once lighter than the lightest air or gas, and denser than steel. Light is supposed to be caused by waves of the ether entering the eye and affecting the retina and the optic nerve, and hence the brain.

These waves are very short, but they have been measured accurately. They differ in length for different colors, the red rays being composed of the longest waves and the violet the shortest. The actual lengths of the waves of light are as follows:

Ultra red	Longer than 800
Dark red	700 to 800
Scarlet	630 to 680
Orange	565 to 620
Yellow	530 to 560
Green	490 to 520
Blue	430 to 480
Violet	370 to 420
Ultra violet	Shorter than 360

The above measurements are in millionths of a millimeter, and a millimeter is about one twenty-fifth part of an inch.

The light waves are not the only waves in the ether. There are also waves of heat and electricity and many other forms of energy such as X-rays and the emanations of radium. The heat rays and some electrical waves are longer than those of light, but other electrical waves are very much shorter.

There are also many waves that we do not know very much about, and in fact the most wonderful discovery that has been made in this connection is that our total knowledge and experience is but the smallest kind of a fraction of what it would be possible to know and experience, if we had other senses and other instruments to detect the many kinds of energy that are quivering through the ether, and pass us by without affecting us in the least, so far as we know.

While the ether is supposed to fill all space and all objects, different waves of the ether do not pass through all substances with equal readiness. For instance X-rays will pass through wood and rubber quite easily, but glass resists their passage, and transmits light rays, which wood and rubber absorb.

WHAT IS A LENS?

A lens is a piece of glass or other transparent substance, having its surfaces so curved that when rays of light pass through it they will be bent out of their path and many of them brought together, usually to form an image or picture. Glass is selected for several reasons. First, it is transparent, and second, it is hard and durable. Besides it has a most important quality in that it "refracts" the light waves. This means that it bends them to one side of their path, or in other words changes their direction. The simplest effect of this kind is that of a prism which usually is a wedge-shaped piece of glass. There is something else that a prism does to light waves besides refracting them. It disperses them as well, which means that it tends to separate the waves of different lengths (different colors). It does this as indicated roughly in the sketch shown in Figure 1.

It will be noted that all of the rays are refracted or bent toward the base of the prism, and that the violet rays are bent most, so that the single ray of white light which entered the prism has been split up into a series of colored rays ranging from red to violet.

Now a lens may be considered a curved prism, or a combination of a large number of prisms arranged about an axis, so that parallel rays coming from one side are brought together to a "focus" at the other. With a simple or "double convex" lens as shown in Figure 2, the violet rays, being bent most, come together nearest the lens, while the red rays come to a focus farther away. This is known in optics as "chromatic aberration" and is corrected by using two or more lenses of different kinds of glass, one of which has greater relative refraction and the other greater dispersion.

These corrected lenses are known as "achromatic" lenses, and they are also corrected for another defect called "spherical aberration" which is illustrated in Figure 3, where it will be seen that the rays of light falling on a convex lens near its edge are brought to a shorter focus than those falling on the center portion, but in a properly corrected lens all rays from one point in the object or scene being photographed are concentrated on one point of the plate or film.

ANASTIGMAT LENSES.

There is still another defect even in an ordinary achromatic lens, and it is called "astigmatism." It is rather difficult to explain in a few words, but its effect is to cause a blurring of certain lines in the picture. For instance, if the vertical lines are brought to a focus, the horizontal lines will be blurred, and vice versa. This didn't make much difference before the motion picture came, for it is scarcely noticeable in an ordinary photograph unless it is very much enlarged. But since the images on a motion picture picture film are enlarged anywhere from 100 to 500 times when projected on the screen, it has become necessary to make these small images very perfect indeed. Therefore specially designed lenses are made which have practically no chromatic aberration, or spherical aberration, or astigmatism. These lenses are known as "anastigmat lenses," and though only ones good enough to use on motion picture cameras.

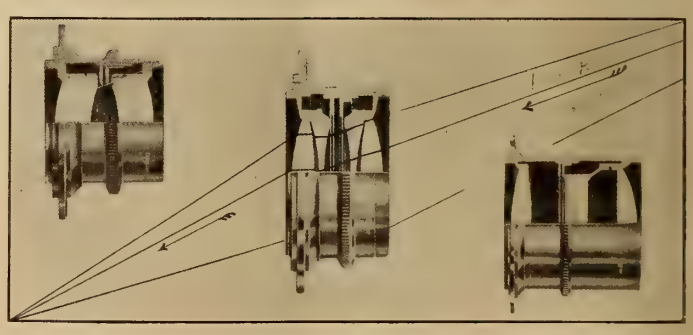

Fig. 4. Types of modern anastigmat lenses, or "photographic objectives."

much more expensive than the ordinary kinds, are the In Figure 4 are shown a few types of anastigmat lenses or objectives suitable for motion picture work. The first has two "combinations," "front" and "back," each made up of three separate lenses cemented together, a concave or "negative" lens between two convex or "positive" lenses. Both combinations being alike this is known as a "symmetrical" lens.

The second objective is also symmetrical, but each combination is made up of but two separate lenses not cemented. The third objective is an unsymmetrical three-lens system, which has certain advantages for some kinds of work, for the best lens that can be made today is not quite perfect enough to meet all of the exacting demands of the motion picture, so the camera man selects a different type of objective for each class of subject.

In Figure 4 is also indicated the passage of rays of light from an object being photographed, through the separate lenses or "elements" of both combinations of a so-called "rapid" anastigmat, and thence to the sensitive plate or film.

The next article will show how a lens makes a picture, or rather how the picture image is formed at the focus of a lens, and how the wonderfully sensitive chemicals on the photographic film are affected by the light parts of the image so that all the lights and shadows are recorded in their proper proportions.

"The Case of the McWinter Family"

REVIEWED BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

FILLED with startling action from start to finish, the sixth episode of "Zudora," entitled "The Case of the McWinter Family," is a film which will hold the interest of any audience from the opening scene until the final fade-out.

While it is not clear in all parts, the action moves forward so swiftly that to the average patron of a motion picture theater the entire film will seem cleverly developed. The acting of James Cruze again is one of the most interesting features, while the work of Marguerite Snow in the title role is up to the usual standard of this clever actress. The plot is built around the rather old idea of a husband mistaking his wife's brother for a suitor but the development it receives is so novel that the idea is made decidedly refreshing.

An element is introduced during this episode which will awake the interest of all who see the film. A leader bearing the words, "The Mysterious Jim Bard" precedes a scene in which Mr. Cruze appears in the act of donning a make-up, which is not at all difficult to recognize. This is one of the several points in this film which will excite the curiosity of an audience and bring them back the next time the picture is shown to learn the outcome of the mystery.

The story of this installment opens with a scene

in the McWinter home. Mr. McWinter and his wife are reading and their child is playing near them. After the child had been put to bed Mr. McWinter takes his wife to task, saying that the man who has been boarding with them must leave the house at once, as he has become an intruder. His wife protests and while they are arguing the man, who is known as Smith, enters. McWinter orders him from the house and, when the man tries to reason with him, the husband attacks him, but Mrs. McWinter separates the men and quiets her husband.

McWinter has charge of a chemical laboratory in which Smith is employed. The next day the husband goes to an old shack near his home, where he lays a trap to take Smith's life by placing a bottle, containing a fluid whose fumes are deadly, on a shelf over the door, which drops every time the door is closed, When his trap is in working order he invites Smith to go hunting with him and the latter agrees.

When they approach the shack McWinter leaves Smith and goes within. When his trap has been set he calls Smith, but before the latter can come the dog, who is with the husband, jumps through the doorway, closing the door after him and dashing the bottle of fluid to the floor. The fumes quickly take McWinter's life. It is about this time that the mysterious Jim Bard makes his momentary appearance.

Smith is arrested, charged with the murder of McWinter, and Mrs. McWinter fearfully seeks the aid of Zudora, telling her that she must clear the accused man, as he is her brother and she is certain that he did not commit the crime. As Zudora leaves the house to start work on the case, Hassam Ali in a fit of rage declares that she must fail this time as she has been too successful in the past. A moment later, under a strange influence, he relents.

A mob attacks the jail in which Smith is held, while Zudora begins work on the case, and march him into the country, preparatory to lynching him. Zudora visits the shack and picks up a clue when she finds a piece of the dog's hair caught in a log which formerly held back the door. The footprints of the dog on the door give her another clue. She requests John Storm to join her and Hassam Ali also visits the scene of the crime. Zudora's uncle finds another bottle of the fluid which McWinter has stored away and drops it. Storm finds him unconscious in the hut, but before he can carry him out both are overcome by the fumes.

Zudora completes her investigations and, in her own mind, works out the way in which the crime has happened. She arrives at the hut in time to save Hassam Ali and her lover from death and the three make their way to the place where the mob are about to hang Smith in time to save him, and clear him of the crime.

An English Cast

Tom Terriss who is putting on the famous Terriss plays for the Kinetophote, has picked his cast for the first of this series of plays. He has chosen for the first of these pictures, "A Man's Shadow," one of the pieces which was made famous by William Terriss at the Adelphi theater in London. As has been announced, Mr. Terriss will have for his leading woman, Anna Luther who has been starred for some time in the Lubin pictures. For the Viscount Acheson of the story he will have Lionel Pape, who is as thorough going an Englishman as ever came to America to put his type of Briton on the stage. Rienzi de Cordova, a British subject who might have come straight from London but was born in Jamaica, is the Craig Dare of the piece. In pictures he has done heavy leads for Kalem, the Famous Players and the Vitagraph. Among others in the cast are Alfred Heming, Alfred Palmer, Walter Kingsford, William Lewin, Cornish Beck, Katheryn Adams, Millie Liston and Millie Terriss, who is the joy and pride of the household of Mr. and Mrs. Tom Terriss.

Putting Thrills in Lubin Feature

An explosion which tears down the whole side of a mountain, completely burying a mining town under tons of rock and dirt, and the head-on collision of two trains are two of the sensational features in the forthcoming Lubin drama, "The Valley of Lost Hope," written by Shannon Fife and produced by Romaine Fielding of the Lubin staff of directors.

The mining town was built during the action of the play, showing how mushroom towns spring up during a "strike-gold-quick" craze. The little town was laid out in a valley close to the mountain. Over a ton of dynamite was distributed from the base to the top of the mountain and when the fuse was lighted seven cameras were turned upon the scene, four of them being driven by motors. The explosion itself was spectacular in the extreme and the little town was wiped out by the immense amount of dirt and rocks that descended upon it.

To secure the train smash two trains were driven into each other at the rate of 35 miles an hour on the Pittsburg and Susquehanna Railroad near Phillipsburg, Pennsylvania. One train consisted of an engine and three passenger coaches and the other of engine and seven freight cars. The crash was a thriller in every detail and a few seconds afterwards the trains were only a mass of burning kindling wood. The frontispiece of this issue illustrates the wreckage following the collision.

New Alliance Exchanges

Last week saw the addition of five new exchanges to the list of Alliance offices, which now total nineteen. These are situated at stragetic centers the United States and Canada and are within easy reaching distance of every exhibitor.

In the West the new offices are located in Spokane, Butte, and Denver, and are known as the Alliance Programme Feature Service. One of the new southern exchanges will be in Dallas, known as the Alliance Film Company of Texas, and will handle the Alliance program in Texas, Oklahoma, Louisana and Arkansas.

The other southern exchange will be located in Atlanta, Ga., and will be known as the Hybar Film Corp. The latter concern will have the exclusive rights to the Alliance output in Georgia, Alabama, North and South Carolina and Florida. Arthur S. Hyman, formerly general representative of the World Film Corporation, in the South and P. T. Barber, late advertising manager of the Atlanta Constitution, are the men behind the Hybar organization.

Superb Cast in Next Fox Piture

William Fox has exercised excelent judgment in selecting the principal players to appear in a picturized version of "The Girl I Left Behind Me," rehearsals of which are now in progress at the Pathe studios. Besides Robert Edeson, there will appear Claire Whitney, Walter Hitchcock, Irene Warfield, Stuart Holmes, Edna Pendleton, Arthur Clifton and Nanon Welsh. Even the "bits" will be portrayed by experienced screen players. In some of the big scenes the services of eight hundred people will be required. The producing of the photoplay has been entrusted to Lloyd B. Carleton, conceded to be one of the best known producers in the cinema field.

Extra Prints Needed

"Tillie's Punctured Romance" in which Marie Dressler, Charles Chaplin and Mable Normand play the leading roles and which was released last Monday by the Alco Film Corporation, has provoked the greatest bookings in the history of that organization. Four prints of this production are booked up so far ahead in New York State alone, that two extra prints are being secured by the New York Alco exchange to take care of the incidental bookings.

Edison Comedy of Servant Problem

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

IN filming "Lena," with Miriam Nesbitt in the titular role, Director Charles Seay has produced a two-reel comedy that is not only funny, but has considerable depth as well. The story is of a socially ambitious woman who is extremely anxious to treat her servants fairly and make their quarters comfortable when she knows that she will be exposed to the criticism of the women's charity league if she does not, but is terribly lax at doing it of her own initiative when the criticising-club is not hanging over her head.

January 15 is the release date of the picture, and besides Miss Nesbitt as Lena, the mistreated "servant," better known among fashionable club circles as Janet Brewster, Mrs. William Bechtel is seen in it as the haughty and overbearing Mrs. Miggles; Augustus Phillips, as Jack Miggles, the young fellow who falls in love with Lena; Dan Mason, as meek Mr. Miggles; Viola Dana, as Euphania Miggles; Mathilde Baring, as Hannah; and Jesse Stevens as the cook.

Careful judgment is evident in the arrangement and construction of the settings, and the photography is beyond criticism. The real punch of the plot comes in the scene in which Mrs. Miggles makes a self-lauding speech at the meeting of the league for the prevention of cruelty to servants, and then, hearing the president of the league announced, beholds her own maid enter. The situation is forcefully presented and makes a fitting climax to the story. One viewing the picture is not kept in ignorance, as is Mrs. Miggles, of the identity of her servant-girl, and can enjoy fully the developments leading to her awakening.

The Miggles family is in an awful way for servants. The ones that are willing to stay are either intolerable or incapable, and those that qualify in this regard are fairly driven away by their mistress, a woman who has not always had servants to order around, and now, having them, is determined to assert her authority at every opportunity. Mr. Miggles tires in time of making trips to the employment agency for girls, and decides, on receiving the present girl's notice, to bring a bevy of them instead of just one, for his wife's approval. He visits two employment agencies and returns home accompanied by a collection of about a dozen tall, short, stout, and thin applicants of both colors. But none of them suits Mrs. Miggles' fancy.

A woman's league, organized for the purpose of caring for and bettering the interests of servant girls, hears of the trouble that Mrs. Miggles is having with girls, and the president, Janet Brewster, decides to investigate. The next time that Mr. Miggles visits an employment agency in search of a maid Miss Brewster, togged up as an immigrant and known by the name of Lena, is recommended to him. She passes Mrs. Miggles' rigid inspection, and makes a hit with Jack, the good-looking son, immediately.

It does not take Lena long to learn why Mrs. Miggles' girls do not stay longer than a few days. The greatest fault, Lena finds, lies in Mrs. Miggles' disposition. She is selfish, quick to misjudge, and wholly inconsiderate. Her first thought on discovering that a valuable pin is missing from her dressing table is to mentally blame Lena for stealing it; her second, to notify the police; and her third, to accuse the girl of the theft.

Being told by her daughter that she herself has taken the pin does not move Mrs. Miggles to apologize to Lena for her rashness.

She receives a big surprise one day when, after making a long speech at the league about how well she treats her servant, she recognizes in the president her humble Lena. The meeting closes shortly afterwards, and Lena returns to the Miggles home. She scarcely recognizes her old room on seeing it. Clean wall paper, new pictures and nice furniture have completely changed its dingy appearance. Mrs. Miggles has spread the news of Lena's identity, and everyone in the house is willing to kneel before her. Jack outshines Miss Brewster's other suitors, and the affair ends happily in their engagement.

Belasco Production Arrives

Samuel Goldfish announces that the first print of "The Girl of the Golden West," the new Lasky-Belasco production which is positively to be released on January 4 and which will have its first New York presentation at the Strand theater on January 3, has arrived in New York. The work of making the additional prints for distribution through the Paramount is already under way.

"The Girl of the Golden West" is in five reels. It was produced by the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company in association with David Belasco, and much of the work was done at the new Lasky twenty thousand acre ranch. It will be remembered that the play is by David Belasco himself. The production for the film was made under the direction of Cecil B. De Mille. The three leading roles of the "Girl," Ramerrez (the road agent) and the "Sheriff" are played respectively by Mabel Van Buren, House Peters and Theodore Roberts. Both Miss Van Buren and Mr. Roberts have appeared in other Lasky productions, but this is the first picture for the firm in which Mr. Peters has played. The few people who have seen the print up to the present time all comment on the most remarkable resemblance which Miss Van Buren bears in this character to Miss Blanche Bates.

in films, a most unusual production has been released through the General Film Company, by the Selig Polyscope Company. It is entitled, "A History of the World's Greatest War Told in Five Reels of Motion Pictures."

Although coming from the same source as the Hearst-Selig News Pictorial this five-reel special production is not to be identified with the twice-a-week Hearst-Selig News Pictorial service. It is announced as being produced by the Hearst newspapers in conjunction with the Selig Polyscope Company. The five reels are of particular interest and show actual battle scenes with shot and shell, and all the carnage of battle. These pictures were taken by Selig camera-men, assisted by Hearst newspaper correspondents. These intrepid news-picture gatherers photographed the scenes from dangerous positions, along the battle lines in Belgium, East Prussia and other places. Many of the scenes are photographs in the fighting trenches with the allies and with the Germans.

Scores of scenes were eliminated from the pictures owing to their gruesome character. There were hundreds of feet of film showing the dead and dying, which were realistically horrible, but these were cut out in order to avoid appealing to the morbid sensitiveness of the public. Enough of the horrors remain to give examples of the terrible ferocity of the opposing forces and the frightful results.

Lasky Engages Edith Taliaferro

A contract has been entered into by Jesse Lasky for the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company and Miss Edith Taliaferro by the terms of which Miss Taliaferro is to be seen in the near future in an elaborate photo-dramatic production. Miss Taliaferro will be remembered as the leading artist in several widely known Broadway productions and is the younger sister of Mabel Taliaferro.

For Miss Taliaferro's photo-dramatic debut, Mr. Lasky has selected a play by William C. DeMille, entitled "Young Romance," the production of which will be directed by Cecil B. De Mille, the brother of the author.

Death of Arthur Roussel

Arthur Roussel, former vice-president of Pathe-Freres and a leading authority on all technical matters pertaining to film manufacture, died at his home in West New York, N. J., after a long illness. The funeral was held at his house on December 16, many prominent men being present, among them being Charles Pathe and Louis Gasnier of Pathe-Freres.

An Imaginary Bonanza

AN enthusiastic assistant to the United States attorney general has been telling the newspaper reporters that the General Film Company made a profit of sixteen hundred per cent on an investment of $10,000 in its first year, disbursing more than two million dollars among the ten manufacturers who organized it. He also says that out of 116 competing exchanges the company absorbed 60 and put the rest (with one exception) out of business.

One would naturally suppose that a government employe, even one whose tenure of office was brief, would be forbidden such excess of liberty with the facts in a case he was working on. From the publicity-seeking investigator's point of view, the more sensational and melodramatic he makes his statements the more prominently the newspapers will feature his story—with his name and activities, of course, mentioned eulogistically. But his superiors should see that his figures, as made public, are facts, and that they are not used as foundations for a purely imaginary structure of words.

There is nothing of record to indicate just what this "investment of $10,000" means, in the first place. As a distributor for the films of the ten manufacturers who organized it, the General Film Company really needed little, if any, actual money investment. The film business is essentially a cash business. The company was, and is, merely a clearing house for competing manufacturers. The inter-relation of these competitors was made necessary not by their own dictates, but by the peculiar demands of their customers. For it should be understood by laymen and lawyers that in the film business no single manufacturer, or single brand of product, can supply the demands of any one exhibitor. The customer, by the nature of his trade, must buy (or rent) several brands to make up his program. For his convenience and economy it is necessary that he be able to secure all these brands, or enough to make up a diversified program, in one place. Hence the General Film Company; and hence the fact that film manufacturers are always essentially competitors, in spite of their co-operative arrangement—which is not for their own benefit at all, but for the benefit of the customer.

This assistant attorney general who has found his way into the papers quotes a disbursement of more than $2,000,000 as one year's profit. Possibly the figures may be nearly correct; we do not know. The ten manufacturers who co-operate in the General Film Company have a total investment in plant and property which probably exceeds $10,000,000 in live assets, and a business which three times that amount would not establish in its present condition. Viewed in this light, is $2,000,000 an excessive profit, considerng the hazards taken by the original investors? It is really a very modest return compared with other lines of manufacturing.

In spite of the few disgruntled customers common to all lines of business, the General Film Company has unquestionably been a beneficent influence in the business. It brought order out of chaos, offered the exhibitor his choice of competing brands, gave the public a really balanced program—in short, performed all the functions of an efficient clearing house. And it did it without destroying that competition which is the life of trade.

The Alleged Relation Between Films and Fires

ON the twenty-fourth day of last November a smoking car on a suburban train out of Chicago suddenly caught fire. One might almost say the whole car exploded. The occupants of the car were all more or less burned or otherwise injured, two of them dying in hospital, and the whole interior of the car was afterward found to be charred. In the forward end of the car was a man carrying or at least having in his possession, four reels of film.

The newspapers the following morning practically all charged the fire to the motion picture films. There was no evidence to support this theory; they merely took it for granted that films and fires were naturally related. The testimony of several that they noticed a peculiar odor just before the flash seemed to them to clinch the argument. Even now, as this number goes to press while testimony is being taken, no mention has apparently been made of the fact that nearly all suburban trains are still lighted by the Pintsch gas system, that the gas used is carried in tanks in the ceiling of the cars, and that it has a very peculiar and characteristic odor. Of course any combustible gas mixed with air is very explosive. Testimony has been given that the fire started in the ceiling of the coach. The man who had the films states that he actually picked them up after the fire started, but was knocked down in the panic and lost them.

When the Edison plant burned at Orange, N. J., December 9, at least one paper carried a picture of the fire, across the face of which were several sharp streaks of light; and underneath the picture was the explanatory line, "The white streaks are moving picture films exploding in the air"! We are expecting the editorial suggestion now in some enterprising newspaper that reels of film be used as bombs in the current European war.

What will doubtless be heralded by the newspapers as another "film fire," in the effort to make the public believe that films are a very dangerous article of merchandise, took place in the office of one of the smaller feature film renting agencies in the Mallers building, Chicago, December 21. In this case six reels of film were burned, as well as some accumulated rubbish; yet beyond considerable smoke, no harm was done. The same might have happened, and does happen almost every day, in other lines of business. If the insurance inspectors were more careful to see that some of these lower class feature concerns did not allow rubbish to accumulate, it would probably have the result of stopping a great deal of this hue and cry about film disasters.

Why any one with common sense should imagine that a film is any more liable to catch fire than a woman's comb or a celluloid paper knife, on a desk of a business office, is more than we can understand. When one considers the hundreds of millions of these celluloid articles that are in daily use in practically every home as well as every business office, and that rarely if ever do any of these articles or commodities catch fire, it is a mystery why the newspaper and various uneducated people immediately ascribe any fire in or around a film concern to an "explosion" of moving picture films. Films are no more liable to explosion than any other article of celluloid, and in any case it is not an explosion but a rapid combustion highly concentrated, and capable of being easily extinguished because it is concentrated, not spreading.

In the early days of pictures, when the newspaper men were ignorant of the nature of their subject, they fell easy victims to the "copy" prepared by the enemies of the pictures, and we became accustomed to reading all kinds of ridiculous stories. Now that the newspapers have become so thoroughly convinced of the value and excellence of motion pictures that they co-operate in their production, and even make some of their own, it is rather disappointing to witness their reversion to early superstitions.

The newspaper man dealing with a subject that has the least hint of technicality in it becomes the veriest sort of a layman. He jumps at once to the easiest conclusion along the line of least resistance. There is scarcely an issue of any newspaper that does not print at least one technical error, and perhaps we should not expect them to change that habit in favor of the pictures. But their uncontrolled guesswork can do the business a lot of harm, especially in fire cases.

Most big newspapers now have motion picture departments in charge of men who, at the worst, know more about the nature of the film than do the heads of other departments. It would at least be good business practice to ask the opinion of their own picture expert before indulging harmful, even though silly, imaginations.

NEW YEAR RESOLUTIONS.

Mabel collected a few resolutions last week from men prominent in the industry. Since turn about is fair play, we herewith offer a few resolutions that we dreamed had been made just before midnight, December 31:—

Maj. Funkhouser:—To see that all films are cut during the coming year. Through an oversight several reels got by during 1914 without a cut being made.

Any Press Agent:—To be sure that all releases are referred to as "masterpieces." During 1914 a few were inadvertently referred to as only being "the world's greatest film production."

Any Star:—To remain with one company only until a higher offer is received. In the past some players have foolishly regarded their contracts as binding, even when a higher salary was offered by a rival concern.

New York Film Promoters:—To create a few new programs immediately. At present there seems to be a scarcity and lack of variety. It has been almost a week now since a new program was offered the exhibitor.

Any Scenario Writer:—To hook as many plots as possible from the other fellow. Many seem to be doing it and getting away with it nicely, so why not let us all succeed.

W. N. Selig:—Not to buy an Australian whookus during 1915. A specimen of every other beast and animal is already installed at the Selig zoo, so why bother with one more.

An Essanay Production of Military Life

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

ON JANUARY 8 the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company will release a two-reel production entitled "Surgeon Warren's Ward," in which the setting is laid in a military post and in the great northwest. The plot is an interesting one and works up to a splendid climax. Ruth Stonehouse, Richard C. Travers and Bryant Washburn have the leading roles and all of them do very excellent work indeed.

Mr. Travers seems to fit the role of an army surgeon perfectly and the players who comprise the court martial are excellent types for their parts. The photography is adequate and several interior sets will draw the admiration of the fans. One which is especially well set is the ballroom and another the rough cabin in the woodland.

A pretty and realistic picture is presented in the scene taken in the woodland, where a number of wood-cutters are gathered about a campfire. There is plenty of action throughout and it is the variety of picture which is almost certain to be popular in either a downtown or neighborhood house.

Surgeon Warren and his ward.

The opening scenes show the fondness of Surgeon Warren of the army post and his ward, Alice Barth, for each other. Captain Gordon, who is also located at the post, loves Alice, but when he proposes to her she tells him that though she likes him she does not love him. Gordon's true character then asserts itself and he determines that he will win Alice no matter what means he has to resort to in order to do it.

At a ball given at the post the engagement of Alice and Surgeon Warren is announced. Gordon is set on revenge and goes to the underworld, where he hires a woman to kill Alice's love for Warren. The woman comes to the ballroom and creates a scene when she declares that Warren was betrothed to her and that he deserted her. Alice is heartbroken and will not let Warren explain, for the woman tells her that the surgeon belongs to her and that she has no right to claim his attentions.

News of the affair is sent to the officers of the post. They try Warren at a court martial and decide that his conduct has been such that it would be advisable to have him dismissed. Gordon, in the meantime, comforts Alice and the girl turns to him as her only true friend. Warren, heartbroken over the unjust persecution, decides to leave the world of society forever and goes into the Canadian northwest, where he establishes himself as the surgeon of a lumber camp.

Gordon, his path now clear, persuades Alice to marry him and the girl feels that he is the man she really loves. The sweetheart of the girl of the underworld grows jealous of Gordon's attentions to her. He forces her to go to the army officers and confess that she had been bribed by Captain Gordon to pretend that she was the fiancee of Warren. A messenger is sent to find him and tell him of the mistake which has been made so he may return to his position at the post.

Gordon goes to Alice Barth and persuades her to marry him and go on their honeymoon at once. She reluctantly consents, not knowing that Gordon is in reality fleeing because of the accusation against him. They wander from place to place, Gordon trying to escape detection, until they arrive in the forests, where Warren is living.

The captain is penniless. In desperation he steals from the lumber camp. He is caught by Warren, who saves him from the wrath of the lumberjacks. Gordon tells Warren that Alice is dead. Then the messenger arrives telling of Gordon's perfidy. Warren goes in search of Gordon, set upon killing him, and finds him in a little shack with Alice, who is ill. The captain sees that he must face trial as a deserter and ends his life. The girl had never really ceased to love the surgeon and gladly goes back to the fort with him, where in time she is to become his wife.

All Star Issues Denial

Anent the erroneously reported absorption of the All Star Feature Corporation by another corporation the following statement is issued from the offices of the All Star Company:

"There is absolutely no truth nor foundation to the report which has been issued that the controlling stock interest in the All Star Feature Corporation has been acquired by interests other than those which have been in control of the corporation since its organization.

"While the resignation of Harry R. Raver as president, director and general manager of the corporation and of Augustus Thomas as director and director-general have both been tendered to the board of directors of the All Star Feature Corporation at a recent meeting and both have been accepted, there has been no official record made of the selling of their interests in the All Star and no stock transfer has been recorded on the company's books.

"Crosby Gaige, who is of the firm of Selwyn & Company, theatrical producers, is the newly elected president. Mr. Gaige also succeeds Mr. Thomas to the directorate of the corporation, while Joseph W. Farnham, heretofore in charge of the department of exploitations and sales for the company, succeeds Mr. Raver in the directorate of the company and is general business manager. Philip Klein, who for the past few months has been actively and directly in charge of the department of productions, assumes the title of manager of productions and remains, as he has heretofore been, treasurer of the corporation. Archibald Selwyn, of the firm of Selwyn & Company, still retains his office as vice-president and George J. Cooke continues as its secretary. Vice Augustus Thomas' resignation as director general of productions there has been made the appointment of Charles Klein, the prominent American playwright, who will act in an advisory capacity for the corporation. Mr. Klein's plays, because of a contract with another producing concern, are not to be produced by the All Star Company.

"The entire personnel of the All Star Company will remain identically the same as that of the past and its policy will also remain unchanged. Its next release will be 'The Garden of Lies,' by Justus Miles Forman, in which Jane Cowl is to be seen in the stellar role. This will be followed by 'The Fighting Chance,' from the novel by Robert W. Chambers."

Loans Universal a Submarine

An especially timely photoplay is "The Submarine Spy," a two-reel naval drama reissued under the Imp brand to be released on Monday, December 28. Trapped 150 feet beneath the ocean, the last dying struggles of a submarine's crew and officers make as startling a "thriller" as any one-act play ever put on at the Petit Guignol theater in Paris. Uncle Sam loaned a real submarine to the Universal for the taking of this picture and the result is a war film which should make a special appeal to Americans in view of the great European war.

Mary Pickford Not to Leave

Mary Pickford, one of the world's most famous motion picture stars, who has as great a following as any actress in theatrical history, and who, it has been generally rumored, contemplated leaving the Famous Players Film Company, in whose productions she has exclusively appeared for the past two years, denies the truth of these reports and authoritatively contradicts the supposition that she is entertaining any plans of severing her connection with the Famous Players. Miss Pickford in a statement says: "I am very thankful for the numerous and flattering offers recently extended to me, but I sincerely believe that I cannot conscientiously consider any other course than to remain with the Famous Players Film Company. The high artistic standard of this company and its constant efforts to elevate and dignify the motion picture, place it conspicuously in a position of being the most serious film-producing company in the world.

Mary Pickford

"The plans the Famous Players have made for the future even transcend the importance and distinction of its past achievements, and I am certain that my continued association with this company will provide greater opportunities for distinctive film creations than could be offered by any other factor in the film world. I owe the public who have so splendidly supported and encouraged me throughout my entire career careful consideration of this important point, and I feel that in extending my affiliation with the Famous Players I can best repay, in some small measure, the thoughtful regard that the public has so often demonstrated for the higher element of film offerings.

"I am grateful to Messrs. Adolph Zukor, Daniel Frohman and Edwin S. Porter, officers of the Famous Players Film Company, for all they have done for me toward the best selection and presentation of my plays, and I know they represent, in the highest degree, the spirit of advancement that permeates the art of the photoplay."

Samuel Goldfish announces that an arrangement has been entered into between Louis Mann, the distinguished American comedian, and the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company by which Mr. Mann will make his first appearance in moving pictures in "Elevating a Husband."

The Completion of Universal City

BY MABEL CONDON

William Horsley.

WILLIAM HORSLEY came back to New York from Universal City, Cal., last week and brought a blue print of the entire plant, a panoramic photograph of the city's built-up section and any number of photographs minutely showing everything of interest about the place.

These proofs that Universal city is the wonder-place that it is, speak for Mr. Horsley's seven months of accomplishment out there in California. For it is only that short length of time since he left New York with authority to convert the 230 acres of farm land, three miles from Hollywood, Cal., into a city. And in seven months he has done that and the doing has been remarkably fine. The accompanying illustrations say so, but even they do not begin to nearly describe the place as it is, so Mr. Horsley says. For the whited buildings that look as though they might be calcimined, are of hollow tile, cemented, and then covered with medusa cement, which gives them a marble-like appearance. And the grounds about the buildings, which look merely well-kept are more than that; they represent a vast amount of thoughtful effort and tons and tons of broken rock and gravel. The three-quarter mile of boulevard—Laemmle boulevard—which circles the rear of the city, is representative of more constructive work of especial merit, as also are the three pumping plants, with respective capacities of 30,000 gallons.

In May, when Mr. Horsley arrived at the ranch which he was instructed to make into a city, it was a stretch of fine oats. He waited until this was harvested and on June 18, began construction work. He moved the cow barns back onto the rear of the ranch, converted them into a saddle house and blacksmith shop, built separate quarters for the cow-boys and cavalrymen, new shelters for horses and cattle, an open studio, and then, with companies working here, turned attention to the construction of the front entrance to Universal City.

The panoramic photograph, which appeared on pages 882-883 of last week's issue, from right to left, shows the hospital, a space where the doctor is to have a home, Mr. Horsley's construction shop, then the barber shop and manicure parlor. The long building which is next is the restaurant, with a special dining-room for official spreads. A cement walk leads past the restaurant and the small building in the rear which is the watchman's quarters, and right on to the dressing-rooms. The building in the center of the picture is that of the general offices. In the octagonal section, on top, Isadore Bernstein, general manager of the plant, has his offices. He can look from there down onto the 300-foot studio where, except in the rainy season, all interior scenes are made.

The big building next to the general offices is that of the technical department, where the operators have their own division, and the directors their own, for cutting their pictures and one also for projecting them; then come the drying and developing rooms and next to the factory, the building wherein the mayor, the chief of police and the fire department have their quarters. The purchasing department has the next structure and the end building is that of extra dressing rooms to accommodate extra people. Behind that is a building originally intended for a garage, but with the early coming of the rainy season, it was converted into an indoor studio. Lights have been sent on from New York and work in this studio will soon begin. There is a theater back of the general offices where the completed pictures are shown to the officials—and that completes the list of the various buildings in the foreground.

In the flower-bed to the right of the main office building is the announcement "Universal Film Company," in foliage. The site of the hospital is that of the Treaty of Cahennga in '47, and across the road, a woman's club of Hollywood has erected a mission bell in the Treaty's commemoration.

The mountains in the background are part of the Santa Monica range and afford fine setting for both the city and the city's pictures. There are scene docks, on the rear of the ranch, which allow of a number of forty-foot length scene sets being made at one time. The rear of the ranch also offers plenty of room for the menagerie, the special cages in which the animals are trained for work in pictures and a big arena which can be converted into a forest-land or a lake and in which the animal pictures are made.

The dressing-rooms are roomy and conveniently equipped and a car line from Hollywood to Universal City brings those of the acting force, who do not come in autos, to within a few feet of the main entrance.

Safety and convenience seem to have been the main considerations in mind when the plans for the city were laid out. Mr. Horsley, who for nine years preceding his interest in motion pictures, was general superintendent of the Bigelow Boiler Works at New Haven, Conn., was the man President Carl Laemmle chose as superintendent of the making of Universal City. Mr. Horsley's younger son, Arthur, assists him by taking complete charge of the water plants and Mr. Horsley oversees all else.

Truly, a big task, the making of Universal City, and truly, one well done.

"The Sign of the Cross"

The Famous Players Film Company has filmed the Wilson Barrett success, "The Sign of the Cross." William Farnum plays the leading role, that of Marcus Superbus. And to him and his work is accorded the comment, "Well done." The role particularly fits him; and he, with his gladiator-like physique, his strength and his curling hair that the Roman crown so well becomes, makes a pleasing and heroic Marcus. The characters are well cast, "types" being the thought in mind during the casting. Thus, is Sheridan Block a "Nero" expressive of all the cruelty with which the monarch is credited. It is a splendid impersonation. Rosina Henley is a shrinking Mercia, a Christian maid, and Ethel Grey Terry and Lila Barclay play the roles of favorites of Nero, who are in love with Marcus.

Ogden Child's work as Stephanus, the boy who is tortured until he reveals the meeting-place of the Christians, is impressive and plainly shows him to be a boy of talent. Giorgini Majeroni has an important part in the character of Tigellinus and others who have name roles are Morgan Thorpe, Ethel Phillips, Charles E. Verner and Rienzi de Cordova.

The film, in order that it be the Roman-perfect one that it is, must have been given a world of detailed arrangement. Its four reels deviate not the least bit from the atmosphere and customs of the ancient Romans, as they are popularly conceived and the settings are the massive, elaborate ones which give further substance and realism to the film. Good photography is an additional asset. M. C.

Offering a Wonderful Feature

Those who were privileged to attend a private showing of the six-reel Griffith feature, "The Avenging Conscience," at the invitation of A. M. Eisner of the E-L-K Film Company, at Fulton's exhibition room in Chicago on Tuesday afternoon, December 22, went away awed and amazed at the art of the great Mutual director. Without exception, those who composed the audience were ready to admit that the photoplay art had reached a new level—that Mr. Griffith in his "Avenging Conscience" had transplanted to the screen all the weirdness and imagery of Edgar Allan Poe's "The Telltale Heart" and "Annabel Lee" (for it was those two creations that suggested the story to Mr. Griffith) as no other living producer could have done.

Rich in symbolism, perfect in photography and wonderful in its portrayal, "The Avenging Conscience" should prove an attraction the equal of any which an exhibitor could offer his patrons, and one anticipates that Mr. Eisner will be overwhelmed with bookings on the feature. Henry Walthall, as the young man of the story, rises to supreme heights and the support given him by such stars as Blanche Sweet, Spottiswoode Aitken, George Seigman and Ralph Lewis is adequate in every respect.

The story of the young man, who murders his uncle to be free to wed his sweetheart and then is pursued by his conscience, is powerfully told, and dramatic in the extreme, but the complete surprise at the end, when one discovers for the first time that the young man had only dreamed the murder and its resulting terror, adds just the necessary touch to the picture to send audiences away smiling and delighted.

No mention of "The Avenging Conscience" would be complete without a tribute to the camera work and photography in general, for the vision scenes, double exposures, and symbolism of the feature more than half account for its impressiveness—the adjective "wonderful" falls far short of describing this technical end of the making of this picture. N. G. C.

The Motion Picture—an Art

BY D. W. GRIFFITH

I THINK it is now generally acknowledged that the motion picture is an art and is to take its place on the world's platform, somewhere near the chairs occupied by the drama, painting, or literature.

Some there be who say that it is greater than the stage; that the stage, with its limited boundaries, cannot compare with the moving picture, which can have the entire world for a stage. Ten or twelve scenes, at the most, was all the stage could dare attempt in one play. The moving picture can have ten or twelve thousand; can begin with its hero in the heart of the woods, transfer him to the river bank, make him a farmer working in the fields; show him, as it were, growing up, even as we see a grain of wheat growing into the ground, out again as a green stalk, turning yellow, ripening, going back again into the dust—so we can follow our moving picture hero into the green fields of the spring, on through the summer, the autumn, the winter; seasons, time, place, country, city, rivers, ocean, east, west, north and south—it matters not—the moving picture camera can never be baffled.

David W. Griffith

These people say there can be no art in dramatic presentation that can rival the moving picture art on this account. The motion picture has been a cheap amusement. It has, in the first place, depended largely on what are commonly termed as the "common people." We should hardly say this in depreciation—the Son of God Himself was criticized on a like account. "What good could come out of Nazareth?" What art could come out of the old flickering "movie?" Well, these are questions time will have to answer.

Already there are indications that the butterfly is emerging from the chrysalis. A hundred years or so from now will they read the books much? Will they consider dramas written about the present murdering of giants that is happening in Europe? Will the newspapers of today be stored and kept and used as chronicles of our time? Will the arguments concerning how we ate, slept, drank, walked, thought, loved, lived, died, murdered, repented of our sins, walked from the morning of life until death's winter—be taught to our descendants by the written word, or by the moving picture? May not even our children be more pleasantly, more thoroughly, and more readily instructed about not only that which is going on during their day, but also through big films, big stories, big education, learn all of the ways of living that we call history of the past, through the moving picture?

One hardly dares to think or dream what would be now, had the moving picture filmed Egypt and her kings; Assyria coming out of the desert and growing into might, her walls crumbling by the river Euphrates before the hammering of Darius the Great; the Greeks leaving their homes, walking their streets, praying their prayers, until Greece became no more a power in the world; the way of the long roads that Rome built around the world, her emperors in her streets, her people going in and out about their daily way; the senators leaving the senate chambers, the long line from the nobility and the emperor stretching up to the arena sides, back to those high benches where the common people, from the country and the alleys of her cities, ate their meals and lived for days, watching at the hippodrome; the laughing and the loving, the prostitutes sitting at their stalls, the thinkers, the dreamers, leaning over the stone chairs—in other words, what historian has ever written the story of life to compare with that which the moving picture could have told, and will tell in the future?

So to say, "What is the future of the moving picture?"—one might as well try to say what is the future of the world, because the moving picture can at least imitate and picture everything and anything there is on the stage of life.

They speak of paying fifty cents for seeing a picture, as though that were something unusual. They will make moving pictures that people will pay many times fifty cents to see, before they are through, and the people will not be surprised, knowing there has been spent hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions of dollars in making the picture. Either this will be true, or the picture itself will not continue to exist. Or perhaps, if this does not come to pass, and the same prices exist, you will see pictures in moving picture theaters seating twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, seventy, eighty thousand people, or as far as the eye can reach, up to an almost unlimited distance.

Motion pictures are now recognized as one of the country's leading industries. Conservative financiers have realized that the motion pictures represent excellent business opportunities. They realize that they can get a better return on an investment in motion pictures than almost any other financial enterprise. Money on Wall street has tightened up considerably since the war. It has been almost impossible for the heads of industries to raise money to put into their business. To requests for funds Wall street replied it had no money to loan. But when clean, conservative business men attempted to raise funds to finance a legitimate motion picture enterprise, it was found that Wall street was a veritable gold mine. Money literally poured into the coffers for financing motion pictures. These hard-headed financiers take no chances. They have investigated thoroughly and found that motion pictures represent an ideal investment.

This speaks well for moving pictures and shows the faith of our leading business men in the future of the photo drama.

Smalleys in "False Colours"

Just the mention of Lois Weber and Phillips Smalley among the members of the cast is assurance enough for followers of Bosworth, Inc., films that their latest four-reel feature, "False Colours," is a picture well worth seeing. Interest thus aroused is easily sustained and gratified by this powerful drama of a man whose great love for his wife reacts in antipathy for the child whose birth is followed shortly by the mother's death.

The theme contains originality and strength, and was scenarioized and produced by the Smalleys in addition to the important part they play in interpreting it. The scenes are all graphic and convincing, and a few of them, such as the theater scenes, immense in size and in the number of supers employed. The photography in every instance is nothing short of beautiful, and though not containing many close-ups, nevertheless brings out clearly the facial expressions of the players and the significance of the suggestive situations.

Lois Weber is seen in a dual role as Mrs. Moore and her daughter Flo, and is afforded unusually opportunity for displaying her versatility. Phillips Smalley fits well the virile role of the famed actor, Lloyd Phillips, and gives an excellent performance. Courtenay Foote as Bert, Dixie Carr as Dixie Phillips, Adele Farrington as the housekeeper, and Herbert Standing as Marc Herbert are the principals in the remainder of the cast.

As Lloyd Phillips is removing the grease paint after a successful first night in a new play he receives a telegram that he is the father of a baby girl, but that he must hurry if he wishes to see his wife alive, as she is sinking rapidly. Phillips hastens to his wife's bedside, but arrives too late. Thereafter the sight of the child revives the suffering caused by his wife's death, and he becomes so antipathetic to the baby that he cannot bear its presence. Leaving it in care of the housekeeper, he isolates himself on a lonely island.

cate Bert, the housekeeper's worthless son, and the knowledge embitters her against her father, and all about her. She leaves for the city and obtains a position in a revival of her father's old play. Phillips writes that he is returning home, and Bert and his mother decide to deceive him by substituting another girl for his daughter. Bert marries Flo Moore and compels her to impersonate Dixie.

Phillips becomes fond of the girl, but on learning that she is married to the unscrupulous Bert he becomes angry and leaves. Receiving a note from his old manager, Marc Herbert, to the effect that Dixie Phillips has proven successful, the father journeys to the city and visits her at Mrs. Moore's house, but she refuses to have anything to do with him. Flo also is present, but she, too, scorns the lonely man. Phillips returns to his island hermitage, and a reconciliation is later effected between him and Flo and Dixie. Bert is killed in an attempted burglary, and Flo, now free, marries Phillips. C. R. C.

Lighting Experiments

Visitors to the Lubin Manufacturing Company this week were interested in an unusually brilliant light coming through the glass sides of the big studio. Upon investigation they discovered that the illuminating engineers of the National Lamp Works laboratories were making exhaustive tests with a new incandescent light, known as the Photolite, which is said to have never been used before in the taking of moving pictures. Dr. M. Luckiesh and H. H. Magdsick of Cleveland, the man who is in charge of the illuminating of the Woolworth building tower in New York, are in charge of the visiting engineers. The new light was brought to the Lubin studios in order that the Lubin engineers, under the direction of Edward L. Simmons, might experiment and pass their opinion upon it. The new light is over half a million candle power and requires the energy of a 150-horsepower generator to operate it.

Next Excelsior Release

The next Excelsior release will be entitled "In The Shadows." This plot is taken from the book "The Shadow," by John B. Hymer, and is a story of the loyalty and friendship of two men starting in their college days and continuing through a series of incidents, in which one of them is suspected of murder. Through it all runs the love of the hero for the sister of his chum and companion, and she by her grit and ready wit aids in unravelling the chain of circumstantial evidence which tends to the false conviction of her future husband. Throughout the story the breath of open air life, and the sweet purity of true affection are strongly characterized in the actions of all.

The competent players of the Excelsior Feature Film Company aptly portray the stirring events that occur throughout the five-reel story of this photoplay.

Advance Showing of "The Eternal City"

Invitations, symbolic of artistic thought and workmanship, have been issued by the Famous Players Film Company for the premiere presentation of the eight-reel spectacular production "The Eternal City," by Hall Caine. Pauline Frederick takes the lead in this film which was made in Rome and which will have its first showing at the Lyceum theater at eight-fifteen on Sunday evening, December 27. The film will not be released on the Paramount program but will be given a run at Broadway theater, the Lyceum probably, after which it will be booked in other cities.

Kleine's "Officer 666"

Those who enjoy plays with quick, snappy action and continual flashes of wit and humor will revel in the new George Kleine's five-reel attraction, "Officer 666." It is the premier refined farce comedy of today, and will be found among the leaders for some time. The original play, which was an instantaneous and howling success on the legitimate stage, was written by Augustin MacHugh, and adapted to the screen by special arrangement with George M. Cohan and Sam H. Harris.

Once fairly started the plot develops with almost lightning-like rapidity, infusing a tingle of excitement and expectancy into its watchers. Three-fourths of the action in the entire play takes place in one room, but by no means does the setting become tiresome or common. Using one scene for this length of time is rather unusual especially in photoplays where variety in scenes is one of the chief assets, but in this play the plot necessitates it.

Considered as a whole, there is not a dull moment in the picture. It is not all comedy, due to a stern aunt's taking her daughter's elopement too seriously, and creating some melodrama and no end of trouble, but as some one is always in hot water in the situations the trouble coincides with the general trend of the story, and the melodrama contributes to the backbone of the plot.

The leading role is entrusted to the celebrated comedian, Howard Estabrook, and he makes of Travers Gladwin a good-natured fellow with a magnetic personality and an unlimited sense of humor. Al Wilson, a man essentially good-looking and well-groomed, and endowed with the knack of doing and saying exactly the right thing at the psychological moment, finds an excellent impersonator in Sydney Seaward. Lois Burnett plays the part of Helen Burton, the would-be eloper; Della Connor, the part of Sadie Small, Helen's susceptible cousin; Ada Nevil, that of the enraged aunt; and to Dan Moyles falls the authority and hard luck of Officer 666. Harold Howard is seen as Estabrook's monocled and manacled friend, Whitney Barnes, and Makoto Iuckuchi is a scream as the valet, Bateato.

Frank Powell directed the picture, and can justly feel proud of its success. At the Candler theater, where the picture was shown to an invited audience Tuesday, December 15, it was enthusiastically received, and accomplished its object—it made everybody laugh and laugh long. C. R. C.

Lake Chad on the Screen

In constructing the African kraal used in several scenes in "The Last Chapter," Richard Harding Davis' story, being produced by the Favorite Players, great care was taken to secure absolute accuracy down to the minutest detail. Photographs of a native settlement near Ngigmi were secured. Ngigmi is situated on Lake Chad and a small stream which empties into the lake almost surrounds the entire village. In fact the village might almost be said to be an island as the only connection with the land is an impassable tropical morass, egress to the village and exit from it being possible only over a rough native bridge.

Wonderful artificial background in Favorite Players' "The Last Chapter."

"An island of this kind is readily defensible against native attack," said William D. Taylor, "and we purposely selected one which showed the characteristics of Central African natives, even though we followed approximately and not exactly the line of march along which Gordon, the African explorer, in 'The Last Chapter,' must have passed."

Carlyle Blackwell spent many night absorbing local color for the African scenes in this picture. "It is surprising," said he, "how many little things one can pick up when one starts to dig out matters of this kind. As the result of the work that Taylor and I did on 'The Last Chapter,' I almost feel myself competent to engineer an African exploration party. I now know exactly what equipment would be required for a trip of this kind, and I am even familiar with some of the simpler ways and signs used by the natives on the Guinea Coast."

Inaugurates Profit Sharing Plan

Lewis J. Selznick, vice-president and general manager of the World Film Corporation, 130 West Forty-sixth street, New York City, has inaugurated a profit-sharing plan whereby all the employees of the company may benefit. Mr. Selznick is the first man in the amusement business to introduce this idea. Before entering the motion picture field, Mr. Selznick had experience of the value of profit-shading plans for promoting the success of a business and the interests of employers and employees. It has always been his aim to work out a plan whereby those who helped to build a business could share in the profits of it.

The World Film Corporation already has hosts of people working for it. Mr. Selznick's plan gives all employees in all branches, from the humblest messenger boy up to the most responsible executive and managers, an opportunity of sharing in the profits. The scheme is worked out on five bases, applicable to division managers, branch managers, salesmen, branch office employees, home office employees.

For each of these classes special percentages are arranged in addition to the salary of the individual. The fundamental principle is this: "The profit-sharing plan is based upon a division of the territories served by the company and an apportionment of each division of a specified minimum of gross cash collections." In other words, this profit-sharing plan puts a premium upon diligence, hard work, honesty and loyalty to the company. It gives every employee the feeling that he is directly participating in the profits that he is making.

Universal's "Damon and Pythias"

The splendid six-reel Universal production of "Damon and Pythias" is rounding its third week in the Fine Arts Theater, Chicago, and promises to enjoy almost as successful a run in that house as did its predecessor, "Neptune's Daughter."

It is a film which does credit to Otis Turner, the man who directed its production. Fully one thousand "extras" were engaged during the filming of the "big" scenes and the handling of these large forces borders on perfection. The photography is excellent throughout and the costuming is authentic. The city of Syracuse was reproduced in part, together with a number of other large sets, both interior and exterior.

The characters of Damon and Pythias are enacted by William Worthington and Herbert Rawlinson respectively, and the other roles of importance fall upon the shoulders of Anna Little, Cleo Madison and Frank Lloyd. All of the types are well chosen and the acting is one of the many delights of the picture. Toward the close the element of suspense is cleverly sustained and the realistic portrayal of a woman's suffering by Miss Madison is indeed praiseworthy. Some of the most spectacular scenes are those of the battle outside the walls of Agrigentum, the burning of buildings within the same walls and the chariot race in Syracuse.

The story is so well known that it scarcely needs retelling. In the photoplay the incidents are woven quite closely together, thus adding dramatic strength. The great friendship of Damon and Pythias is the first thing to be emphasized, this being followed by the infatuation of Dionysius for Pythias' sweetheart, Calanthe. Next the ambition of Dionysius to become king and the opposition of Damon is illustrated and this is followed by the sending of Pythias to Agrigentum on what Dionysius believes is an errand of death.

When Pythias returns, Dionysius renews his efforts to gain the throne, fearing that the young general may become so popular with the people that he will oppose him. Damon, who feels that the people will suffer under Dionysius' reign, attempts to take his life when his efforts to legally oppose him fail. The sentence of immediate death which Damon receives and Pythias' offer to be held his hostage until he can say farewell to his wife and child, give Dionysius an opportunity to test the far-famed friendship of the pair. When Pythias proves that he will readily give his life for his friend and when Damon exerts his last effort to save his friend from the sacrifice the tyrant's heart melts and he forgives all, sending the men to their loved ones. Raths Wins New Honors

Otto N. Raths, manager of the Gaiety theater of St. Paul, prominent in motion picture circles everywhere and the senior member of the Raths-Seavolt Film Manufacturing Company, of St. Paul, will be St. Paul's next postmaster if the recommendation of Congressman-elect Carl C. Van Dyke is approved by Postmaster General Burleson.

In its issue of December 22, the St. Paul Pioneer Press makes the above announcement and then goes on as follows:—

This announcement was made by Mr. Van Dyke this morning. Last night twenty-two members of the Van Dyke campaign committee met at the Merchants hotel and took a secret ballot on this choice for postmaster, the congressman-elect agreeing to abide by the decision.

After the meeting he took the sealed ballots home and the result was not known even to Mr. Raths until he was informed of his election over the telephone this morning by The Dispatch. Mr. Van Dyke did not disclose the details of the ballot, saying that the result was onesided enough to justify action on the part of the executive committee in making it unanimous.

Otto N. Raths was born forty years ago in Minneapolis. After attending the public schools he entered the service of the Bank of Minneapolis in 1891 and remained with that institution until 1897. He then went to the Security National bank and when the Spanish-American war broke out in 1898 he enlisted in Company B, Thirteenth Minnesota as a seargent.

On the return of the Minnesota regiment from the Philippines in 1899 he secured employment with the Wells, Fargo & Co. bank at San Francisco, remaining there one year. In 1900 he came to St. Paul and has lived here ever since. He was secretary-treasurer of the People's Provision company for seven years, and sold out his interest in that company in 1908. Later he rented the building occupied by it, after its dissolution, for a moving picture theater and called it the Gaiety.

He is a captain in the Minnesota National Guard, being attached to the artillery battalion.

During the recent campaign Raths organized the Bolo club, composed of Spanish-American war veterans, and former members of the regular army, and was one of the leaders in the Van Dyke campaign. Mr. Van Dyke is also a Spanish war veteran, serving in the same regiment with Mr. Raths.

Mr. Raths is married and lives at the Morningside apartments.

A. H. Van Buren in Lubin's "The District Attorney"

A. H. Van Buren, who has achieved a notable success on the stage as a leading man, has joined the Lubin players in Philadelphia, and is playing the leading juvenile role in "The District Attorney," which was written by Charles Klein and Harrison Gray Fiske and adapted for the camera by Clay M. Greene. Barry O'Neil is directing the production. This is Van Buren's first experience in pictures, and in order to join the Lubin players he gave up the leading part in a new play by Frank Bacon and James Montgomery entitled "Me and Grant," which was produced in New York Christmas week. Van Buren's first engagement on the stage was as utility man with the Keith stock company in Philadelphia and Barry O'Neil was his director. During the engagement O'Neil predicted that Van Buren would be a leading man within three years. Exactly two years and nine months later Van Buren was leading man with the Proctor All Star company at the Fifth Avenue theater, New York, with Amelia Bingham as leading woman, Frances Starr as ingenue, Charles Dickson the comedian, and the rest of the company equally well known. "My being with the Lubin players has a rather sentimental reason," said Mr. Van Buren. "Barry O'Neil was my first director in stock and his prediction came true; therefore, I was anxious that he should be my first director in pictures."

Alliance Office Enlarged

A crew of workmen have been busy making extensive alterations and additions to the executive offices of the Alliance Films Corporation in the Leavett building, New York City. One of the features of the new arrangement will be the projection room.

Mr. Cobe, the general manager, and his secretaries will occupy a suite of offices to the front while between the offices of Mr. Kosch, the treasurer and the auditing department in a large double office will be the headquarters of the advertising and publicity manager. The sales and the shipping departments together with the exchange will have commodious quarters at the rear of the main hall.

Alco Gauging Market Conditions

Through the medium of a new and original arrangement instituted this week by Walter Hoff Seely of the Alco Film Corporation, the parent office of that concern is being kept in close and sympathetic touch with conditions throughout the country and thus is able to meet conditions in its various distributing centers.

A large, double page report sheet, printed on both sides and captioned "Weekly Condition Report," has been furnished the various exchange managers with orders to fill out accurately each week and forward to the home office. The report sheets bear lines calling for reports on the following conditions: Number of bankruptcies in your district. Number of shops, mills, stores and factories to close. Number of vacant stores on principal streets. What theaters contemplate improvements, or have made improvements in their premises during past month. Assets and previous business of men entering the motion picture industry. What factories, stores or industries announce salary decreases. What factories announce salary increases. What is the condition of the unemployed in your territory. Have there been any bank failures in your district. How is your booking sheet. What increase or decrease in your bookings occurred during present week. Do your clients favor costume, modern, society, problem, sex or melodramatic features.

Selig Activities in Chicago

Tyrone Power, one of the best known dramatic stars, has become a member of the Selig forces. Mr. Power now heads a company at the Selig Chicago studio, where, under the direction of Giles R. Warren, some of the most pretentious Selig productions to be made during the coming season will be filmed. At the present time the Chicago company is completing the well known and very popular Hoyt comedy, "A Texas Steer," with Mr. Power as Maverick Brander, the Texas statesman. As soon as this production shall have been completed, work will then begin upon the filming of "The Servant in the House," the intensely dramatic production in which Mr. Power made a phenomenal successful tour of the United States a short time ago. Upon the completion of "The Servant in the House," a number of other important pictures will be made by this company.

Some Rider is Patrick

Like his famous namesake, Charles O'Malley, the famous dragoon and rider of fiction, Patrick O'Malley has practically ridden himself into the Edison stock company through his wonderful bareback riding in the film, "In His Father's Footsteps," to be released January 30. When the film was first shown, seasoned players, to whom the young actor was not fully known, kept on edge with the thrill of his performance, asked almost with one breath, "Who is he?" With the play's dramatic moment hinging upon the riding, O'Malley rides bareback over country fences, jumps stone wall after stone wall, goes down cliffs, or swims rivers with a verve that keeps the spectator on edge. O'Malley's riding skill was gained in the mountains of Pennsylvania where he was born at Forrest City, September 3, 1890. Though he has appeared in only a few Edison films, O'Malley is not new to pictures as his experience covers this country, England and Ireland. He has appeared in Edison's "The Best Man," "Who Goes There?" and in "The Young Lord Stranleigh" series. O'Malley has been with the Sid Olcott International productions, the Gene Gauntier Feature Players, and the Kalem Company, playing comedy, character and dramatic roles. He has a pleasing, engaging film appearance, and is modest and bashful to a degree not to be guessed at from seeing his daredevil riding.

Film Upsets House Rules

For the first time in the history of the Orpheum theater, Chicago, the largest down town moving-picture house in the Windy City, a feature film has played two days. The rule up to the booking of "The Seats of the Mighty" has been not to give any feature more than a day. The demand to see this Colonial Motion Picture Corporation special was so great that Jones, Linick & Schaefer decided to break the rule and arranged with Manager Harry Weiss, of the World Film Corporation office there, to play the feature for the following day. The fact that the admission price had been raised to fifteen cents did not deter the crowds from jamming the theater.

Lubin's Pictures of the Navy

An unusually interesting series of motion pictures of the United States navy, taken at Newport, Rhode Island, has just been completed by the Lubin Manufacturing Company of Philadelphia and presented to Secretary of the Navy Daniels by Siegmund Lubin. With the entire country interested in the men and ships of the navy, as the result of the probe being made by the house committee on naval affairs in Washington, these pictures have a special significance just now.

These special reels will be shown in the navy department and later will be sent to the naval section at the Panama-Pacific exposition in San Francisco, where the public will have an opportunity of seeing the excellent work being done by the officers and men of the United States Navy.

Production Historically Correct

In the production of "Springtime" in which the Life Photo Film Corporation present the brilliant, little dramatic artist, Florence Nash, that company seems to have gone farther to secure atmospheric conditions and period environment than it is customary for producers to go in order to surround their companies with the proper locale. Miss Nash, William H. Tucker, and associate players of the Life Photo Film stock journeyed to New Orleans and secured an old mansion which was used for most of the interior settings. The old Custom House on the water-front and the public parks throughout the city were placed at the disposal of the director, with the result that the picture is historically and atmospherically perfect in every detail. "Springtime" with Miss Nash and Mr. Tucker will be released on the Alco Program, December 28.

Aim to Depict Real West

"Western," said General Manager Alex E. Beyfuss, of the California Motion Picture Corporation, "has almost become a word of contempt when applied to photo-plays, because ignorant and mediocre producers have sacrificed the essential quality of realism for theatricalism.

"The California Motion Picture Corporation determined to strike a new note in the screen drama and play fair with the patrons of the motion picture houses. Therefore, it set out to produce films which would truthfully represent not only the Wild West, but also the pioneer West.

"That is why we take pride in our first production,—'Salomy Jane,' a feature film which accurately represents life in California in the early days,— a faithful presentation of the scenes described by Bret Harte in his novel of the same name.

"That film represented more work than the public realizes. It was produced under the best stage management possible,—not only theatrical management, but expert pioneer supervision. We wanted 'Salomy Jane' to be true to life, and, to that end, we engaged a number of real California pioneers, not only to take part in the acting, but to keep us advised as to the correct course in 'putting on' the different scenes.

"Nothing was left to guesswork. We didn't draw on our imaginations when we could get expert advice and direction. The result is, as the public well knows, that 'Salomy Jane' rings true. There isn't a false note in it.

"What we did with 'Salomy,' we propose to do in the other Bret Harte productions we are planning. The California Motion Picture Corporation intends to specialize on western productions, being composed of California men, with California management and a majority of California actors and actresses, and, last but not least, with California scenery to photograph. Every feature film we turn out, dealing with Western subjects, will be produced with as much fidelity to the subject as it is possible for us to give.

"The production we are now on,—'The Lily of Poverty Flat,' dramatized by Marion Russell from Bret Harte's three poems, 'Her Letter,' 'His Reply,' and 'Her Last Letter,' offers elegant opportunity for just the kind of work we are interesting ourselves in. With our 'Salomy Jane' experience to rely upon, we are sure of getting out even a better and truer picture in the present production."

American's Christmas Remembrance

King Baggot Plays Santa Claus

King Baggot, the Universal leading man, was seen in person as Santa Claus, Dec. 17, on the streets of New York and at the Hotel Astor in the rooms of the Santa Claus Association headquarters.

The Santa Claus Association is a Christmas charity for the purpose of supplying the needy children of greater New York with holiday gifts. Mr. Baggot was selected for the role of Santa Claus from a good sized group of noted stage and screen stars who assembled at the Astor. He made his appearance as Santa Claus at the New York Post Office and received a bushel or so of pathetic little letters from destitute children. These were taken to the Astor where they were opened and sorted for investigation by the prominent actors, actresses and society ladies who are interested in this benevolent work.

Brevities of the Business

Alec. Lorimore has organized and incorporated a company, of which he is president, known as Bishop, Pesser & Lorimore, Inc. Its purpose is to act as agents for Bishop, Pesser Company, Ltd., of London, and keep it well supplied with American films, and to place on the American market, many of the best European films, that will be sent here regularly from the London offices. Lorimore has also joined forces with Mr. Pesser in the floatation of the National Movement Motion Picture Bureau, Inc., and will also act as president in this, as well as the former company. This company will handle several big features, the first of which is "The Making of a Scout," produced by the Weddepict Company, under the auspices of the Boy Scout Headquarters, and on which picture, he has obtained exclusive rights for two years.

Mr. Pesser, who is on his maiden trip in America, has become infatuated with New York, and American life, and has obtained exclusive rights for Europe to several of our big American productions, on which he is convinced he will make good money.

Not very long ago Lewis J. Selznick of the World Film Corporation decided that he had so many big feature productions ready for release in the near future that it would be a good plan to secure a competent man to handle them. In his usual way he set out to secure a man of that type, with the result that about a week ago Al Lightman, organizer of the Alco Program, and former sales manager of the Famous Players Film Company, became affiliated with the World Corporation in the capacity of manager of the special attractions department. Mr. Lightman has a liking for big special features and he has a liking for Mr. Selznick and his theories, so it was only natural that he should be the man for the place. He will have complete charge of handling the various big features put out by the World and will book each in the way in which he thinks he can secure the best results. Upon hearing a friend congratulate Mr. Selznick on the connection, Mr. Lightman suggested that he was the one who should be given the "glad hand."

Mark Daniels, general superintendent of all the national parks in the country, was a recent visitor at the Thanhouser New Rochelle studio. Mr. Daniels is working to interest the department of the interior in the value of motion pictures as a means of popularizing the national reservations. The Thanhouser Company has a series of scenic and dramatic films taken in the Yellowstone Park which will soon be released, the approval of the secretary of the interior having been given to them.

Louis Gasnier, chief director of the Pathe studios in Jersey City, sailed for Italy on the Patria on December 19. Mr. Gasnier is to be at the Pathe Italian studios for several months in order to give them the benefit of his long experiences in making pictures.

William T. Norton, formerly manager of the General and Eclectic Film Companies in Portland, Oregon, is now territory manager for the Col. W. F. Cody—"Buffalo Bill" Historical Picture Company and has several reels working in Oregon, Washington and Idaho. "Bill" is one of the best known film men in the American northwest and has been in the game for the last eight years. Offices for the pictures were recently opened in the new National theater building in Portland and the picture has been going good in the territory.

Miss Marguerite Snow has been insured, by the Thanhouser Film Corporation, for $150,000 as a guard against accident. Miss Snow, in company with other members of the Thanhouser "Zudora" company had a narrow escape from death last week. Miss Snow has been so widely heralded as the star of "Zudora," that the Thanhouser managers decided to protect themselves against loss in the event she should meet with an accident.

Harvey L. Gates has removed his family to Philadelphia, where they will occupy hotel quarters until going west shortly with Romaine Fielding and his company.

Thanhouser Film Corporation.—There have been a number of offerings of this stock within the last week on a declining scale. Whereas stock was offered last week at 88, it can now be had at 80.

The bidding for Universal Film would appear to be by people who certainly do not know the situation. There is no stock to be had at the present time and probably none will come out. Bidders could raise their price 35 to 40 points with perfect impunity. This stock is closely held and under agreements that will practically not permit the offering of any shares.

Syndicate Film Corporation.—This stock sold at 147½ this week and it now seems doubtful as to whether or not the company will embark upon any further activities. If the dividend, unofficially promised, for the month of January is paid, it will mean a little under 107% will have been paid within a period of 5 months.

Thanhouser Syndicate Company.—Something of an unusual nature has been promised for some of the later episodes, beginning with No. 6. It is reported that contracts have passed the $680,000 mark.

General Film Company.—The demand for the preferred stock improved last week and, for the first time in several weeks, a number of buying orders appeared on the market at the same time.

Universal Film Manufacturing Company has secured the rights for the Submarine Pictures and will begin their release in the immediate future. This is simply another evidence of the enterprise of the Universal management.

Exhibitors all over America have just received their copies of the latest number of the Selig Monthly Release Herald, a well printed and remarkably interesting magazine issued by the publicity department of the Selig Polyscope Company, from the executive offices in Chicago. The entire program for the month of January is illustrated and a synopsis of each picture is given in this issue. The illustrations are remarkably clear and distinct, while the synopses are cleverly written, so that the exhibitor can readily form his opinion of each picture.

M. O. Penn, the very able Pathe actor, is engaged in directing a picture, the first with which he has ever been connected, save in the capacity of actor. Mr. Penn's picture is called "The Rod of Wrath" and is played by an excellent cast including Henry Walthall, Eleanor Woodruff and Mr. Penn himself.

The Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, according to an announcement made by Mr. Samuel Goldfish, is completing arrangements to provide a series of special stellar vehicles for Dustin Farnum, the favorite American star. It is largely the versatility displayed by Mr. Farnum in the depicting of the Southern character of "Cameo Kirby," the dashing gentleman-gambler of New Orleans, which has led Mr. Lasky to make even more ambitious plans than formerly for the forthcoming Farnum releases.

George D. Baker, a prominent director of Vitagraph comedies, was a real "trooper" in his dim and misty past and though infrequently referring to the time when he was a struggling actor-manager, stories of the old days are well worth listening to. His latest tells how he extracted blood from a stone, in the guise of a hard-hearted small town opera house manager, to enable him to play a Christmas date.

Present at a private showing of the first reel of the Edwin August feature at the Kinetophote's projection room on Tuesday evening, December 15 were Miss Rita Jolivet, the Harrison Grey Fiske star who recently closed in "What It Means to a Woman" at the Longacre theater, Hamilton Revelle the well known Leslie Carter leading man, Mme. E. Guerin, who is now lecturing "Marie Antoinette" at the Waldorf Astoria, William Caryle Herbert, member of the Kinetophote Corporation, John Hodder who acted as host and Edwin August.

George J. Beihoff, who has been managing the Philadelphia office of the World Film Corporation, has been transferred to the Indianapolis branch; W. W. Kulp has been appointed manager of the Cleveland branch of the World and H. E. Stahler, former manager of the Warners Features, Inc., in Dallas, Texas, has been placed in charge of the Atlanta branch of the same concern; C. L. McVey has recently been placed in charge of the Kansas City branch and will devote himself to handling the business in the southwestern district.

Director Harry Handworth, president of the Excelsior Feature Film Company, has closed his Lake Placid studio and is preparing to begin work on a production which will have life in New York as its foundation. A well-known Broadway favorite is to star in this film but Mr. Handworth is not prepared yet, to give the name of the play or the star.

Edgar O. Brooks special representative for Blinkhorn Photoplays Corporation is in New York after a stay in Dallas, Texas, where he was temporary manager of the Dallas exchange.

Ben Abrams, one of the traveling representatives of the Alliance Films Corporation has just returned from an extensive trip through the South. Among the cities visited were Dallas, San Antonio, Waco, Houston and Forth Worth. In all of these places he inquired into the conditions and needs of the local film markets and met the leading exhibitors.

After a stay of less than a month in New York City, Jesse L. Lasky has returned to California and will remain there some time, supervising the various new productions which are being made at the Lasky studios and on the new Lasky ranch in the Santa Juacinta mountains.

Eddie Roskam announces the release of "Another Girl." The little lady arrived in his new home at twelve-forty-five Monday morning. Two hours before that time the happy mother, with Eddie, were enjoying a special performance of "The Pit," which was being run at the Playhouse for Wilton Lackaye and his friends. Eddie seems partial to girls, as he now is the happy father of a blonde and a brunette. At the time of going to press the new arrival, the mother, Eddie and the Life Photo Film Corporation are doing well.

Charles J. Giergerich has resigned from the position of motion picture editor of the New York Review, and will devote his time to special motion picture advertising and publicity work.

Bishop Pressers & Lorimore beg to announce that they have secured the exclusive rights of all the releases of the Life Photo Film Company for Great Britain and her colonies other than Australia and Canada. This is one of many excellent programs that Mr. Pressers expects to close before sailing for Europe on December 30.

That Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company has engaged Wallace Eddinger to star in the forthcoming film production of "A Gentleman of Leisure," replacing Henry Woodruff in the stellar role of that piece. Mr. Woodruff was taken ill upon his arrival at the Lasky studios in California and as the release could not be delayed it became necessary to engage another star. Mr. Eddinger was induced to sign at short notice and has already left for California.

Miss Marguerite Clark, by the courtesy of the Famous Players Film Company, assumes the stellar role in "The Goose Girl," a forthcoming Lasky picture. The other leading artists in the company are Monroe Salisbury, Sidney Dean, E. N. Dunbar, James Neill, L. Payton, B. E. Peters, H. B. C. Carpenter, Ernest Joy, J. M. Cassidy, Miss Johnson and Jane Darwell.

Brooks Johnson is the name of the little man who has come to abide with Victor Johnson, publicity man for Ditmar's Features, and with Mrs. Victor, who is well and happy in her possession of a son. Many friends congratulate the parents and send a welcome to Brooks.

"Comediennes may come and comediennes may go but Keystone goes on forever," is the philosophy of the New York Motion Picture Company as voiced by an official of that company when asked as to the plans of the coast comedy troupe. Charlie Chaplin's resignation was calmly accepted and while three new recruits have already been signed at the coast studio, it is not decided just which one of them will be given the stellar comedienne role. "Dutch" Ward of burlesque, Billy Walsh, who has been the hit of New York's Faust cafe, and Samuel Gribbons of the coast, are the new additions to the Keystone Company. The return of a former Keystone funny man is under consideration.

Pearl White was welcomed to the Room of the Green Rug the other day and chatted interestingly of the new serial in which Arnold Daly is sharing honors with her. She rejoices that "The Exploits of Elaine" is not a serial of adventure as was "Pauline." The exploits will give her a chance to return to the realm of acting and after weeks of being the athletic Pauline, Miss White is pleased with the change. She paid tribute to Mr. Daly by stating that he was an agreeable person to work with and prophesied for herself great pleasure in doing the "Exploits."

Edward Abeles has been re-engaged by the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company to star in the release entitled "After Five," which is announced for January 28. "After Five" is by Wm. C. and Cecil B. DeMille, and work on the film began last week.

The Photoplayers' Club are springing an innovation for their annual ball at the Shriner's hall, Los Angeles. The dance will be preceded by a minstrel entertainment with the best-known artists in the costumes they are best known in.

The Beauty company is engaged in the production of an allegorical story, "The Spirit of Giving," contrasting the wrong and right way of living. Joseph Harris and Virginia Kirtley play leads, supported by Webster Campbell and other popular "Beauty" stars.

The latest addition to the Universal's directorial staff is Lorimer Johnston. Mr. Johnston will direct Mary Fuller. His first picture under the Universal's banner is "The Laugh That Died."

Pete (Grid) Schmid, for the past year associated with The Billboard, is now connected with the publicity department of Bosworth, Inc., who have just opened New York offices in the Candler building. Pete will act as assistant to Julian M. Solomon, Jr.

Bessie Barriscale's prize Boston terrier joined the New York Motion Picture camp at the same time as his mistress decided to lend her talents to the enrichment of the Mutual program, and His Dogship has raised a bad case of jealousy. In the affections of the studio folks he has supplanted "Rags," the former pet, and in consequence "Rags" goes about daily nursing a most "dogged" grouch.

Francis X. Bushman, leading man with the eastern Essanay stock company, surprised the audience when he appeared in person in one of his own photoplay scenes at Schanze's theater in Baltimore recently.

The studio of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company in Hollywood, Cal., is becoming a veritable arsenal on account of the preparations now going on for the producing of the big civil war scenes which are an important part of "The Warrens of Virginia," in which Blanche Sweet is to make her stellar debut under Lasky management.

"It beats everything how hard it is to find angels!" ejactulated Perry Banks, Mr. Cooley's assistant, the other day, while he was on the track of a gliding spirit to lead the hard-hearted millionaire up to heaven and back in the course of "The Spirit of Giving." Even after the angel was found, it took some time to grow the particular style of wings conceived to be fitting according to Mr. Cooley's conception of angels, but Mr. Banks is long on patience, so the right adjustment finally came about.

Raymond K. Schrock of the eastern Universal scenario staff is working on a new series of detective stories, title, "The Strange Exploits of Xavier Queer." The first exploit is "The Mystery of the Man Who Slept," to be followed by "The Jade Diadem." Ben Wilson will play the role of Xavier Queer.

The first time in the history of motion pictures a delegation called on a producer last week and petitioned for more pictures. The producer was Thomas H. Ince, whose plays have caused many a sensation in the Mutual program. The delegation was composed of prominent Japanese who live in Southern California.

David Kline, a well-known showman, is now connected with the Pittsburgh office of the World Film Corporation in the capacity of road man.

The next four-reel subject to be produced by Harry Pollard at the American studios is "Infatuation." It has been chosen because it gives some excellent opportunities for fine photography and also for the reason that it provides two really great parts, one for Margarita Fischer and one for Harry Pollard, who will direct the production, as usual.

Marguerite Snow, playing the title role in "Zudora," made twenty-five dolls this year, to be given away as Christmas presents and prizes in doll pageants throughout the country for the benefit of the poor. This is an annual hobby in which Miss Snow finds great delight. This year Miss Snow centered her doll-making efforts on a "Zudora" doll, the complete outfit on the doll being identical to the costume worn by Miss Snow in the opening episode of Thanhouser's big serial.

Actors are occasionally called upon to be heroes in real life as well as in reel life. Richard Stanton's recent leap from behind the wheel, across a friend's feet to the running board of his touring car—a leap which kept the car from overturning and probably saved the lives of the seven people in it—is a case in point. This was real life. In reel life Mr. Stanton, star of the Inceville forces, has done equally heroic things for the enjoyment of patrons of the Mutual program.

Joe Roach is busy writing the script from the well-known musical comedy entitled "The Yankee Consul," by Hy Blossom, which will be produced by Essanay.

There are over sixty actors and actresses, chosen with special regard for the requirements of the story to be told on the film, who will appear in the initial installment of "Runaway June," the novel written especially for the Reliance Motion Picture Company by George Randolph Chester. The scenario, on which the fifteen-installment photoplay of "Runaway June" is based, is by Marc Edmund Jones, and Oscar Eagle is the director who has been selected to make the production.

The following were visitors in the Chicago office of the World Film Corporation during the week just ended: Owen McKivett, Bijou theater, Racine, Wis.; Fred Woodyatt, proprietor and manager Bio theater, Moline, Ill.; Mr. Burford, Aurora theater, Aurora, Ill.; Mr. W. Each, Princess theater, La Porte, Ind.; R. S. Hopper, Lyric and Alhambra, Freeport, Ill.; S. M. Cohodas, Grand theater, Oconto Falls, Wis.

Inceville has been made a postoffice, and now, by virtue of that recognition from the capital at Washington, has been placed on the map officially. A city government soon will be organized to handle the workings of this motion picture town where Thomas H. Ince has made so many reels for use in the Mutual program.

Secretary of the Interior Franklin K. Lane has gone into pictures. The genial Californian who presides over the vast public domain of the nation posed for the camera last week. The picture so taken will serve as an introduction to the educational Yellowstone pictures soon to be produced by Thanhouser Film Corporation.

Wallace Beery, the "Sweedie" of Essanay's comedy company, made a lightning jump into the leading part in a dramatic production on the speaking stage Sunday, December 13. In just one hour and fifteen minutes after he had been asked to play the leading role in "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine" at the Imperial theater, Chicago, he had familiarized himself with the seventy-six pages of the manuscript covering his part, to go through with the play. He finished the week in the part, without neglecting his screen work.

The United Film Service has established a branch office in Toledo, O. The new exchange is located at 413 Summit street, and is in charge of Bert Diener.

Myrtle Stedman of the Bosworth, Inc., believes in being comfortable and in having pleasant surroundings, even in the studio. Her dressing room is all fussed up with pretty furnishings and the walls are covered with photographs and pictures. The floor is covered by a rug which must have eaten into a month's earnings, and a gas stove makes the room warm. "The more the comfort the better the work," says Miss Stedman.

Led by Charles Swickward for the Germans, and by Richard Stanton for the Allies, the directors at Inceville are divided in two camps, and the necessity of agreeing with whomever they're rehearsing with is making rare diplomats of the actors and actresses.

Fred Granville, the plucky camera man who went into the Arctic regions for the Sunset Company of San Francisco, is back in Los Angeles.

House Peters, the new Lasky leading man, will make his initial appearance under this management in the production of Belasco's famous drama of the wilds, "The Girl of the Golden West," which is to be released by Jesse Lasky, in association with David Belasco, on January 4.

George A. Beranger, formerly D. W. Griffith's assistant, has now been made a full director, and his first production for the Mutual program will be "The Baby's Ride."

William Garwood of the New York Imp Company is in receipt of a suit which he had forgotten. At the time he took his departure one of the actors at the American was wearing one of Billy's nicest suits and the play was not finished when he went. So Mr. Actor sent it by parcel post and put a rose in the buttonhole to remind Garwood of what he was missing in the shape of flowers in California.

Howell Hansel, director of Thanhouser's success, "The Million Dollar Mystery," has been put in charge of productions at the New Rochelle studios.

A newcomer to the Mutual program is Fanny Midgley, well known in vaudeville. Miss Midgley of late has been much in Hongkong and the Tahitis and her stories of the far East gather interested throngs in her dressing room between rehearsals at Inceville.

George Kleine's "Du Barry," release of which is soon to be announced, not only features Mrs. Leslie Carter, but also Hamilton Revelle, who was identified with the part of De Cosse for many years. "Comte Jean Du Barry" is the work of Campbell Gollan, while "Louis XV, King of France," is handled by Richard Thornton, both of the original cast on the speaking stage.

ROLL OF STATES.

MARYLAND.

The business of the Pickwick Moving Picture Parlor at 312 West Lexington street, Baltimore, has been purchased from the Baltimore Amusement Company, William Fait, president, by I. and J. Levine, the new owners having taken a two-year lease on the property from the owner, Samuel Eisenberg, the new lease to commence next April, upon the expiration of the existing lease, which has been assigned for the remainder of its term by the Amusement Company to the Messrs. Levine.

A moving picture theater costing $100,000 is soon to be erected on the south side of North avenue, between Charles street and Maryland avenue, Baltimore, under an ordinance signed by Mayor Preston granting this right to the Northern Amusement Company. The interior of the building will be egg shaped to enable the entire audience to see the pictures without distortion. There will also be a mezzanine floor, 50x20 feet, where refreshments will be served while the patrons watch the films. The general dimensions of the building will be 65 by 115 feet, with a seating capacity of 1,300. It will be modeled after the West End Cinema theater, in London, and the Strand theater, in New York. The incorporators are Henry W. Webb, president; Theophilus White, William H. Martin, secretary-treasurer; W. F. Constable and Winship Taylor. George R. Webb is largely interested in the enterprise.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

General Program

Pathe Daily News No. 86—PATHE—DECEMBER 16.—This issue contains views of the destruction wrought by the gale at Winthrop, Mass., the pupils at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station in Chicago being drilled, the sailing of the relief ship Maskinenge from Jersey City, N. J., to Belgian war sufferers, and in the war section scenes from Silviri, Turkey; Epernay, France; Nish, Servia; Constantinople and Medina, Turkey and Montreal Canada.

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial—No. 85—SELIG—DECEMBER 21.—In this issue Mayor Rolph of San Francisco speeds the relief ship on its way to Belgium; the children in a New Rochelle, N. Y., outdoor school are shown; views are given of the burning of the Edison plant at West Orange, N. J.; painters are seen at work on the Brooklyn Bridge, which is being repainted; and, in the war section, the two sons and daughter of King Albert of Belgium are shown attending mass in London, also the arrival of the Christmas ship Jason in England.

Pathe Daily News No. 87—PATHE—DECEMBER 21.—One sees in this issue of the weekly the burning of a huge oil tank near Encinitas, Calif., a shipment of Christmas trees arriving at Duluth, Minn., Miss Madeline Preston of Chicago taking her daily plunge in Lake Michigan with the thermometer around the zero mark, a close-up view of Edward Walsh McLean, at five years of age, the country's richest boy, possessing more than $100,000,000, and in the war section are views of the Mexican conflict taken near Tijuana, Calif., and from the European war zone scenes snapped at South End, England; Dixmude, Belgium; Ostend, Belgium; Calais, France; and Groningen, Holland.

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 86—SELIG—DECEMBER 24.—This issue of the weekly contains views of the Rivers and Harbors Congress at the White House at Washington, the raising of the municipal Christmas tree in Madison Square Park, New York, the wreckage of the conflagration which destroyed the new West Brighton ship yards on Staten Island and, in the war section, views of shipments of horses being prepared for Europe, together with interesting scenes of the British field kitchens near Arras, France, showing how the food is prepared for the men on the firing line.

The House of Silence—BIOGRAPH—DECEMBER 28.—The girl bids farewell to Dr. Mason, her former sweetheart, and marries the newcomer from the city, who, on account of occasional meetings between his wife and her former sweetheart, becomes insanely jealous, and vows that he will never speak to his wife again. He keeps his word, and when their child is born the little one cannot speak, and their abode becomes a house of silence. Embittered by the realization that his child cannot speak, the husband drives his wife away and, visiting a state institution to study the methods of treating the dumb, she meets Dr. Mason, who performs an operation which permits the little one to speak. Meanwhile the father of the child is on the verge of dementia, through brooding over the past, and when one day the mother visits his cabin and sends the little girl to him the distracted man hears the child call "Daddy," and in the joy of that moment reconciliation follows with his wife.

It is our aim to make this department as complete as possible, although to do this, we must have the co-operation of all the manufacturers of film in the United States. If brief stories of the films you are releasing this week are not contained in this department, it must be due to the fact that you have not supplied us with synopsis sheets. In that case please see that we are advised of your film titles and release dates, and furnished with a brief synopsis of the story. This department is intended for every film manufacturer, whether he uses our advertising pages or not.

The Calico Cat—EDISON—DECEMBER 28.—Here is a comedy drama that affords unbounded merriment and still does not detract from the punch in its serious side. It is from the novelette by Charles M. Thompson, and features William Wadsworth in the role of Deacon Peaslee.

Sweedie Collects for Charity—ESSANAY—DECEMBER 28.—When Mrs. Goodheart, a charity worker, returns home very much discouraged on account of her small collections, Sweedie, the cook, sets out to see what she can do. On account of her strenuous efforts, robbing beggars, blackmailing automobilists and eventually fighting Mr. Tightwad, a millionaire, she secures a small fortune. Wallace Beery featured. N. G. C.

The Black Sheep — KALEM — (TWO REELS)—DECEMBER 28.—Joe, Dr. Frank Clark's brother, is induced to go west to make a new start in life. Some time later Ruth Sanders moves into the house next door and Frank promptly falls in love with her. A year later Joe returns home and his brother quickly discovers that Joe has fallen in love with Ruth. Then comes the discovery that Joe must never marry. The news drives the boy frantic and in an adjoining room his mother overhears all that passes between the two boys. When Joe goes to see Ruth next day, the girl shrinks from him in horror, and thinking his brother has betrayed him, he returns home and attacks him. The mother enters and confesses that it was she who told Ruth. Joe rushes from the room and a moment later Frank and his mother hear a shot. Months later Ruth discovers that it is Frank whom she really loves. Tom Moore and Marguerite Courtot featured.

Patsy at School—(EPISODE 1 OF THE PATSY BOLIVAR SERIES)—LUBIN—DECEMBER 28.—Patsy Bolivar, a victim of hard luck, has endless troubles at home and in school, being made the goat at home for mistakes of the servants and blamed for numerous offenses committed by his hoodoo, known as "Sykesy." Sent to deliver a letter offering marriage to Mary Clare, his school mistress, by Jack Prince, a summer boarder, Patsy gives the letter to "Sykesy," who, imagining himself in love with Mary, alters one word in the epistle that changes its whole sense. Patsy is sent supperless to bed for this deed, though he is comforted by the fact that he has one friend in Jane Sykes, sister of "Sykesy," though he much prefers Tillie Grace, who is also loved by "Sykesy." Clarence Jay Elmer featured.

The Flower of Faith—SELIG—(TWO REELS)—DECEMBER 28.—Rose, a country girl, goes to the city to seek her fortune. Her devotion to roses leads her through many trying experiences, but finally unites her to her country lover, who has become a millionaire. This subject was reviewed on page 885 of the December 26 issue, under the incorrect title of "The Flower of Fate."

The Product—VITAGRAPH — DECEMBER 28.—A strong temperance story in which Maurice Costello is featured. John Strong, owner of a large distillery, himself indulges to excess in the product of his manufactory, much to his wife's sorrow. When Slattery, a habitual drunkard, is about to attack Mrs. Strong, the husband interferes, and would call the police, but a bottle of whisky which has fallen from Slattery's pocket bears the label of the Strong distillery, and his wife, realizing that he is only "a product" of her husband's business, intercedes for him. Twelve years later Slattery who has becomes a trusted servant in the Strong home and a close friend of little Helen, the daughter, finds occasion more than once to interfere between Strong and his wife when the former continues his drinking. Driven to desperation, Mrs. Strong visits the distillery and herself begins to drink. The husband, horrified, struggles to take the bottle from her, and in doing so, papers and furniture are knocked into the fireplace and the distillery burns to the ground. Strong permits it to be utterly destroyed and then seeks peace and happiness on a quiet farm.

The Crimson Moth—BIOGRAPH—(TWO REELS)—DECEMBER 29.—The head of the Huntington family discovers his son and heir, Jeffrey, is ill and sends him south. Jeffrey's cousin, Robert Huntington, betrothed to Ann Morton, a nurse, is invited to stay at the Huntington home while Jeffrey is away and, surrounded by wealth, is obsessed with the idea that all this wealth would be his were anything to happen to Jeffrey. He accordingly breaks off his engagement with Ann, and Jeffrey, on his way home, meets, falls in love with and marries Ann. When he brings her home, Robert is naturally embarrassed and Jeffrey becomes suspicious when he discovers Ann sliding a note under Robert's door. The note begs Robert to go away. Jeffrey imagines Ann loves Robert, and learning that according to tradition a crimson moth appears to any one of the family when death approaches, Robert captures a moth and stains its wings with a crimson powder, then releasing the insect in Jeffrey's room. Ann captures the insect and shows Jeffrey, who is terrified, that the moth has been stained. While the two are talking, a cry is heard at the window, and Robert, who has climbed a trellis to reach Jeffrey's room, falls to his death.

The Lesson of the Flames—Edison—December 29.—Some startling and realistic fire scenes play an important part in the sixth release of the "Olive's Opportunities" series. The picture is a little drama in itself, wholly independent of what has gone before or will come after. Mabel Trunnelle and Edward Earle preserve the serial thread of the story, and Ethel Lawrence, William Betchel, Charles Sutton, and Mathilde Baring are the principals in the remainder of the cast. Olive obtains work in the artificial flower concern of Park & Company, in which Vance Coleman is a large stockholder. It proves to be a typical sweatshop, and Olive reports its condition to Vance in an anonymous letter. He orders new fire escapes and hose lines put in, but Mr. Parks deceives him by having the old ones repainted. A fire breaks out, and Vance rescues Olive from the flames at great risk to himself. Mr. Parks receives "the lesson of the flames" in the death of his little boy who was imprisoned in the office. C.R.C.

The Way of the Woman—Essanay—December 29.—This is the picture in which appears Miss Irene Hough, selected by popular vote as the most beautiful telephone operator in America, in the role of the telephone girl. The story is of Arnold Cummins, a millionaire, who tells his wife he is about to leave her for another woman. Mrs. Cummins thinks of their child and trusts the other woman will be merciful. When the little boy calls up his father's office, the switchboard operator switches him on his father's wire and the man's heart is softened. Mrs. Cummins and the boy then visit the home of the other woman and later, when Cummins himself calls, he is told that his affinity is about to wed another man. As a result, Cummins returns home to his wife and child and all are happy once more. N. G. C.

Love, Oil and Grease—Kalem—December 29.—Ham and Bud obtain a job in Ray's garage and that same day Ray quarrels with Hazel, his sweetheart. The girl breaks off the engagement and to prove woman superior to man agrees to show Ray that he is wrong by landing a job as automobile saleswoman. Learning that a certain individual is securing free demonstration rides, Ray takes I. M. Tiny, who requests a demonstration, for this party. After driving him twenty miles into the country, Ray dumps him out and speeds away. Hazel, who has followed them, comes to his rescue and lands Tiny's order for fifteen cars. Meanwhile Ham and Bud go joy-riding and on their return quarrel, oil, grease and bricks being the weapons used. The battle over, Hazel, feeling sorry for Ray, renews her engagement. Marshall Neilan and Ruth Roland featured.

A Cowboy Pastime—Lubin—December 29.—Heine Pretzel and Luke Mutt, anxious to become leaders in the sporting element of Hamville, visit a local booze emporium, but Bad Ike, a cowpuncher of the Two Bar X ranch, soon cleans up the town and humbles Heine and Luke. When two Mexican highwaymen capture Luke and Heinie and prepare to lynch them, Ike comes to the rescue and, unaided, disperses the angry mob and saves Luke and Heinie.

Cactus Jake, Heart-Breaker—Selig—December 29.—There is more plot to the story of this production than there has been to any of Tom Mix's plays for some time. The riding of Goldie Colwell and the acting of Mix will attract attention. It is an enjoyable subject and the interest is sustained up to the final scene. Hazel Clark, belle of the ranch, is infatuated with Cactus Jake, a cowboy flirt. Bill, another cowboy, loves Hazel in his quiet way, but she does not notice him. The arrival of a pretty city girl causes Jake to forget Hazel and she determines to avenge herself. She masquerades as a cowboy, this leading to many comical difficulties, and is at last discovered. To her surprise, she then learns that the pretty city girl is really a female detective and that she has been hired by Jake's wife to locate him. The heart-breaker's wife arrives to take him away and Hazel at last realizes that Bill is the one who deserves her love. C. J. C.

The Plot—Vitagraph—(Two Reels)—December 29.—Sent to interview Ambassador Kasso of Russia, Roy Burton, a reporter, meets and falls in love with Vera Kasso, daughter of the ambassador. A band of Russian conspirators led by Alexis and his assistants, Paul and Michael, the latter a butler in Kasso's household, succeed in capturing Burton, and Alexis hypnotizes the reporter and sends him with a bomb to blow up the Kasso home. As he is on the point of carrying out his deed, Vera seizes his arm and prevents the death of her father. The conspirators are all captured and the love of Vera overcomes the hypnotic spell cast over Burton. Maurice Costello and Estelle Mardo featured.

The Courtship of the Cooks—Edison—December 30.—Arthur Housman, William Wadsworth, and Jesse Stevens combine in making this a successful farce. Widow O'Hara is courted by two cooks, but refuses both of them because they have no money. The cooks continue their courtship, however, until the supposedly dead husband, Mike O'Hara, turns up very much alive, and persuades them to desist by rapping them on the head with his policeman's club. Mrs. O'Hara is overjoyed at finding her long lost husband, and they return home together leaving two disappointed cooks behind them. C.R.C.

Two Dinky Little Dramas of a Non-Serious Kind—Essanay—December 30.—Two short George Ade fables, but both are splendid. In "The Fable of Another Side-track and the Fatal Album" we learn that a lover may be frightened away by seeing a portrait of his sweetheart's mother as she looked thirty years ago, and straightway fears that his sweetheart, thirty years from now, will look the same and flees in terror. Moral: Cut out the Album Stuff. The other fable tells of two brothers both doctors. One became "Doc" Smith, while the other became J. Edgar Smythe, a specialist, and though "Doc" did the most good in the world, J. Edgar got the coin. Moral: Some people still insist that it pays to be on the square. N.G.C.

The Derelict—Kalem—(Two Reels)—December 30.—Foster Gladwin, infatuated with Mrs. Clinton, his partner's wife, leads Clinton to use a headache medicine containing a drug and a few weeks later Clinton has become a slave to drugs. Mrs. Clinton, in desperation, takes her child and returns to her parents. Clinton receives another blow when Gladwin dissolves the partnership and, as time passes, becomes a human derelict. Finally, however, he determines to renew the struggle for manhood and after kidnaping his daughter, in the belief that her love will give him additional strength, Clinton manages to overcome his desire for the drug and work himself up in the world. Gladwin, seeing Mrs. Clinton frantic over the loss of her daughter, is stricken with remorse and sets forth to find the daughter and the man he has wronged. Eventually husband and wife are reunited and the man, now in vigorous health, regains his former position in the world. Douglas Gerrard and Marin Sais featured.

The Intriguers—Lubin—(Two Reels)—December 30.—Viola Vincent and Winthrop Hagen are society parasites. Hagen's passion being jewels and Viola's blackmailing. Attending a week-end party at Senator Royerson's, Viola makes love to Henry Blackstone, who is in love with Helen Royerson. Hagen is also loved by Helen, but becomes jealous of Viola's attentions to Henry.

Viola writes Henry concerning certain jewels he has promised her, and when he goes to meet her he encounters Helen, and Viola, piqued, visits his room to secure papers in his possession. Meanwhile Hagen robs the safe of jewels and, discovering Henry's pocketbook near the safe, leaves it to throw suspicion on Henry. Viola, in Henry's room, is dismissed, and as she departs is seen by Helen, who has found Henry's wallet downstairs, and after the discovery of the robbery thinks both Henry and Viola implicated. Henry denies the robbery, but when Helen tells of finding his wallet and Viola admits writing the note concerning the jewels, Henry is considered guilty and Senator Royerson has him dismissed. Viola rights matters by squaring Henry with his chief, and Hagen confesses his part in the robbery when set upon by Henry. The senator explains all to his guests and Henry and Helen readjust their affair. Florence Hackett, Earl Metcalf, Edgar Jones and Ormi Hawley featured.

The Old Letter—SELIG—DECEMBER 30.—The acting of Bessie Eyton, Harry Lonsdale and Roy Watson is the most valuable asset of this production. The settings and photography are pleasing and these three things, coupled with an interesting, though not very new, plot, make the offering one that is easily worth a place on any program. A city detective is engaged to a girl, who decides she does not love him. He writes her a letter saying he is sorry, and when she marries a reporter, later, she still keeps the letter. One day the reporter brings the detective home to dinner, but the girl and he pretend not to notice each other. Later the reporter finds the old letter and accuses his wife and the detective. The next day another reporter steals some money from the safe at the police station and the girl's husband is accused. The detective forms a scheme to try the real thief, and, with the aid of the girl, who poses as a female crook, secures the evidence he desires and clears his reporter friend. He then explains to the reporter that he no longer loves the girl and passes from their lives forever. C. J. C.

Forcing Dad's Consent—VITAGRAPH—DECEMBER 30.—Constance and Billy are sweethearts, though Billy is not a favorite with Mr. and Mrs. Boggs, who are prim folks much interested in the heathen in foreign lands. Boggs orders Billy from the house when a race track badge happens to drop from his pocket, and Billy sees no hope, until, a week later, he encounters Boggs at a cabaret, and with surprise sees the old gentleman much infatuated with one of the dancers. Billy disguises himself in women's clothing and Boggs immediately falls in love with the "fair charmer." Billy gets Boggs to give him his gold cigar cutter and plants a kiss on the top of his bald head, leaving an imprint of the rouge there. Next day when Billy himself returns the cigar cutter and threatens to expose Boggs, the latter consents to Billy's marriage with Constance. Lee Beggs and Billy Quirk featured.

Two Stray Souls—BIOGRAPH—DECEMBER 31.—Discharged from a reform school, the girl is taken in by an old farmer and his wife, who adopt her. A young man released from prison is led by fate to the same farm and the two stray souls are united in marriage after a short acquaintance. In time a ghost from the past appears in the person of an escaped convict, who recognizes in the man his former cell mate. When he threatens to disclose the past, the man takes money from his little fund to bribe him to depart, but the wife, seeing something wrong, reveals the story of her own past, and confession for the husband is then easy, the two being drawn closer together than ever. Tired of waiting, the convict departs and disappears forever.

Snakeville's Rising Sons—ESSANAY—DECEMBER 31.—Another of the popular Snakeville stories in which Mustang Pete and Slippery Slim not only quarrel between themselves, but let the warfare extend to their wives and children. However, all are reconciled and lay their troubles to the discovery that the day is Friday the 13th. N.G.C.

Fate and Fugitive—LUBIN—(TWO REELS)—DECEMBER 31.—Arthur Gregson, awakened at midnight by an intruder, turns on the lights and is amazed to discover his double in the room. The man escapes, and the next day Arthur, with Grace, his sweetheart, visits a gypsy fortune teller and as a result of her predictions the sweethearts quarrel. When Grace is called west, Arthur seeks to make up with her, but too late, as she has gone. Returning his engagement ring, Arthur quarrels with the jeweler, and when his double robs the store, is arrested for the robbery. He is convicted, but makes a spectacular escape, and goes west, where he finds that Grace is loved by Tom Jackson, the sheriff. Tom learns of Arthur's past and is about to have him arrested when news arrives that the real crook has been captured. Concealing this knowledge, the sheriff advises Arthur to commit suicide, as he knows his past, but Grace learns the truth in time to prevent the tragedy. L. C. Shumway and Belma Whitman featured.

The Siege of Liege—MINA—DECEMBER 31.—Harry Palmer, the war correspondent and cartoonist, is sent to Belgium to make sketches, and succeeds in purchasing an airship, with which he flies over the scene of action, his flight being replete with comic, as well as thrilling, situations. Arrived at the half ruined fortress of Liege, Mr. Palmer sets up his easel and starts to sketch, but falls asleep and dreams a ludicrous lot of cartoon pictures, being finally awakened by the bite of a mosquito.

Love Will Out—VITAGRAPH—DECEMBER 31.—Gerald believes in "art for art's sake" and Nell, his neighbor, with whom Gerald is in love, believes in "art for bread's sake." Gerald is much disheartened when his statue, "Inspiration," is sent back from the Art Institute marked "unavailable." Nell goes in for commercial subjects and succeeds. Gerald is tempted to assist some thugs who succeed in convincing him that it doesn't pay to live a straight life, but returning to his studio, his statute of "Inspiration" induces him to change his mind and continue in the right path. Meanwhile, Nell meets a well-known connoisseur, who praises the statue of "Inspiration," and Nell leads him to Gerald, where he purchases the statue at a satisfactory price. Even then Gerald is too bashful to propose to Nell until she displays a card bearing the inscription "Do it now," when she finally becomes his "inspiration" for life.

The Efficiency Squad—BIOGRAPH—JANUARY 1.—The chief of police, walking with his sweetheart, provokes the wrath of a crew of gunmen by stealing part of their lunch as they are setting off for a picnic. The gunmen duck the chief in a pond and when his sweetheart hurries away to get the efficiency squad, the gunmen capture her. Eventually, after an exciting chase, the gunmen are rounded up by the squad and given a ducking themselves. On the same reel is:

Diogenes Weekly—No. 4-11-44—BIOGRAPH—JANUARY 1.—Another burlesque on the topical weeklies, in which Diogenes gives views of Somhow, the world's champion strong man; T. Stymie Bunker, the golf expert at Quadolopolis, Ohio; the Spitzbergen, Nowhere, dog show, with the prize winning Australian tripe hounds owned by the Baroness Wursenthat; Doctor I. M. A. Cutter operating for water on the bean; and the unveiling of the statue of Charles Concrete, inventor of papier mache pies.

The Shanty at Trembling Hill—ESSANAY—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 1.—A splendidly produced story of the Northwest. Richard Scott, who goes there on account of ill health, meets and falls in love with Gabrielle Boileau. Through the interference of a friend, Gabrielle and her parents think Scott insincere, since he appears to be engaged to another, but eventually he proves his real interest in Gabrielle and all ends happily. Francis X. Bushman and Nellie R. Craig featured. See review on page 879, issue of December 26. N. G. C.

A Clean Slate—Lubin—January 1.—Raymond Speery, tired of his wife, Priscilla, flirts with Azamora, a famous dancer, and when he buys a bracelet for the dancer it falls into his wife's hands, and through the jeweler's clerk, who pities the wife, Priscilla meets the jeweler's sister, who is the dancer's dressmaker. Sent with a wrap to Azamora, Priscilla is present in the dancer's dressing room when her husband calls. When the dancer learns Priscilla has a faithless sweetheart she asserts that men are worthless anyhow, and offers to prove it by fooling Raymond, who wants her to elope. Concealed behind a screen, the wife hears the dancer promise to sail with her husband for Europe next day, and after his departure the dancer laughs and says she will spend the day in the country with her children. Next day, Raymond, finding no Azamora at the steamer, returns home and at the breakfast table gets back the bracelet and a note from the danger. Raymond knows his wife knows and pleads forgiveness, and the two begin life anew. William Cohill, Lilie Leslie and Justina Huff featured.

Wipe Your Feet—Selig—January 1.—During the taking of the majority of exterior scenes in this production the effect of a rain storm is carried, and this is splendidly done. One of the funniest incidents is the fall of Sid Smith, who takes one of the leads, on a slippery sidewalk. It is a good comedy from the first to the last scenes. Michael and Bridget Clancy and their pretty daughter, Maggie, live a life of combat owing to Mrs. Clancy's insistence that they shall wipe their feet clean. Terry Ragen and Paddy Dillon are in love with Maggie, but Terry is given the inside track by Mr. and Mrs. Clancy. Michael gets into all sorts of trouble because of his inability to keep the mud off his shoes, as he works in a sewer excavation. Paddy has been disqualified in the race for Maggie's hand, but wins the good graces of Michael by helping him scrub the floor. Paddy covers the floor with soapsuds, whereupon everyone who enters the room slides and skates about. Thus Paddy wins out and marries Maggie. C. J. C.

Auntie's Portrait—Vitagraph—January 1.—Mr. and Mrs. Honeypet receive a promise of a gift from their Aunt Flora, who is very wealthy, and upon opening the package, discover it contains a beautiful chromo portrait of Aunt Flora herself. Very much disappointed, they hide the portrait in the attic and a day or two later are amazed to have Aunt Flora call. While Mrs. Honeypet is entertaining her in the parlor, Honeypet goes to the attic for the picture, but has a strenuous time and many adventures, since Flora insists on visiting all the rooms in the house. Finally Honeypet takes the portrait to the picture framer's, and in his absence Flora quarrels with the cook and is about to leave. As she goes out, she meets Honeypet returning with the picture, and later the cook praises the portrait so highly that peace is finally restored, and it's evident the future comfort of the Honeypets is assured. Sidney Drew and Ethel Lee featured. On the same reel is an educational, 180 feet in length, entitled "Rattlesnakes."

All for the Boy—Biograph—January 2.—The broker discovers that his son, engaged to marry a nice girl, is trying to free himself from an entanglement with an adventuress. After an unsuccessful attempt to buy the woman off, she threatens to interfere at the wedding, and the broker, in desperation, traps her into visiting a lonely hunting lodge, and there imprisons her. Released, she vows vengeance, and with the aid of a financier, ruins the broker, who only laughs at her, for he has saved his boy.

Uncle Crusty—Edison—January 2.—In Edward Van Nest's peevish disposition many people will find a parallel of their own temperament. He is a nervous man who allows himself to be worried and tormented by the least little thing. One day a little boy comes into his cranky life, and leaves it at the earliest possible moment because his crabbed old uncle will not talk to him, play with him, or even allow him to amuse himself in his boisterous way. The only attention he gets from "Uncle Crusty" is wrapped up in scowls and cross words. Billy runs away, and is found and taken care of by Mildred Burton, a kindergarten teacher. In spite of himself Van Nest yearns for noisy, chattering Billy, and takes up the search for the boy himself. He finds him at the kindergarten and, after a struggle with himself, joins the children in their games and becomes a great favorite. C.R.C.

Broncho Billy and the Escaped Bandit—Essanay—January 2.—A desperate bandit who escapes from a speeding train hides in the loft over Broncho Billy's cabin. Broncho's arms are paralyzed suddenly and he is unable to relax them. The bandit realizes his condition, and tries to rob Broncho's wife and when the bandit is about to strike her with an ax, Broncho, by some miracle, regains the use of his arms and floors the outlaw with a single blow. The sheriff arrives and the bandit is made a prisoner, while Broncho finds that his cure is permanent. G. M. Anderson featured. N.G.C.

He Gave Him a Million—Lubin—January 2.—When Benjamin Batty, a lunatic, who thinks the world owes him a million dollars, escapes and terrifies the town, Jake Piffin, the village dunce, buys a dollar's worth of stage money and leads Batty back to the asylum, pretending it is a bank. On the same reel is:

What He Forgot—Lubin—January 2.—Bill Bailey, on his way to the office, stops to see them take a motion picture, and when the director suggests that he pose, and Bill learns he is expected to kiss the pretty leading woman, Bill jumps at the chance. Bill's wife, Bella, is a movie fiend, and at the theater she sees Bill kissing another woman. She tells her brother, Jack, and her father, and Bill has a lively time as a result. Mae Hotely and Jerold Hevener featured.

Lassoing a Lion—Selig—January 2.—This production, marked by clever acting, tells the story of a jealous husband who sacrificed his feeling against the man he believes his rival in order to save his wife. The stranger comes to his home and is invited to stay. Later he paints a portrait of the wife and the husband suspects. When she falls from a chair on which she has climbed to hang a picture, and the husband finds the stranger supporting her in his arms, he is about to kill him, but orders him away instead. A lion attacks the cabin and the stranger sees the wife's danger. Together the men manage to lasso the beast and save the woman. Matters are then explained to the husband and the stranger leaves with the well wishes of the couple. The lassoing of the lion is cleverly done and is rather unusual for the screen. The handling of the camera's position in the scene showing the lion at large is a clever bit of work. Thomas Santschi, Bessie Eyton, Charles Wheelock and Lafayette McKee have the leading roles. C. J. C.

In the Latin Quarter—Vitagraph—(Two Reels)—January 2.—At a studio tea given by Jean Duval in honor of his bride, Marie, Andrew Lenique, a fellow-artist, presents Marie with an oddly carved dagger. Lenique has entered in a prize competition a beautiful panel, but Duval has made no entry, not being able to find a satisfactory model. Some time later, Manon, a street singer, wanders into the studio and is befriended by Duval. In her the artist finds his long-sought model, and he becomes so absorbed in his prize picture that he neglects Marie. Manon and Lenique fall in love, but Marie, happening to see her faint from weariness in her husband's arms, thinks her husband loves Manon. Insanely jealous, she seizes the dagger to destroy the picture, but finds herself unequal to the task. Lenique enters shortly afterward and, realizing the picture is bound to win the prize, would himself destroy it. Manon springs between him and the picture, receiving the knife blow herself. Lenique flees. Later Manon recovers, explains all to Duval and the two are made happy when Duval's picture wins the prize. Antonio Morino, Edith Storey and S. Rankin Drew featured.

Fatty and Minnie—He Haw—KEYSTONE—DECEMBER 21.—As Fatty, Roscoe Arbuckle breaks all records in this release for honest-to-goodness fun-making. A heartless brakeman pitches Fatty off the train in the middle of nowhere. He is found, exhausted, by a fat squaw who takes him to the Indian village, revives him, and makes him promise to marry her. Fatty escapes, and is trailed by the squaw who finds him making love to an innkeeper's daughter. To escape her Fatty jumps upon the squaw's mustang, and allows it to take its own course. The first thing he knows he is back in the Indian village, and the center of attraction for a yelling mob of Indians. The stout squaw returns in time to save her sweetheart from death at the stake, and nearly breaks his ribs in her loving embrace.

Mutual Weekly No. 104—MUTUAL—DECEMBER 24.—In this issue of the Mutual Weekly one sees the wreck of the New York-Chicago flyer at Bethel, Maine, the destruction of the Edison plant at Orange, N. J., the historic frigate Independence leaving Mare Island navy yard, the San Francisco Screen Club Ball and in the war section the ruins of Penchard, a Zeppelin shed destroyed by shells, and aviator Andre, who is wounded by the enemy.

The White Rose—PRINCESS—DECEMBER 25.—George Bolton, a foolish young fellow fond of high life, decides that Elmwood is too slow for him, and leaves for the city. At the depot Nell Morrison, his sweetheart, bids him good-by and gives him a white rose that she is wearing. Bolton laughingly tosses it away on boarding the train. In the city he runs out of money and obtains a singing and playing engagement in a rathskellar. One night a white rose finds its way into his hand, and revives memories of Nell. Bolton bursts out of the cafe, walks all the way to Elmwood, and arrives at his father's office looking like a tramp. To complete his humiliation, Nell enters and sees him. The father consents to give the boy another chance. And when he pulls from his pocket the much-handled counterpart of Nell's last gift she throws her arms about him, kissing her forgiveness.

Bobby's Medal — RELIANCE—DECEMBER 25.—Bobby, a poor newsboy, reads that the prince and princess of Italy are coming to America. He falls asleep on a curbstone, and dreams that he is present at the boat-landing when the royal personages arrive. A conspirator attempts to throw a bomb at the couple, but Bobby seizes it, and jumps into the water, putting out the fuse. A policeman takes him to the hotel of the distinguished visitors and he is given a royal reception by the prince and princess. Just as the princess is about to kiss him Bobby wakes to find that he is trying to kiss a big, good-natured policeman who is bending over him.

Her Mother's Voice—ROYAL—DECEMBER 26.—A well-to-do Irishman spends an enormous sum of money having his wife's voice cultured, but her audiences do not appreciate her talent, and rain vegetables upon the stage at every performance. Eighteen years later the Irishman's daughter returns from a voice culture school and sings for him. The neighbors think that there is a fire somewhere, pictures on the wall slide out of their frames, and the ironworkers on a nearby building quit work, thinking it is the whistle. The girl's father makes his getaway on a horse, and the singer, in trying to overtake him, is injured and taken to a hospital. Here her talent will out, and the racket causes cripples to leap from the sixth story window to get out of hearing. Finally the fire company squelches the prima donna with the hose.

The Record-Breaker—KOMIC—DECEMBER 27.—At the Corona auto races Nell and Eddie Pullen, the speed king, have a case of love at first sight. Jealous John changes the water and oil cans, and a gambler who also wishes to see Pullen lose changes them back. Eddie wins the race in record time, also the hand of Nell.

The Old Fisherman's Story—MAJESTIC—DECEMBER 27.—An old fisherman's two sons, Ben, a finely developed fellow, and Ned, a hunchback, both fall in love with Mary Cresswood. Ben wins her, and the birth of their baby softens Ned's feelings and brings about a reconciliation between the boys. Shortly afterwards Ben becomes infatuated with a gypsy, and promises to join her camp. To prevent this Ned and his father take him out to sea in a boat, hoping that the gypsies will be gone before their return. A storm springs up, the boat overturns, and Ned is swept away. Ben reaches the point of rock to which Ned is clinging, but is too late to save him. In his last moments Ned makes Ben promise to be faithful to his wife and child.

A Hatful of Trouble—THANHOUSER—DECEMBER 27.—Wendell Wiggins leaves his wife and daughter at the seaside and returns to town for a big time. He meets showily-dressed Effie Linton, and they dine together. Wiggins presents his card to Miss Linton and invites her to call on him. Two young men approach Wiggins' table, greet his companion, and take her away with them. In leaving the cafe Wiggins bumps into a fat man, picks up the other's hat by mistake, and hurries off. The next day Mrs. Wiggins and Dorothy return home, and find Wiggins in bed dressed in evening clothes and holding an umbrella over his head. His stammered explanation is interrupted by the arrival of Miss Linton and the fat man. Wiggins soothes his wife by presenting her with a beautiful new chapeau.

When a Woman Waits—AMERICAN—(TWO REELS)—DECEMBER 28.—Agnes is left in charge of her little sisters and brother when her mother dies, and her sweetheart promises to postpone their marriage until the children grow up. He goes West, where he loses his life in an accident. Agnes sees the children grow up and leave the fold until she alone is left. Still she waits, until at last she learns the fate of her lover. Then she finds happiness in death. A complete review will be found on page 3 of this issue. C.J.C.

Our Mutual Girl—RELIANCE—CHAPTER 50)—DECEMBER 28.—Margaret has the pleasure of visiting May Wilson Preston, one of the most prolific women artists in this country, at her studio, and is entertained with a recital of some of Mrs. Preston's most trying experiences with art editors. One day the artist is called on the 'phone, and asked to supply illustrations for a fiction story that is substituted at the last moment for a war story. After engaging models and starting on the drawings she is called up again by the art editor and told that the fiction story has been dropped, but that she is to make a fat man illustration for a poem. This assignment brings its own troubles with it, and after Mrs. Preston has overcome them the art editor telephones that the poem also has been dropped, but that he wants an illustration in which two young people are seen standing in a loving attitude on a Pullman platform. The two models she engages turn out to be former lovers who have become separated by some little quarrel. By the time that the drawing is finished the couple have made up their difficulty and are sweethearts again.

Love Knows No Law—BEAUTY—DECEMBER 29.—Virginia Kirtley, Joseph Harris and Webster Campbell have the leading roles in this little comedy. The action is all plausible and is amusing most of the time. It is the second release of the reorganized Beauty company. The plot deals with the love affair of a young doctor and a society girl. They meet on the street and, when the girl's maid, Bridget, decides she needs a vacation and "scalds" her foot as an excuse to get to the hospital. they become acquainted. Another doctor also takes a liking to the girl and when he learns that her uncle objects to her marrying his successful rival he is delighted. He "tips off" the uncle when the pair plan to elope, but the girl's lover has uncle captured as a smallpox patient and threatens him with the straight-jacket if he causes disturbance during the marriage ceremony, which is performed at Bridget's bedside in the hospital. C.J.C.

Baby's Ride—MAJESTIC—DECEMBER 29.—A young wife reads of kidnappers in the papers, and becomes alarmed about the safety of her little two-year old child because tramps have been seen frequently in the neighborhood. She places the baby behind a barricade of chairs, but it crawls through, and goes out onto the porch where it rolls itself up in a rug. The carpet cleaner's wagon backs up, takes the rug and starts away. The wagon jolts and the baby falls off still wrapped in the rug. The mother sees a tramp pass, and rushes to see if the baby is safe. Unable to find it, she raises an alarm, and, accompanied by her husband and a policeman, starts out in search of the child. In the meantime the child has met a party of kids marching, and joined them. As the anguished parents are returning home a juvenile parade passes them, and their child shows up at the end of the line.

Lucy's Elopement — Thanhouser — (Two Reels) — December 29. — Lucy Jenkins' father wishes her to marry Henry Watts, a rich neighbor of his own age, but Lucy destests the old man, and she and Jack Winslow elope in an automobile. The angry farmer gives pursuit. The automobile breaks down, and it looks as though Jenkins is to win the day, but the timely approach of a farm wagon proves a blessing to the young couple, who reach the parson's and are married before Jenkins can overtake them.

The Unseen Vengeance—American—December 30.—Presented in a convincing manner by a superb cast, including Vivian Rich, Harry Von Meter, Charlotte Burton and Jack Richardson, this drama could easily have become a two-reel production without padding. It is one of the exceptional style of single-reel productions that are decidedly uncommon at the present time and is vitally interesting from start to finish. John Holland and his wife are happy until he wins fame through his book, "The Unseen Vengeance." The book has been inspired by the story of a Russian girl, whose father has been assassinated by spies.

She afterward becomes famous as an actress and John meets her and becomes infatuated. He forgets love and duty and deserts his wife for Olga. The unseen vengeance pursues him in the guise of remorse, failure, sickness and finally desertion by the woman for whom he has sacrificed everything. His wife, who, by her heroic efforts, has gained success, goes to him for her love has taught her to know him better than he knew himself. C.J.C.

The Face on the Ceiling—Broncho—(Two Reels)—December 30.—Buck Ryan, master crook, conducts a school in which youths are taught how to pick pockets, crack safes, etc. Ryan's daughter, Elsie, a sweet, wholesome girl, grieves deeply over her father's mode of obtaining a living, but her remonstrances are of no avail. A young detective, Dick Wells, is assigned the work of rounding up Ryan and his gang. He makes a few successful raids upon offices and residences in Ryan's district, attracting the crook's attention. Wells joins the gang, and is introduced to Elsie. The couple fall in love at first sight, although each deplores the other's dishonest occupation. Just when Wells is about to trap Ryan and his gang "Squint" McGowan returns from Sing Sing, and recognizes in Wells the detective who sent him to prison. Dick is made a prisoner by Ryan, and is sentenced to be asphyxiated, but is saved by Elsie. The master crook reads an account of his daughter's marriage to Dick, and goes to their flat with the intention of killing them, but his coat catches in the trap door on the roof as he is lowering himself through it, and he hangs suspended until dead.

The Message—Reliance—December 30.—Mrs. Carter's influence over her husband is his only weapon in fighting off the craving for drink. He accuses her of meeting another man—really her outcast brother, whom she is ashamed to acknowledge—and they separate. Steve, the brother, is also a victim of drink. While in search of liquor he meets Carter and is invited to share his whiskey. Steve absent-mindedly pulls from his pocket a religious tract which he has received from an evangelist, and he and Carter ponder over it. Later he persuades his sister to return to her husband, and is about to slip away without revealing his identity when Carter insists upon his remaining. He learns of the relationship between the derelict and his wife, and realizes how he has wronged her. Steve is made a member of the family, and, with Mrs. Carter's help, he and Carter succeed in curing themselves of their common weakness.

The Flower in the Desert—Domino—(Two Reels)—December 31.—By one of the strange rulings of destiny Bill Waldron and his wife, Flora, both of whom are mentally and morally weak, are blessed with a baby daughter whose virtues are untainted by her parents' faults. The mother deserts her husband and child, and soon afterwards dies of drink. One day Waldron takes an overdose of cocaine, and little Violet wanders out into the streets. She is picked up by the wife of a rich lawyer and adopted. Although surrounded with luxury and love Violet yearns for her father, and finally goes away in search of him. One of the members of her father's band finds her in the slums, and takes her to the den, figuring that she will be worth a rich ransom. Here Violet discovers her father. The police raid the building, it catches afire, and the crooks desert Waldron who is wounded. The lawyer reaches the building, learns that Violet is inside, and rescues her. Waldron dies, and Violet surrenders herself to her foster parents.

The Deadly Spark—Kay-Bee—(Two Reels)—January 1.—John Peters wishes his daughter, Jane, to marry his partner, Ralph Miller, and disinherits her when she runs off and marries Edward Marsden. Jane regrets her rashness soon afterward, when she discovers that her husband is a dishonest card sharp, and is using her as a tool. Marsden's plans to rob Peters' safe are overheard by Jane, and she writes her father an anonymous letter, warning him of the intended robbery. Peters conceives the idea of wiring the safe combination in such a way that anyone placing their hand on the knob would be electrocuted. On the night planned for the robbery Marsden sends Peters a note telling him that his daughter is very ill. Miller volunteers to go for the girl, and Peters remains behind to receive the police and station them where they will be sure to catch the thief in case the wiring experiment should fail. But it does not. Shortly after Marsden's electrocution, Miller returns with Jane and a reconciliation takes place.

When Fate Rebelled—Princess—January 1.—Alice Roland and John Reynolds, the cashier of a large firm, are in love, and one day Alice accompanies him to the country to pay off the employes. The bag containing the money disappears from the auto, and circumstances point to Alice as the thief. Reynolds is discharged on reporting the theft. By some clever work Alice exposes the real thief, clearing her lover's name and proving to him that he had misjudged her.

Shep, the Sentinel — Thanhouser — January 1.—May breaks with her sweetheart, Jack, because she has received a letter from another girl saying that Jack is untrue. Shep, Jack's beautiful collie, is instinctively suspicious of Jim Hallet, and trails him. The dog steals a letter written by Nell Borden, Jim's accomplice, and Jack, reading it, learns of a plot under way. Jim attempts to burglarize May's house, and is discovered and arrested. May now has all the evidence she can desire of her lover's faithfulness.

A Banakie Maiden—Reliance—(Two Reels)—January 2.—When Blue Flower returns from the Indian school at Carlisle she is scornful of the ways of her own people. The chief wishes her to marry a young brave, but she favors Hodges, a prospector. The white man's only interest in the girl is to make it appear that she has brought him the money which he, himself, intends to steal from the chief. He wins Blue Flower's promise to elope with him, and then attempts to steal her father's hoard. The old chief surprises him, and, in the struggle that follows, the latter is killed. The Indian maid learns of the murder, arms herself with a gun, and hurries to keep her appointment with Hodges. She thrusts the gun in the prospector's face, and he, in backing away from it, falls over a high cliff. The young brave then appears, and enfolds Blue Flower in his blanket.

Putting it Over—Royal—January 2.—The Reverend Mr. Goodly sees a saloonkeeper putting a drunkard out of his place, and interferes. The parson's son and the saloon-keeper's pretty daughter finally succeed in restraining their fathers from quarrelling, and later become lovers to the great displeasure of their parents. The couple exchange clothing, and are married by the minister who does not recognize them. The saloon-keeper, who arrives at the end of the ceremony, does, however, and reveals their identity to the Reverend Mr. Goodly. Nothing can be done now about it so the parents give in, and bestow their blessings upon the couple.

Ethel's First Case—KOMIC—JANUARY 3.—This is Chapter 14 of the "Bill" series. Ethel takes luncheon with a new beau, and returns wearing a necklace which one of Mr. Hadley's clients recognizes as being the one that was stolen from her that very morning by her faithless husband. She enlightens Ethel as to the man's character, and they plan to trap him. He rises to the bait, and visits Ethel at the office. Hadley and the wife, watching from the inner office, consider their spooning actions as sufficient evidence on which to base a divorce, and start proceedings at once.

Vengeance is Mine—MAJESTIC—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 3.—Edward Hull wins Mary Lee's affection and goes through a mock marriage with her, partly in jest. Later he receives a letter from his dying father, stating that if he wishes to inherit the family fortune he must return at once, and marry the girl of his parent's choice. He complies, and Mary, after waiting in vain for his return, goes in search of him. Failing to find him, and too proud to return home Mary accepts the attentions of a rich old roué. Several years later she sees Hull in a cafe, consults a lawyer, and they join in a scheme to bleed him of his fortune. After some time she learns that Hull has two children. This gives the matter a different aspect, and she confesses her part in the affair to Hull, telling him that revenge was her only motive.

The Bridal Bouquet—THANHOUSER—JANUARY 3.—Anna Marvin, dressmaker's assistant, is cast off by her lover, Jim Randall, for a stylish-looking girl with whom he has become infatuated. Later Anna is sent to the home of a wealthy family to deliver a bridal gown to the daughter who is going to be married.

As the seamstress enters the hall the bridal bouquet, tossed by the bride from the staircase, falls into the astonished girl's arms. Though it was intended for one of the bridesmaids the bride congratulates Anna and sends her home with the flowers. That evening Randall calls. The sight of the bridal bouquet brings him to realize how cruel he has been to neglect her for the other girl, and he persuades Anna to marry him that very night.

Universal Program

Animated Weekly No. 146—UNIVERSAL DECEMBER 23.—The war section of this weekly contains views taken near Epsom, England, at Constantinople, Turkey, a close-up view of the cruiser Leipzig, recently sunk by the English squadron, while the general news section shows the opening of the new $12,000,000 dock at St. John, Canada, up-to-the-minute styles in women's wear as displayed at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York City, the opening of the John Jay playground in New York, and the national cross country championship recently run at Van Courtlandt Park New York; the film closes with cartoons by the famous Hy Mayer, editor of Puck.

For the Defense—ECLAIR—DECEMBER 27.—Jim Barter, expelled from college for misconduct, is banished from home by his father, and ten years later is a tramp. Mary, a good-hearted waitress, notices the hungry look in the haggard face pressed against the window, brings the man in and feeds him. Her confidence in him lends Jim added strength to fight off his weakness, and he reforms. Later he shoots a Mexican in self-defense, is arrested, and held for trial. Mary, the chief witness, tells of Jim's great reform, and the story of his past life to illustrate that he is all right at heart, but has been defeated by circumstances. At this point the prosecuting attorney rises unsteadily and exclaims, "My God! my own son." The jury returns a verdict of "not guilty," and Jim and his father leave the courtroom with a better understanding of life and each other.

The Submarine Spy — IMP — (TWO REELS)—DECEMBER 28.—Billy's ultimatum from Captain Graham is that he cannot marry Ethel until he has earned promotion. Bardoni, a foreign spy, is shown the new submarine in which Captain Graham is soon to make a test, and, on being shown the emergency valve upon which the raising of the boat depends secretly removes it. When Captain Graham and his men make the descent they discover that the emergency valve has been removed, and that they cannot raise the submarine. Billy volunteers to be shot through the torpedo tube, and is successful in making his way to the surface. With the boatload of sailors, the windlass, and a diver that he brings back, the work of raising the submerged boat takes but a short time. For his gallantry Billy is promoted, and wins Ethel's hand.

The Chef's Revenge—STERLING—DECEMBER 28.—With a crowd of hungry people waiting his arrival the chief chef walks serenely into the restaurant, and chats lightly with the cashier, drawing off his kid gloves meanwhile. Mr. Millions, a grouchy millionaire, enters, and in an effort to please him the proprietor has the chef handle his case separately. Unfortunately for all, the millionaire finds fault with everything, causing an awful row that ends with the chef's planting a bomb in the boiler and blowing himself and more than half of the kitchen in all directions.

The Virtuoso—VICTOR—DECEMBER 28.—Helga Moran, a young violinist, wishes to play before a great manager and sends her card in to him, but is refused an audience. Later the manager is looking for a certain type of man to play the lead in one of his productions, and is pestered by about every man out of work. As he is storming about his office a girl enters, and, paying no attention to his command to leave, plays her violin for him. He is enchanted, and throws himself at the girl's feet. Enraged to think that her talent should have this effect on any one Helga breaks her violin over his head and leaves.

The Fat Girl's Romance—CRYSTAL—DECEMBER 29.—Squire Longlegs wields his mortgage on Farmer Jones for the purpose of having the latter compel his fat and fickle daughter, Hazel, to marry him. The girl promises but forgets all about him when she meets Sir Charles De High Ball. They elope, and are "married" by a tramp who is masquerading in the stolen clothes of a minister. The jealous squire tells Charles' mother about her son's actions, and she breaks up the couple's happy home. Sir Charles warned by wireless telegraphy that Hazel is being persecuted by her angry father, goes to her aid. The squire and a real minister enter, expose the couple's fake marriage, and the affair ends happily by the parson's marrying them again.

A Study in Scarlet—GOLD SEAL—(TWO REELS)—DECEMBER 29.—This detective story marks Sherlock Holmes' debut into motion pictures. Holmes and his friend, Dr. Watson, receive an invitation from Mr. Gregson of Scotland Yard to assist in unraveling a murder mystery. Holmes makes a careful study of the case and as a result of his ingenious deductions rounds up the murderer, one Jefferson Hope, a cabman. The man confesses his guilt and tells his life story in which he reveals his motive for committing the crime. Hope dies before the case comes to trial, the fulfilling of his oath of vengeance having taken the object of living out of his life.

When It's One of Our Own—Nestor—December 29.—Heinrich Gerhardt, a talented German musician, arrives in this country with high hopes, but is finally compelled to take a position in a restaurant as a waiter in order to support himself and his daughter, Marie. The girl, however, knows nothing of her father's real position, thinking him in some orchestra. She obtains an engagement with a musical comedy company, and one night is a member of a supper party. At the restaurant she is brought face to face with her father and a dramatic scene ensues, ending in the man's being discharged and leaving for home accompanied by his daughter. The next morning Gerhardt receives a cablegram from the manage of the opera company in Berlin in which he was formerly employed, offering him his old position. He accepts and, with his daughter, returns to Germany.

Within an Inch of His Life—Eclair—(Two Reels)—December 30.—Dan Henley is arrested for the murder of the foreman of the "Tumble T" ranch on the strength of the fact that he and the foreman were both courting the same girl, combined wit a few details furnished by Searchlight Wilson, a "bad" man. In the sheriff's absence, Wilson and his followers attempt to lynch Dan, but are foiled by a few of the fellow's friends, one of whom is a snake-charmer and throws one of the reptiles into the lynching crowd, dispersing them. It turns out that Searchlight Wilson is the real murderer of the foreman instead of Dan. Wilson makes his escape from town, but Wildcat Thompson, one of Dan's friends, overtakes him and kills him in a hot pistol fight.

The Village Postmaster—Joker—December 30.—Through the influence of his son-in-law, Congressman Nolan, Lyman Granite obtains the appointment of village postmaster. He takes over pretty nearly all of his rival's business until the beginning of the parcel post service. The volume of this business becomes so great that Granite is forced to neglect his customers to handle the mail department. Toby, the rival, rejoices at this. The congressman receives an appealing letter from his father-in-law, and pays him a visit. When he sees the state of affairs he relieves Granite of the post office obligation, and saddles Toby with it, putting the rival grocer out of the running.

Winning a Prize—Imp—December 31.—To advertise his summer resort, Silas Brown offers the sum of $100 to the person catching the largest fish during the season. Charles Morton visits the resort to compete for the prize, but is so patronized by the other guests that he has his valet send him a letter stating that his entire fortune has been lost. The plan works, and he establishes himself in a tent in the woods. Brown's daughter pities him, and sends him a basket of food. They fall in love, and Morton allows his valet to return his fortune by mail, just as it left him.

Hounded—Rex—(Two Reels)—December 31.—Mary Bolland, while doing criminal reform work, becomes interested in Jim Nolan, who is doing time for robbing her father's bank. After his release Jim falls in love with Mary, who has helped him secure a position, and later they become married. Angered by this Bolland disowns his daughter. Later he regrets it and attempts to win her away from Jim. Failing in this he hounds Jim continually. Driven to the wall, Jim puts up a hard fight, but finally listens to his old partner, Mart's, proposal to rob Bolland's bank, and joins him. One of their accomplices is arrested, and, turning state's evidence, causes the arrest and conviction of Jim and Mart. During Jim's imprisonment Mary and the baby die, and the convict becomes a hopeless degenerate. He escapes one night to wreak vengeance on Newman, the man who turned state's evidence, but his uplifted arm is stayed by the sight of the man's wife and child. The dagger falls from his hand and he steals from the house and returns to prison.

Pruning the Movies—Nestor—January 1.—Major Bughouser, thinking that he ought to censor the movies, appoints a board of censors and visits the projection room of a film company. They slice up a drama until it becomes a mere jumble of scenes to a person who has seen the picture run off as it was originally produced. The picture had already met with the National Board of Censor's approval before the gallant major got busy with the scissors, but the knowledge of the fact did not intimidate him in the least. Instead, he orders the National Board to be cut, and shows how he would like the cutting to be done. The last scene shows the major filling up on his usual and favorite food—a large dish of prunes. On the same reel are educational views of Mt. St. Bernard.

The Beautiful Unknown—Victor—(Three Reels)—January 1.—The wild, reckless young Prince Ferdinand's ways cause his mother and the Prime Minister great uneasiness. Thinking to find a suitable mate for him they hold a ball in the prince's honor and invite King Bosnia and his three daughters to attend. The prince disappears after the introduction and one of the princesses, Yona, learning that he has gone to the opera house to see the ballet dancers, the next night obtains permission from the manager to dance on the stage under the name of the Beautiful Unknown. The prince is infatuated with her beauty and grace, but she refuses to see him when he calls at her dressing room. The prince commands her to dance the next day at the fete at the royal palace. This time the prince, unable to restrain himself, rushes up to the dancer, unveils her, and recognizes the Princess of Bosnia. The Prime Minister and Prince Ferdinand's mother are overjoyed to find that he has fallen in love with the girl of their choice.

In Jungle Wilds—101 Bison—(Two Reels)—January 2.—Ludwig Von Baer, a naturalist, visits his old friend, Franz Kemper, in Africa, and is presented to his daughter Mary, who has been informed by her father that she is to marry Von Baer. The girl, however, is in love with her father's hired man, John Durke. When the naturalist learns of their love affair he leaves, continuing on his way into the jungle. Five years later he returns and, hearing of Mary's marriage to Durke, pays the couple a visit. John's jealousy is aroused by the welcome Von Baer receives from his wife, and a scene results. The naturalist leaves and John, taking his gun, plunges into the jungle. Later, his anger cooled, he returns and finds a note from Mary stating that she and the child are on their way to her father's house. John becomes alarmed on not finding her at the Kemper home and starts out to search for her. Von Baer rescues Mary and the child from a lion and brings them home safely. John apologizes for his rashness, and the story ends happily.

A Mixed-Up Honeymoon—Joker—January 2.—When Henry Peck and his wife leave on an extended trip the neighbor with whom they leave the key to the house rents the place to Hank Perkins and his bride. The honeymooners are interrupted by the return of Mr. and Mrs. Peck, who have had a quarrel and return home separately. Peck's suspicions are aroused when he sees some of Perkins' wearing apparel lying around, and Mrs. Peck is incensed when she discovers a part of Mrs. Perkins' wardrobe. They accuse each other of infidelity and a new quarrel breaks out between them. The wedding certificate and rent receipt of the Perkins' clear them of the charge of burglary when the police arrive, and Peck and his wife, appreciating the humor of the situation, allow the young couple to live with them until they find another place.

The Hermit's Secret—Eclair—January 3.—Dan McGuire's wife, Nellie, is hit by a falling tree and loses her powers of reason. A party of tourists learn the story one day and insist on Dan's placing his wife in an asylum. After the tourists leave Dan departs with Nellie to the outskirts of a distant village, where they live as hermits in a cave in the mountains. On Christmas Eve Dan enters the village store and purchases some dolls and feminine finery. He is taunted by some of the village loafers and almost comes to blows with them. Two of the men follow the mountaineer with the intention of getting even, but on the way they become engaged in a quarrel and one of them is killed. The crime is laid to Dan and he is arrested. While her husband is in jail Nellie is operated upon in the village, and her reason restored. One day in the mountains she finds conclusive evidence as to the real murderer's identity, and, presenting it at Dan's trial, is the means of vindicating him.

Gem and Germs—L-KO—JANUARY 3.—Gem attempts to thrust a son-in-law upon her father, but he objects strenuously. To get even the lovers substitute a harmless mixture for a wonderful discovery that the scientist believes he has made. When the old chemist enters his laboratory accompanied by two scientists who have journeyed from another city to test his new discovery, they find Gem's pet dog serenely drinking the "poison." They exit hurriedly and the dog follows. In the meantime Gem and her sweetheart call on a minister, but he refuses to marry them and takes to flight. They pursue him, overtake him at the lake and compel him to marry them.

The Sin of Olga Brandt—REX—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 3.—To obtain money for an operation on her invalid sister Olga Brandt delivers herself to her employer, Stephen Leslie. Her sister dies a short time later, and Olga, realizing that her sacrifice was futile and hating the life she is leading, wanders disconsolately through the streets. The Rev. John Armstrong finds the girl, takes her home to his mother, and later marries her. A year later a discussion over the showing of "Shall We Forgive Her," a photoplay, brings Olga and Leslie together. John rules that the picture which depicts a girl's struggle to throw off the yoke of her past, is good in that it teaches a strong moral lesson. Viewing the play reforms Leslie, and he begs Olga's forgiveness. Later John learns of his wife's past. The knowledge stuns him, but, on seeing his sorrowing wife on her knees, he forgives her, remembering the last sub-title in the picture, "Judge Not Lest Thou Be Judged."

The Three of Us—ROLFE—(FIVE REELS)—The death of her father leaves Rhy MacChesney in a western gold camp with an apparently useless mine and two brothers on her hands. To add to her troubles one of her brothers, Clem, becomes dissatisfied with the life they are living and wishes to return to their old home in the East. Beresford, a mining expert, learns through Clem that the option of Rhy's lover, Steve Towney, on a valuable claim expires the next day, and bribes a boy to tell him the hiding place of the papers. After Mrs. Bix's dinner he steals away to recover it. Rhy goes to Beresford's cabin at night and is found there by Steve. A fight follows in which the unscrupulous mining expert is beaten to a pulp. Heart-broken at his sweetheart's faithlessness Steve leaves camp. Clem confesses to his sister and he sends him to find Steve, meanwhile setting out to renew the option. She gets to the claim agent just in time and, when she returns, finds Steve waiting for her with open arms.

Alliance

The Last Chance—FAVORITE PLAYERS—(FIVE REELS).—Gordon, soldier of fortune, returns from the fighting in Mexico and is induced by Hilton, an old friend, to meet Alice Egerton and the result is that they fall in love to the chagrin of Reggie, a would-be suitor. Gordon feels that he has no right to marry Alice without money or position and leads an expedition into the interior of Africa to discover a river. He is accompanied by the disappointed Reggie, who at the critical moment persuades Gordon's followers to turn on him and he is beaten and left for dead. Reggie is shortly afterwards slain by natives. Gordon accomplishes his mission and returns to find that his death has been reported and that Alice is engaged to Arbuthnot, a man who thinks more of his politics than he does of Alice. At a social, Gordon tells the story of his sufferings, making the tale appear to be of some friend in order to punish Alice, who is there. Gordon goes to Africa to seek solace in work amongst the natives and is eventually followed by Alice, who is attacked by the natives and rescued by Gordon in the nick of time. They are reunited and together stay to improve conditions amongst the colored people.

Eclectic

The Bomb Boy—PATHE FRERES—(THREE REELS).—A messenger boy is turned down by his girl and about the same time learns of the plot of some nihilists. He saves the life of a grand duke and when he gives the medal he receives to his girl he again wins her favor. A delightful comedy-melodrama featuring Ernest Truex. A complete review will be found on page — of this issue.

Rastus' Rabid Rabbit Hunt—PATHE.—J. R. Bray's animated cartoon comedies are even better than his pictured accounts of the travels of the fearless and indefatigable "Colonel Heeza Liar;" a higher compliment could hardly be paid them. Rastus goes hunting squirrels, but forgets his intention when he spies a shady tree. His slumbers are several times interrupted by the squirrels who run all about him, and turn somersaults on his gun. One of them knocks a hornet's nest down on him from the branch overhead and Rastus departs in a hurry. A bull spies and chases him, and a bear joins in the pursuit. Rastus turns suddenly, shoots both of them with one shell, and also brings down a flock of geese flying within range. It is with a light heart and much game that Rastus takes up the homeward trail. Views of Ging, South Africa, complete the reel. C.R.C.

General Special

Two Women — VITAGRAPH — (THREE REELS).—John Emerson worships his faithless wife and overlooks her many faults. The wife falls in love with his employer and the latter sends John on a trip and then takes the woman riding in his auto. John returns sooner than expected and finds them together. A quarrel follows in which the employer is injured. Six months later John is granted a divorce and when he reads of his wife's marriage to his employer he goes to the north woods to begin life anew. In the forests he meets Anita and at once falls in love with her. He tells her father of his past life and secures the old man's permission to woo the girl. They are soon married and are happy together. In the meantime the employer deserts John's former wife for another woman, whose husband kills both of them. John's divorced wife, now a wealthy widow, returns to New York, where she secures John's address. She then goes into the north woods and pleads with him to return to her. For a short time he is dazzled by her beauty but, when Anita appears, he realizes that it is she whom he loves and sends the other woman back to the city.

Paramount

The Conspiracy—FAMOUS PLAYERS—(FIVE REELS).—An adaptation from the well known play of the same title on the speaking stage, with the original star, John Emerson, in the role of Winthrop Clavering, an eccentric character who is the pivot about which a crime plot revolves. A complete review will be found on page 880 of the issue of December 26.

A Christmas Carol—COSMOFOTOFILM.—Old Scrooge, a miser, growls at the Christmas greetings of his old ill-paid clerk, Bob Cratchit and is disagreeable to all those who offer him compliments of the season. The evening before Christmas Scrooge goes to his scantily furnished apartment. While he gloats over business done during the past year, a vision of his deceased partner appears to him weighed down by the care of business. Exhausted by the experience the miser falls on the bed and sleeps. Presently the ghost of Christmas Past enters and leads Scrooge's spirit from his body and out into the country, where the old miser sees himself as he was when he was a boy. The spirit then leads him to the house of his former employer, where a Christmas dance is going on and again he sees himself as a young man, denying himself the pleasures he should have had. The ghost of Christmas Present then appears and shows him the home of his nephew, where as an old man he is disagreeable and his company is undesirable. Next he is shown visited by the ghost of Christmas Yet-to-Come who shows him his own neglected grave. At this point he awakes and realizes that it was but a dream and that he still has a chance to redeem himself. He busies himself all day Christmas by bringing joy to the poor and on the following day surprises old Cratchit by doubling his salary and taking him into his confidence. The picture ends with a glimpse of a Christmas Yet-to-Come with Scrooge happy and beloved by all seen in the midst of the Cratchit family.

The Two Columbines—Cosmofotofilm—(Two Reels).—Christmas eve brings memories of the past to the theater-cleaner who lives in poor apartments with her little daughter. She recalls how at one time she was the idol of the public, being the Columbine at one of the big theaters. Then one day her ankle was broken during the dance and she was forced to leave the footlights forever. She brushes the recollection aside, kisses her child and sets off for her work at the theater. The present Columbine and her lover complete their performance, but the attention of one of the fellow actors causes Columbine's lover to quarrel with her. He leaves angrily, but on reconsideration decides to wait at the stage door for her. She visits his room to make peace with him and when she finds his costume needs mending, sets herself to the task. The theater-cleaner finds the opera house deserted and a big Christmas tree on the stage. Hurrying home to her daughter, she brings her to the theater. She then dresses in the costume the present Columbine wears during her performance and despite the pain of her ankle again dances as she formerly did, this time for the benefit of her little child. The exertion and excitement, however, proves too much for her and she falls to the floor, dying. The present Columbine finds her just as her lover enters the theater to search for her and the theater-cleaner dies in their arms. The lovers then decide that the little girl shall have a home with them, so her Christmas eve does not prove a barren one, despite her sorrow.

Thanhouser Syndicate

The Perpetual Glare—(Episode Five of Zudora").—Thanhouser—(Two Reels).—Hassam Ali sends Zudora into the country to find a gem which has been lost by two of his conspirators. The conspirators then attempt to take her life with a powerful sun machine. When John Storm seeks to protect her, Hassam Ali mines a hillside and plans to destroy him, but Zudora rescues him. A complete review will be found on page 894 of the December 26 issue.

United—Warners

The Honor of Bill Jackson—Features Ideal—(Two Reels).—Bill Jackson is in love with Betty, but her father objects to the match, favoring instead a young engineer, William Sharp, as the most logical aspirant for his daughter's hand. Jack heartbroken, leaves for South Africa where eventually, Betty, now Mrs. Sharp, and her husband run across him. Jack has been wounded in a stampede of steers and is brought to Sharp's home near the mine of which the engineer is in charge. Later Jack proves his unselfish nature by helping the successful rival quell a revolt at the mine and by riding twenty miles for a doctor when the latter sprains his ankle. When all is quieted down again he rides away into the night, his honor unstained.

Universal Special

The Master Key—(Episode Seven)—Universal—(Two Reels).—After rescuing Ruth from the Chinaman, Dore takes her to the same hotel in which he is stopping in San Francisco and secures a room for her. As he is entering his own room Dore hears Ruth scream, and rushes into her room just in time to see a man crawl out the window onto the fire escape. The chase leads up to the roof of the hotel where Dore overtakes the thief who was employed by Wilkerson to steal the deeds to the Master Key mine. The struggle goes against Dore, but he is saved by the arrival of Tom Kane, who has journeyed to San Francisco to inform Dore of the poor conditions prevailing at the mine. The thief breaks away from his captors, but Dore catches him just as he reaches the edge of the roof and throws him so heavily that the fellow rolls over the edge and falls to his death below. Ruth and Dore search for the deeds, not knowing that the thief threw them down the inner "well" of the hotel. Tom draws Dore aside and tells him that Wilkerson's man, Tubbs, is playing havoc with the mine. The engineer realizes that something must be done at once to prevent Wilkerson from ruining the property through his hirelings.

World

As Ye Sow—Brady—(Five Reels).—Dora, the daughter of a wealthy man, marries a good looking young fellow from the country, who has risen to a commanding position in New York business life. Though she does not know it, he is a worthless fellow and did not even marry under his right name. After their child is born he ill treats her and when she protests he takes the child away. Later he deserts her and goes to sea on a fishing schooner. Time passes and she is informed that her husband has been drowned. She leaves the city and goes to a Massachusetts fishing village which proves to be the birth-place of her husband. She boards at his mother's home and recognizes her own child whom the mother is taking care of. Without knowing it is her husband's brother, she encourages the attentions of the Rev. John St. John. Just as they are about to be married a storm arises at sea and when it is finally quieted a man is washed upon the shore whom Dora recognizes as her husband. The man re-asserts his claim to wife and child and denounces his brother. He leaves the house and goes to the fishing village, where he meets one of his reprobate companions from New York and, in a quarrel between them both are killed. The sinful man has reaped as he has sown but happiness awaits those whose life he has made miserable.

In the Days of the Head Hunters—Seattle—(Six Reels).—To gain power from the spirit forces, Motana, the son of the great chief, goes to a mountain peak, where he builds a prayer-fire and dances about the sacred flames. When he has completed his dance the vision of a maiden appears to him and, because all thought of women must be banished during such occasions, he is forced to undergo even greater hardships to please the spirit. He sets out on the journey, meets Naida, the maid of his dream, and woos her. He learns that she is promised to the hideous sorcerer, but he vows he will win her when his vigil is over. He then renews his quest and in many unique ways proves his courage and skill. Then, for his final invocation to the spirits, he again builds the sacred fire upon the heights. The Sorcerer sees Motana and sends his daughter to him to destroy him. She falls in love with him, but Motana will have nothing to do do with her and she vows vengeance on him. The Sorcerer listens to his daughter and determines to do away with Motana. The brave goes to the village of Naida and asks her father, Waket, for her hand, but the latter, fearing the Sorcerer and his brother, Yaklus, the head hunter, dare not grant the request. Motana, however, convinces him that his tribe does not fear the head hunters and the ceremony is performed after the Sorcerer has been put to death by Motana's tribesmen. Yaklus takes up his brother's vow of vengeance and gathers his forces. They descend upon the village and destroy the majority of those within it, carrying Naida off as a prisoner. The maid is told that if she can dance well enough to please Yaklus her life will be saved. This she does and manages to send word to Motana of her danger. He braves the waters of the surging gorge and carries her to safety. When Yaklus and his tribesmen attempt to follow, the raging waters sweep upon them and the head hunters become the victims of the evil ones of the sea.

A TALE OF LOVE AND HATRED

Written by JAMES OLIVER CURWOOD

This is one of the most exciting frontier dramas ever filmed. It tells the story of a pretty girl whose love of mischief and fondness for flirting causes two men who are rivals for her hand to fight to the death. They are placed on a desert island, each armed with a revolver, and the man she really loves is saved from death by her frenzied efforts. The scenes are laid in the big forests and the types portrayed are typical of frontier days.

Vol. XIII CHICAGO, JANUARY 9, 1915 No. 2

Edwin Arden Featured in "The Eagle's Nest"

BY MABEL CONDON

FEATURES, such as Romaine Fielding has made of the Lubin film, "The Eagle's Nest," are common to no one program, to no one company and certainly, to no one director. It is the direction of the picture in the making that stamps it as individual. "The Eagle's Nest" is the filmed story from the play by Edwin Arden. And in the film Mr. Arden takes the leading role, that of Jack Trail. Mr. Fielding, in addition to directing the picture, portrays the character of Robert Blasedon, and the remainder of the cast is comprised of "types" which Mr. Fielding engaged whenever and wherever he happened to find them.

There is strength and continuity throughout the picture, and realism is an ever present quality. There is no pretense apparent in the fight between Jack Trail and Robert Blasedon, when the latter resents the attention of Trail to the girl who is preferred by both men. But if there is a choice of "punches" to be made, preference must be given to the scenes showing a massacre by the Indians. In these there are convincing close-ups, impressive "far-aways" splendidly focused and offering a mountainous background for the courageous yet doomed emigrants for whom the great West is a fatal one. The massacre explains the orphanage of the story's hero, Jack Trail. The story was filmed in the west, the Garden of the Gods supplying the biggest number of locations.

Throughout the entire picture the "ordinary" is avoided in every instance and splendid photography is as much a part of it as are the bold, natural settings, the humble little home made by Phil Dana, his wife and the orphan, Jack Trail, in the shadow of the eagle's nest, the homely little shack which afforded the comforts of home to the independent Suze, the treacherous descent of a rock cliff by warring Indians and the other details, both big and small, which go toward making "The Eagle's Nest" the "different" film that it is.

The film gets its name from the overhanging nest of a great eagle; and in the shadow of the bird's home the emigrants, Silsbee and his wife, build their cabin and there bring to manhood the child they had found, the only survivor of a massacred party of emigrants. They called the boy Jack Trail. Silsbee dies and Jack and his foster mother continue to make their home in the cozy cabin beneath the eagle's nest. One day a party of three from Sacramento City are given shelter at the Eagle's Nest after their coach has run away and Jack acted as rescuer.

Milford, his daughter Rose and his partner, Robert Blasedon, comprise the party. Blasedon is in love with Rose but his affection is not returned and so, when Jack shows his admiration for the girl, Blasedon becomes angry. He holds a trump card over Rose, he believes, since he has discovered the forgery by Milford of some old papers left in trust with him by Phil. Dana and his wife, when the latter couple, taking their boy with them, had left, twenty years prior, to seek their fortune in the west. No word has ever been received by Milford from the Danas and he does not feel that he is robbing anyone when he forges the name that gives him possession of all the Dana property.

Milford is suddenly called back to Sacramento on business and Blasedon and Rose remain with Mrs. Silsbee and Jack. Milford leaves in Rose's keeping the papers which, if discovered, would prove his forgery. Blasedon tries to force his attentions upon Rose and she seeks Mrs. Silsbee for protection and the latter threatens Blasedon with a rifle. Blasedon scuffles with her, the rifle is discharged and Mrs. Silsbee is killed. Jack appears and attacks Blasedon. Fighting, they gain a precipice and Blasedon throws Jack over it. Blasedon escapes, and when Jack is revived he is with a friend, Disby, who tells him he is sought for as the murderer of his mother.

Rose has disappeared and both Jack and Blasedon start on a respective search for her. Blasedon finds her and forces her to marry him. They return to Sacramento where Jack also arrives. Blasedon believes he has the papers which will win him Milford's approval, but when he examines them, they prove to be blank. Rose had left them in the cabin of Suze, a mountain character, Disbey had appropriated them and replaced them with blanks, and Blasedon, lacking the protection of Rose and Milford, is returned to the west and declared guilty of Mrs. Silsbee's death.

At the Eagle's Nest, Mr. Milford sees the whip Jack's mother had owned. He recognizes it as the parting gift he had given Mrs. Dana and relates to Jack the story of his parentage, the massacre and of his own forgery. Jack refuses the Dana rightful wealth, declaring that Rose is the share he desires.

"The Secret of the Mountain"

The week of December 28 introduces a new Pathe feature, "The Secret of the Mountain," that pictures vividly the results of an over-indulgent father's mistake in giving his son an unlimited allowance. The film is replete with stirring dramatic scenes and strong situations presented forcibly by a capable group of players, and seen at its best in clear, beautifully tinted photography. The story is pleasing, the plot being plausibly and substantially constructed upon an idea which, if not original, is far from hackneyed. The emotional parts of the play are splendidly portrayed, and the scenes calling for thrills are decidedly realistic.

Wealthy Farmer Rodel sends his boy to the city to be educated, and supplies him liberally with spending money. Unfortunately the environments of the metropolis have a bad effect upon Julian, and he spends his money lavishly, calling upon his father for more when he runs over his allowance. The farmer's attorney warns the man against satisfying Julian's numerous demands, telling him of the way the boy is acting, but the elder Rodel pays no attention to him, saying that the youth is but sowing his wild oats, and will settle down when he is through school.

Finding himself short of money, Julian motors out to his father's house. Entering, he finds a note from the attorney stating that the estate is in a precarious condition due to the several mortgages with which it has been burdened in order to keep Julian supplied with funds. Stunned by this knowledge, the young fellow determines to commit suicide, thinking that his father will be able to collect on his insurance policy.

Shortly afterwards while in the mountains with a party of friends Julian wanders off alone, and jumps from a high cliff. His fall is broken by an abutting ledge, and he suffers only a few minor injuries. The rest of the party search for him, and, finding his hat and gloves at the edge of the cliff, think him dead, though they cannot find his body in the gorge below. For this latter reason the insurance company refuses to pay Rodel the benefits of his son's policy.

The old man wanders about the streets, having lost his farm and home, and is picked up one night by a gay party returning from a carnival. They take him to their banquet table, and, on unmasking, are surprised and shocked when the old man accuses one of the girls of being the cause of his son's downfall. Stricken with remorse, Julian's former sweetheart takes the aged farmer to her home, and supports him on her small earnings.

In the meantime Julian has recovered from the effects of his fall, gone to South Africa, and made a fortune. He returns and looks up his father who is overjoyed to see him. The situation is somewhat strained when the boy meets his old sweetheart, for Helene had deserted him when his money filtered away. Learning of her kind treatment of his father, Julian forgives her, and they become reconciled.

Marguerite Clark in New Productions

Marguerite Clark, the bewitching little star who recently made her first triumphant appearance in motion pictures, is now at the Pacific Coast studios of the Famous Players, appearing in a film adaptation of Frances Hodgson Burnett's beautiful novel and play, "The Pretty Little Sister of Jose," the former famous starring vehicle of Maud Adams. Miss Clark will play the title role of Jose's sister, little Pepita, the tiny Spanish girl of a thousand moods and whims, who has vowed never to lose her heart, but who, when finally conquered by the handsome Sebastiano, loves truly and devotedly, ready to give her life for his, ready to die when she thinks him dying, and gladly ready to live again when the good saints to whom she prays give her back his life.

Gasnier Goes to Italy

Louis Gasnier, chief director of the Pathe studios in Jersey City, sailed for Italy on the Patria on December 19. Mr. Gasnier is to be at the Pathe Italian studios for several months in order to give them the benefit of his long experience in making pictures.

"The Legend Beautiful" an Artistic Film

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

"THE LEGEND BEAUTIFUL," another two-reel production of missionary life, handled in in the same manner in which its predecessors were, will be released by the American Film Manufacturing Company on January 4.

Thomas Ricketts has again turned out two thousand feet of beautiful film which would be a credit to any director, without considering the dramatic action of the story at all. Every exterior location has been carefully chosen and some rare glimpses of California scenery are to be had at regular intervals throughout the two reels. The entire film is tinted yellow-orange and this gives it a distinct touch.

Coupled with the above effects, which stand out above all else, is a nicely developed story of subdued vengeance. The hatred of one brother for another and the effect of a child's relating the "legend beautiful" to the former, when he is about to become a murderer, are brought out in a forceful manner through the virile character interpretations rendered by William Garwood and Jack Richardson. While most of the action revolves about these two players, others of the cast, including Vivian Rich as the girl, Harry Von Meter as the padre and Ed Coxen as Christ do excellent work. Mr. Coxen, while not exactly the type for the role he portrays, uses make-up so effectively that to one who merely visualizes it will undoubtedly seem convincing.

The camera work is in accord with the other artistic effects obtained and the fade scenes are well taken care of. This picture belongs to the class which not only satisfies an audience, but also impresses it and leaves with it a memory of grandeur which a less artistic film fails to create.

The opening scenes of the production are given to the character development of Jose and Pietro, brothers, whose father, Amelio Cordero, employs them on his ranch. Jose is lazy and would rather court Rachael, his sweetheart, than work. Pietro is shifty and hates Jose because he, too, loves the girl but she cares nothing for him. Upon the advice of the padre, the father tells Pietro and Jose of the unfound gold which the ranch contains and a short time later passes out of the world to the Great Beyond.

The day after his father's death Pietro has forgotten all else in his greed for the gold, but Jose remains at home and mourns. Fearing that Jose will be the first to discover the riches Pietro manages to place brandy in his wine and thus makes him unresponsible for his actions. While in this state, Jose sells his right to the estate for a paltry sum and then goes to show Rachael the money. The girl, brokenhearted, sends him away and Pietro denounces him, comparing him to Esau, who sold his birthright.

When he recovers from the effects of the liquor Jose is filled with hatred for his brother and sends him a warning that some day he will return and kill him. He then goes away. Pietro in time marries Rachael and a child blesses their union.

The passing of time brings wealth to Jose in the form of a gold mine, but it does not lessen his intent in the least. Misfortune follows Pietro and at last he falls victim to a fever. The child born of the union of the villainous brother and Rachael develops into a lovable girl under the watchful care of her mother. She is a constant companion of the padre's and one day he tells her of the legend beautiful; of a time when Christ appeared to him.

It happens that the day on which the child hears the wonderful tale is the one on which Jose has returned to avenge the wrong done him. The child meets him on the road and re-tells the tale to him. The effect of the tale upon Jose is wonderful. It takes from him the desire to kill and he seeks seclusion, where a vision of Christ appears to him. He follows the vision to the home of Pietro and there is reconciled to his brother, just before the latter dies. He then goes back to his former home where he waits as the months pass, until the time comes for him to go to Rachael and tell her of the love which has never died.

Unique Stunt for "The Pit"

When the World Film photoplay, Wilton Lackaye in "The Pit," plays the various theaters in Chicago each lady attending any of the theaters at which "The Pit" is shown will receive with the compliments of the flour manufacturers a silk sack containing a pound of flour, put up specially to represent a ninety-eight pound sack of the fruit of the wheat. "The Pit" stars Wilton Lackaye and features Gail Kane and Milton Sills. The scenes were made in Chicago and the play tells the story of Chicago, its Board of Trade, its wheat industry, etc. When Harry Weiss, the Chicago manager for the World Film Corporation, heard it was being made in the city, he got busy. The above is the result.

Famous Players Secure William Elliott

The Famous Players Film Company has engaged another of the more youthful element of prominent Broadway stars, in the person of William Elliott, who is at present making such a notable impression on the New York public in the current success, "Experience," in which he has achieved a splendid personal triumph. The Famous Players have selected H. V. Esmond's celebrated play, "When We Were Twenty-one," Nat Goodwin's former starring vehicle, for Mr. Elliott's first screen impersonation, in which he will portray the role of "The Imp," as young Richard Audaine is known, that irrepressible and light-hearted young man whose tragic love affair so nearly brings ruin to himself and to the guardian who loves him as a son.

Warners Releasing "Born or Made?"

The Humanology Film Producing Company, releasing through Warner's Features, is responsible for one of the most akin-to-life dramas that the year 1914 has had. It is called "Born or Made?" The story is by Jack Rose. It rings true. The acting does not seem acting, and that is quite the highest tribute that can be paid an actor.

Mr. Rose has provided Mr. Kirk, the man who handles the Warner publicity, with the names of none of those who figure in the cast. That is to be regretted; especially so in the case of the boy who enacts the childhood of Anthony Andrews, known to the gang as "Andy." If his work is "acting," it shows him to be extremely clever; if he is but "being natural," he has only to continue to be so to make a wonderful name as an actor.

There are four reels to the film and the last two are better than the first. That, however, is because the story gives its best parts to these two reels. It has to do with the ways and means of the political boss and his henchmen and, because Jack Rose is responsible for its authenticity, it is so accepted. For Jack Rose should know. There is interest that develops into tenseness, there is good direction, apt casting and flawless photography to commend the "Born or Made?" film to both exhibitor and public.

You start out with "Andy" on his vacation. He leaves his place of business—a saloon in the slum district of a big city. His destination is a quiet summer resort where he meets "the only girl" and marries her against her father's wishes. He is called back to the city by a telegram from his chum, which tells him that the leader of a rival "gang" has already launched a campaign in favor of a rival boss. Andy hurries to the city, establishes his wife in a little flat and resumes his saloon business and political jobbing without her knowledge of what his activities are.

Then comes the active campaigning for the coming election. Andy is gang-leader in the interest of Michael Hogan, aspirant for the honor of political boss. Joe Martin is rival gang-leader in the interest of the rival aspirant, Gerald Dobbs. Andy and Joe buy votes with the oodles of money furnished by the respective candidates. Hogan is victorious and Andy and his gang hold a ball the proceeds of which are theirs, for their share in aiding Hogan to victory. Joe Martin's gang makes the way of the rival gang a hard one and breaks up the ball with a revolver fight, in which Andy suffers a wounded hand. Nellie, his wife, reads the account of the fight in the paper and is ready to leave for her father's house when Andy comes home.

It is during the dramatic narrative which follows and which is the story of Andy's boyhood, told by him in explanation of how he adopted the role of gangster, that contains the strongest part of the story. He tells it to his wife in his plea for forgiveness and the chance to begin over. It begins with happy kid days on a farm, saddened by the death of his father, the forfeiting of the home by his mother and himself, and their removal to poverty in the city.

Environment, not heredity, had been at fault, is his wife's decision, and, disposing of the saloon, Andy and his wife retire to a farm and Andy's new life begins. M.C.

Picture Patience

The opening scenes of "In the Shadows" are laid in the Adirondack woods and the hero, Gordon De Maine, and his chum William A. Williams, are shown stalking a deer. After much patient preparation and endless watching the camera was successful in catching a beautiful buck, grazing peacefully, unconscious of the impending danger. Suddenly he rears his head and just as he scents his foe, the danger overtakes him, and he sinks lifeless, a tribute to the prowess of the hunter. Not only does this picture show excellent marksmanship, but the beautiful photography of this scene is certainly remarkable, more especially when one appreciates the hours of patient waiting that were necessary to secure what is after all only an incident in a five-reel story that is crammed with stirring incidents.

Raymond B. West, the boy director of Inceville, has just found time to buy a racing car.

"The Exploits of Elaine" Begins

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

WITH the release of "The Clutching Hand" Craig Kennedy, the famous scientific detective, makes his debut on the screen after having been the central figure of Arthur B. Reeve's stories in the Cosmopolitan for about four years. He has now been assigned to duty in "The Exploits of Elaine," the new, big Pathe serial which succeeds "The Perils of Pauline," and which will be released in two-reel episodes every Monday.

If the first chapter of the serial, "The Clutching Hand," released December 28, may be taken as representative of the story and histrionic excellence of chapters following it, there is no doubt but what "The Exploits of Elaine" will become known as one of the greatest and most complete serials ever launched. Its popularity is almost a certainty as it contains just enough mysticism to keep one intensely interested, and enlivens its problems with clever counter-plots, quick action, and a wide variety of thrills.

The screen stories by Mr. Reeve have a distinct advantage over those published in the magazine in that in being enacted developments leading to the climaxes are self-explanatory, or at least satisfying, while in the magazine a quantity of reading matter laden with scientific, and to many, meaningless, terms is necessary to make Craig Kennedy's solutions clear. One instance of this is the manner in which "the clutching hand" electrocutes Dodge. The printed explanation of how this was accomplished might mean nothing to many, but when it is actually seen to happen on the screen it is accepted as fact whether or not the details be clear.

Arnold Daly, widely known on the legitimate stage and the star of several feature photoplays, takes the leading role as Craig Kennedy, a detective who combines his great knowledge of human nature and powers of observation with science in running down criminals. Pearl White plays the feminine lead and her ability and charming personality bid fair to make the name of Elaine Dodge as well known as was Pauline. Sheldon Lewis is seen as Bennett, Dodge's secretary, and Jameson, Craig Kennedy's companion, is impersonated by Raymond Owens. From present appearances this is the permanent cast, the other players being cast according to the types needed in the other mysteries. There is one exception to this, however, whose identity is not known. He is "the clutching hand," the master criminal, whose capture will probably form the last chapter.

William Riley Hatch has a good part in this release as Elaine's father, and Robin Townley impersonates the spying butler in the Dodge household. Arthur B. Reeve and Charles Goddard are co-operating on the scenario, and Leopold Wharton is in charge of its production.

Craig Kennedy receives a call from his friend Jameson of the New York Star, who informs him that Dodge has learned the identity of "the clutching hand," a criminal who has long and successfully defied the law. Craig replies, "Then he is dead"—and on visiting his home they find him so. During the night the criminal and a companion have gained entrance to the Dodge home, and wired it in such a way that anyone answering the telephone in Dodge's study would be electrocuted. They then cut in on the wire, ring the telephone, and Dodge, answering it as they had expected, is killed instantly.

Craig Kennedy and Jameson arrive shortly after the servants discover the body, and the detective, investigating, finds nothing but a hole neatly burned through the top of the safe, and a few finger prints on a statuette covering it. The detective sprinkles a fine powder over the imprints, bringing them out plainly, and, to his great surprise, finds that they are a reproduction of his own finger prints. "The clutching hand" has come, burned a hole through a "burglar-proof" safe, and gone, all without leaving the slightest clue as to his identity.

In the meantime "the clutching hand" has opened the letter in which he thought to find Limpy Jim's statement of where to find the master criminal who is his employer, but whom he has never seen. Instead of the original statement "the clutching hand" finds nothing but five or six blank sheets of paper. Shortly before his death Dodge replaced Limpy Red's confession with the blank paper, and hid the original away in a secret panel in the wall. A reasonable conjecture at this time is that this hidden confession is the key to the serial.

Nicholas Power Again Honored

The grand prize for exclusive safety devices on picture projecting machines was awarded to the Nicholas Power Company, manufacturers of Power's Cameragraph No. 6A, by the American Museum of Safety, under whose auspices the Second International Exposition of Safety was held at the Grand Central Palace, New York City, December 12 to 19, 1914. The Nicholas Power Company was also awarded the gold medal at the same exposition held in 1913 and in being awarded the highest honor in competitive competition this year proves that Mr. Power is in accord with the much talked of safety first campaign that is sweeping the country at the present time. This distinguished tribute to the mechanical genius and untiring efforts of Nicholas Power has been the occasion of much rejoicing by those who have been bending their energies to uplift the motion picture art, especially with regard to the prevention of fire and accident, and Mr. Power is receiving congratulations from all over the country on on his achievement. The efforts of the American Museum of Safety to promote safety in all branches of trade, have met with the greatest success as was evidenced by the representation of some of the largest employers of labor in this country.

American Wins Title Litigation

Motography is informed by the American Film Manufacturing Company that after extensive litigation the courts have dismissed the injunction suit of the Famous Players' Film Co. against the American Film Manufacturing Company to restrain the latter from the use of the title "The Aftermath" and that the American Film Manufacturing Company is granted the full and unrestricted use of the title "The Aftermath," its two-reel feature release of August 31, 1914.

Violet Mersereau—Imp Star

Violet Mersereau, the Imp leading lady, will be seen shortly in a remarkable film entitled, "She Was His Mother," a film as full of pathos and realism as one can imagine. Miss Mersereau plays the part of a winsome little country girl as the story opens and then, later, an old gray-haired beggar woman. This clever little girl has had an interesting career. She played in "Rebecca of Sunny Brook Farm" both here and abroad on the legitimate stage and hopes that some day she will play this delightful role for the pictures. An idea of her versatility is given when one considers the diversity of the characters of Peg in "Peg o' The Wilds" and "Rebecca," both of which little Violet played so wonderfully well. This child wonder has been on the stage since she was nine years old (she is just eighteen). She played in the companies of such famous stars as Maxine Elliott and Margaret Illington and took a splendid part in "The Clansman." Needless to say this fine training, together with her natural talents, has enabled her to accomplish a great deal toward good picture acting. Her natural charm, sunny disposition and personality have also been assets of no mean value.

New Lasky Glass Studio Completed

Samuel Goldfish announces the completion of the new glass studio erected by the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, in Hollywood, California, which has been in the course of construction for several months. Work was fortunately so timed as to bring the completion of the studio to pass at the present moment, at the beginning of the short rainy season in California.

This is said to be the largest enclosed studio in California and one of the largest glass studios in the world. The Lasky buildings in Hollywood now occupy the space of three city blocks, and about twenty miles away is the wonderful Lasky ranch with its 20,000 acres of land and its scenery of almost every imaginable description, from the semi-tropical to ice-clad mountain tops. The glass studio is intended primarily for the taking of interior scenes. Though many of these scenes may be taken out of doors, it is generally conceded that certain light effects can best be obtained in a glass enclosure.

Elizabeth Forbes, late of the Henry Miller, Doris Keane's "Romance" and other companies, successful in New York, has been added to Thanhouser's stardom.

Realistic Fight in Selig Production

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

UNDER the title "The Old Code," the Selig Polyscope Company, will, on Monday January 11, release a two-reel drama of the frontier written by James Oliver Curwood, which is decidedly a tale of the red-blooded variety.

In the closing reel of this production there is a hand to hand fight between two brawny frontiersmen, which calls to mind that never-to-be-forgotten struggle which made that other Selig picture, "The Spoilers," memorable.

William Stowell and Edwin Wallock are the two contestants in this newer Selig drama and their struggle in the woods is realistic in the extreme, but really sinks into minor importance when compared with the bitter struggle that occurs when the two men are turned loose on the opposite sides of an island, there to seek each other out and fight to the death.

The departure for the island.

As the story runs, both Pierre and Langlois are in love with Marie, a forest maiden and the daughter of a sturdy woodsman. Marie favors Pierre, but lest he think his conquest too easy, flirts with Langlois in the hope of arousing Pierre's jealousy. Langlois, later, by stealth secures a curl of Marie's hair and at the settlement boldly displays this to Pierre, claiming that the girl gave it to him as a token of her love.

When Pierre, aroused to insane jealousy, knocks Langlois down, the by-standers demand that their quarrel be settled in a primeval fashion—that of a hand to hand combat.

While the two men are fighting, Marie, who regrets her flirtation with Langlois, sends Lota, a half-breed, with a note to each of the men. In the one to Langlois, she declares that she hates and despises him and never wishes to see him again, while in the one to Pierre, Marie declares her love and urges him to come to her at once. Lota, herself in love with Pierre, thinks of winning him back by giving him the wrong note, and, tearing off the address, the half-breed replaces the two notes in their envelopes and gives them to the men just as the combat in the forest ends in the triumph of Pierre.

After reading the note, Pierre believing that Marie does not love him, wishes to die, but, in dying, to destroy his rival, and therefore, demands the right of the ancient code,—a fight to the death on the island.

Langlois agrees, and the two men set out in their canoes for the distant island. They land on opposite sides and make their way stealthily toward each other. Langlois arranges a dummy, and when Pierre shoots it, permits it to fall so naturally that Pierre assumes that he has wounded, if not killed his rival, and therefore exposes himself openly.

Langlois, who is hiding in the shrubbery, knocks Pierre down with the butt of his rifle and then ties him to a tree. The revengeful half-breed then departs to a little distance and after jeering and mocking his helpless rival, Langlois begins to shoot at him. Marie, who has learned in the meanwhile of the transfer of the notes, goes to the island to save Pierre and arrives in time to shoot Langlois, though the bullet only wounds him. Marie and Pierre are then reconciled and as the picture ends Langlois is shown being driven away from the settlement for his treachery and insults to Marie. Though the picture does not show the happy marriage of the forest lovers, there is every reason to believe that it all came about.

Pierre challenges Langlois.

Marie flirts with Langlois.

Best Release of Famous Players

"The Eternal City" is the season's big picture. More than that, it is the big picture of many seasons. It has set a brand-new standard in picture-making and any film that may be referred to as "Another Eternal City" will need to comprise the best of photography, a bigness of story, a finished cast with an artist of undisputed dramatic ability in the lead, interiors and exteriors that will occasion no challenge from even the most critical. It will need to furnish the spectacular, the awesome and the merely human, and its camera work will have to be that of a technical expert and its direction bespeak a master hand and mind.

All of these things go to make the greatness of the eight-part film feature, "The Eternal City," which is by far the biggest production yet to come from the Famous Players Film Company. Pauline Frederick does wonderful work in the portrayal of the varied emotions which fall to her lot in the role of Roma. The remainder of the large cast is equally fine in the respective parts accorded it.

Edwin S. Porter, producing manager of the Famous Players Film Company, did the camera work from first to last of the production. The splendid effects thus gained could only be obtained by Mr. Porter. Hugh S. Ford accompanied him as director. And his work speaks its own praise of his skill.

Into Rome and London went the company which made "The Eternal City." And the glory of the settings, of the wonderful light and shadow effects, and the weaving into story form the reproduction of the world's most renowned of wonder spots are but a few of the qualities that make for the film splendor of Hall Caine's best work, "The Eternal City."

A synopsis of the story of this film will be published in next week's issue of MOTOGRAPHY.

Universal's Annual Yuletide Festival

It was a riot of fun, the second annual dancing party which had the officials of the Universal Company as hosts and the employes of that company as guests. It was held the night after Christmas and there were various other guests in addition to those furnished by the Universal Company itself. There was Hy Mayer, who makes cartoons and Mr. Hirshfield who makes Chocolate Tootsie Rolls. There was a princess present, too, but for further information concerning her the public is advised to read Universal bulletins of a week or two from now. Also there were representatives of a few other producing companies in attendance.

But of all the jolly number—and jollity was the evening's pass-word—none joined in the fun with any more enthusiasm than the various heads of the company, themselves. No steps were too new or too deceptive for President Carl Laemmle to accomplish and R. H. Cochrane, J. C. Graham, Joe Brandt, Paul Gulick, Julius Stern and other Universal dignitaries were all boys with the rest of the party.

One of the most interesting of the evening's several features was the presentation to Mr. Laemmle of a silver service, and to R. H. Cochrane of an octagonal-shaped gold watch. The donors were the employees of the Universal Company and the gifts were expressive of their liking and respect for the men so honored. King Baggot made the presentation speech and Mr. Laemmle and Mr. Cochrane each said an appreciative "Thank you."

"I'm so pleased," declared Mr. Laemmle at the end of the party, as he assured himself that the silver was in careful hands, on its way to the Laemmle car. "And I hope every one has had as much fun as I did." It is safe to guess that everyone did.

"This marks my eighth year with Mr. Laemmle," Mr. Cochrane informed as he displayed the new and very beautiful watch that is octagonally formed. "I don't know though that that was in mind when the watch was ordered." But it is safe to guess, though, that it was.

There was a grand-march which brought the guests in rows, sixteen-people wide, in front of the camera and a flash-light. Carl Laemmle formed a center from which his company-members spread to either end of the sixteen-wide front row. There were the Mesereau sisters, Mary Fuller, King Baggot, Ben Wilson, Frances Wilson, Brinsley Shaw, Dorothy Phillips and others. Earnest Shipman, Joe Brandt Bert Adler, Jack Cohn, and H. Macgowan directed the destinies of the march from various angles and Paul Gulick, George Kann, P. D. Cochrane, Mark Dintenfass, K. W. Linn, W. S. Sistrom and N. G. Rothstein were among those who liked best to be just guests. The sample photograph of the marchers was auctioned off by Frances Wilson. Bids were opened with one of five dollars by Mr. Laemmle and the final one was one-hundred and twenty-five which made the photograph, an autographed one, the property of Mr. Hirshfield.

There was another march, a little later—its way was toward the dining-rooms, and the spread which was announced as "Just Eats" was a banquet. Tissue paper hats of various designs were the favors and others received were fobs patterned after the Universal's trade-mark, and there were pins of the same design. Hy Mayer entertained for ten minutes during the feasting, with stories that received great applause. Mr. Laemmle and Mr. Cochrane were given three cheers and after the feast, dancing was resumed. The "Good-bye Girls, I'm Through" trot was the last dance number. The hour was five o'clock and the dancers were as many as the hour of eleven had known.

All of which goes to prove what a perfectly enjoyable party that was, which had the Universal Company officials as hosts and the Universal employees—plus others—as guests.

To Release Comedies Weekly

Announcement was made in New York this week that the Colonial Motion Picture Corporation will begin early in February releasing a one-reel comedy every week, although this does not mean that the Colonial will discontinue the production of high grade features. The first of the series of comedies to be released will be entitled "Your Uncle Dudley" and each comedy for several weeks following will present a new adventure of "Uncle Dudley," each complete in itself.

Marie Walcamp, leading lady with the 101-Bison Company, has purchased a new six-cylinder Chalmers touring car.

Pathe Lehrman, who is releasing the L-Ko Universal comedies, has built a new studio in Hollywood, Cal.

Is the Motion Picture a Fad?

BY THOMAS H. INCE

THE faddists are at it again. With every ounce of poundage at their command they are trying to make us believe that the swan-song of the motion picture soon will be lifted throughout the land. Already some of them are speaking of moving pictures as ancient history.

On the contrary, and speaking from observation and experience I can say without reserve that those who are not in sympathy with motion pictures are those whose necks still are encircled by millstones which they would like to shake off if they could do so without loss to themselves.

Thomas Ince.

Faddists never die without a struggle and those few remaining ones tentacled to the drama can not be blamed for not wishing to prepare their own petard. Within the past several years as many of them as could have deserted the drama for the more lucrative motion pictures. Few have returned to the drama.

Within the past year there has been a general hegira of all branches of the theatrical world to motion pictures. I predict that it is only a question of time when motion pictures will supersede everything else in the amusement world. Everything points to it. The well-known decadence of the drama is further proof of it.

To one who understands the qualities of human nature and who is experienced in the ways of providing it with subjects which go to make up human interest, there can be no doubt of the future of motion pictures.

One of the best arguments is the diversified field of picture making; embodying everything in which the mind is interested. Human interest is everything on this planet. Without it the four billions of earthly bipeds soon would surrender in despair.

One of the first things an editor will tell a cub reporter is to bring in a human interest story—something snappy and with plenty of action to it and, above all, something in which we can see ourselves reflected, whether it be meritoriously or otherwise. That is the makeup of a newspaper—a daily journal of human interest happings culled from the four quarters of the globe.

The permanency of motion pictures depends upon the producers alone. Just as long as they can picture scenes of human interest and supply enough variety to keep the public mind focused on moving pictures, just so long will motion photography retain its vitality. It must have the same diversity of subjects as the daily newspapers, together with proper technique and the loftiest standards known to the art.

Cheap melodrama is one thing which is proving a menace to the permanency of the motion picture. In my opinion it is something which the public tolerates rather than enjoys, and the quicker it is eliminated the better it will be for the craft. Time and proper censorship in each community will undoubtedly correct this evil, but it is to be regretted that certain producers still believe the public to be extremely gullible, when, as a matter of fact, any observant person does not have to look twice to convince himself that cheap melodrama received the stamp of public disavowal a long time ago.

It may be said that motion picture producing still is in an embryonic state; that evils naturally have crept in due to inexperience and other kindred reasons. But wonderful reforms have swept aside many of the evils, and we, who are on the ground already, see far more wonderful things ahead in this busy, fascinating world of picture-producing.

One of the principal faults with which we have to contend has been the lack of good scenarios. In late years there has been an enormous demand for films and this demand is still growing at an unprecedented rate. The result has been that thousands of poorly written scenarios have been filmatized in order to supply the demand.

We want scenarios of original plot and harmonious construction and are willing to pay well for first-class productions—scenarios teeming with human interest and chuck-full of action. You must utilize judgment and discrimination in scenario writing as in any other legitimate pursuit. For instance you can't deify an Italian organ-grinder any more than you can make a hero out of an undertaker, as a young Californian lad did sometime ago in a scenario sent me.

The field of human interest from which to draw is practically limitless, and any person of ordinary education and intelligence and with a good imagination can write a scenario. The main fault lies in the padding thereof. Boil interesting, vital facts down to a thick consistency, classify the chief events, and you have a good scenario of which any producer should be proud.

More Farnum Subjects

Samuel Goldfish announces that the versatility displayed by Dustin Farnum in his characterization of "Cameo Kirby" in the photodrama from the play of that name has led Mr. Lasky and the entire Lasky organization to devote particular attention to the selecting of a series of vehicles for Mr. Farnum's further appearances. "The Virginian" and "The Squaw Man" both showed Farnum in western surroundings, but his splendid interpretation of the southern gentleman gambler, "Cameo Kirby," makes it evident that he should have a very great range of success on the screen. Particular attention is therefore being given to making a selection of material which will show Farnum in widely diversified subjects.

Universal Submarine Picture

On Saturday afternoon, December 26, the Universal Film Manufacturing Company showed at its private projection room in the Brady Building on Dearborn street, Chicago, the pictures of the Williamson submarine expedition which on Monday, December 28, opened at the Fine Arts theater on Michigan boulevard, Chicago.

These pictures are the ones the readers of Motography first heard of when they opened at the Broadway Rose Gardens, New York City, some months ago, but which have since been purchased and are now being exploited by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

One is actually taken to the bottom of the sea in these films and by means of the wonderful contrivance invented by the Williamson brothers one is enabled to see the beautiful coral growths, the fantastic grottos and the weird deep sea plants and animals. In the last reel of the film, one is treated to the unusual spectacle of a duel of the deep between a man and a shark, victory resulting fortunately for the man. The film was carefully explained by a lecturer and surely one who cannot find something of interest and entertainment in the spectacle offered is to be pitied, for the picture is undoubtedly educational as well as so unusual as to be fascinating and entertaining in the highest degree.

Wherever shown the picture has been endorsed by museum officials, boards of education and museums of natural history and undoubtedly during the engagement at the Fine Arts theater the educational feature of the pictures will be one of its strongest drawing cards. N. G. C.

Operators Hold Ball

The Coliseum Annex of Chicago was the scene on December 9 of the annual ball of Local No. 2 of the International Alliance Theatrical Stage Employes of the United States and Canada. To say that the event was enjoyable and the best ever staged by the operators of Chicago is putting it mildly, for though these young men have a habit of doing everything well and their balls have become traditional successes, the one of 1914 was a little bit better even than any of their previous entertainments.

Credit for the success of the evening can scarcely be attributed to any one man, since all had a part in making it an event never to be forgotten. On the ball committee were such "live wires" as John J. Fanning, Hal. Johnstone, E. D. (Jack) Miller, J. J. Gorman, Herman H. Goldberg, Arthur Hollins, Morey Cohen, J. M. Wolfberg, Lee A. Forbes, Robert Hutton, Frank A. Murphy, Frank R. Connelly, Frank Spaulding, Currie C. Cull, Joseph J. Sullivan, Arthur Tuchman, Thomas Reynolds, Adrian L. Cooley, Charles Ison, Harry Woolf, William Hassett, Roy Coleman, Salvatore Tomaso, George A. Evans, David A. Day, Percy C. Havill, George Heiss and Herschell Vallandingham. The tasty and attractive program was edited and arranged by F. E. Havill and hustling alone could have secured the many attractive pages of advertising found in the ball program.

Completes "The Idler"

Lloyd B. Carleton, as director for the Box Office Attractions Company of which William Fox is the head, has completed his screen production of "The Idler" in five parts. The photoplay is said to be the most pretentious and artistic yet attempted by Mr. Carleton. To quote a theatrical term, "the production is lavishly mounted, no expense being spared to secure the desired effects." Praise is due Carleton, for the deft hand of the able director is revealed to advantage. An excellent cast of players appears in "The Idler," the principal members being Catherine Countiss, Charles Richman, Claire Whitney and Walter Hitchcock. The scenario is the work of Roy L. McCardell. Mr. Carleton is now preparing to present a film version of "The Girl I Left Behind Me," Franklin Files' and David Belasco's triumph of western life. Robert Edeson will appear as the star in this piece, assisted by a well-balanced company of photoplayers.

De Luxe World Posters

To prove that nothing is too good for the World Film Corporation Joseph S. Edelman, director of advertising, is using a drawing of J. Montgomery Flagg, the famous artist, for the one reel feature productions of Bert Levy, the famous artist entertainer.

The poster is produced in a warm brown tone on a buff background and a great deal of attention has been given to bringing out all of the fine details in the sketch.

Episodes Seven and Eight of "Zudora"

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

THE announcement made by the Thanhouser Syndicate Corporation recently that some startling events would be introduced into this serial in the near future becomes a reality in episodes seven and eight, for these two installments are by far the most interesting of the "Zudora" pictures which have thus far been released.

Perhaps the most important change which is made is the transforming of James Cruze, erstwhile villain, into a hero by placing him in a role which appears to correspond to the character of "Jim Norton," which was so popular in "The Million Dollar Mystery." Despite this change he does not forsake "Hassam Ali," which he created, but is seen in a dual character portrayal and his work is exceedingly creditable. The new character appears in the seventh installment, but not until the eighth episode is his presence explained. Then it is hinted that "the mysterious Jim Baird," as he is known, has been impersonating the mystic while the latter has been ill.

A number of spectacular effects are also introduced in these two episodes, among which is the reproduction of the blowing up of a ship, the practical use of a powerful chemical which photographs any person or object near it, and a fierce struggle between Baird and several Chinamen in a house of mystery. The interest aroused by the earlier episodes is certain to be greatly increased by these two installments and the producers of the serial promise that even more startling and unexpected changes will occur in the near future.

The plot of the seventh episode, which is entitled, "The Mystery of the Lost Ships," deals with the attempt of Hassam Ali to take Zudora's life through the invention of a semi-maniac and her rescue by the mysterious Jim Baird. A ship company is greatly worried because one after another of its ships have gone out to sea and have never returned. As the weather is calm, the cause of the disasters cannot be ascertained so, after detectives have failed on the case, Chang hypnotizes Zudora.

the ship owners consult Hassam Ali and he tells Zudora to work on the case. John Storm asks the girl detective for her picture about this time and when she inquires the location of a photographer of her uncle he directs her to one who is located under the workshop of one of his accomplices. He then visits the accomplice and learns that it was a powerful machine that he built which destroyed the ships, the only motive for the action being that the maniac wanted to test his invention. By means of a fluid which photographs the countenance of anyone who stands near it Zudora learns that her uncle is in the apartment above her, just as she solves the mystery of the ships.

She seeks the aid of John Storm and, as they are about to make their escape the machine is turned upon the room and an explosion occurs. All escape except Zudora, who is trapped in the burning building. Storm proves a weakling and has not the nerve to enter the house and save her. Suddenly the figure of Jim Baird dashes through the crowd and into the building. He carries Zudora to safety and then disappears before the girl or her lover can thank him. This closes the episode, after having given the audiences to understand that there is another hero in the serial, who surpasses Storm.

The eighth installment, whose title is "The Foiled Elopement," deals with the kidnapping of Zudora by a Chinese hypnotist and her rescue by Jack Baird. In the opening scenes Mr. Chang is seen exercising his hypnotic powers and Zudora and Storm are shown planning to elope. The suggestion that Jim Baird is impersonating Hassam Ali is given at this point and the man who pretends to be the grl's uncle decides to break up the elopement when he hears of it. Mr. Chang is hired by Hassam Ali to take Zudora away and Jim then decides to impersonate the Chinaman and investigate, as he has secured his photograph by means of the liquid mentioned in the seventh installment.

He visits Chang's apartment under this disguise and learns of Zudora's captivity. He then returns to the mansion, where he again becomes Jim Baird, and returns to rescue the girl. Storm also learns of her danger and with several police and detectives hurries to the Chinaman's place. Jim gains entrance to the house but is discovered by Chang, who ties Zudora hand and foot and locks her in a room. A terrific struggle takes place between Jim and the Chinaman, which is ended when Storm and the police arrive. Jim makes his escape before any of them see him and returns to the mansion where he again dons the disguise of Hassam Ali.

Storm takes Zudora home where Jim, as the mystic, greets them. The girl puts her arms lovingly around the man she believes her uncle and when she kisses Storm good bye a moment later the expression on Jim's face clearly shows that he, himself, loves the girl but dare not tell her because of the role he is playing. The introduction of this complication promises some exceedingly strong dramatic situations for the future episodes.

Advertising "The Eternal City"

The Famous Players Film Company have issued a book containing text and pictures relative to the film version of Hall Caine's well known work, "The Eternal City," as part of the advertising campaign exploiting that production. The book is printed on buff cameo and contains sixteen pages. The illustrations are well chosen and distinct and the text is exceedingly well written. The cover is also artistically designed and the entire book is praiseworthy because of its de luxe make-up. It would not look out of place on the reading table in any home.

Studio Built in Two Days

That there is nothing slow about Los Angeles has often been indicated, but the latest proof of this is the record-breaking time in which a complete motion picture studio has been erected there.

When the increased activities at the Bosworth plant suddenly demanded another studio, negotiations were immediately entered into with the various contractors for the speedy erection of a complete structure of steel and glass. As a result of this an unusual offer was made to set up the building in forty-eight hours, and a contract was immediately drawn up calling for the completion of a studio in two days. In order to inconvenience the general routine at the Bosworth plant as little as possible, it was imperative that Sunday be one of the days on which work on the new addition was to be done. Accordingly, it was agreed that one of the two days be Sunday and for each day after the stipulated two the contractor would be subject to a fine of $500.

Last Saturday and Sunday were the days chosen for the unusual task and early Saturday morning a large corps of workmen with wagon loads of material and supplies were at the plant and soon hard at work. Through herculean effort on the part of everyone connected with the execution of the contract, the job was completed in the stipulated time and Monday morning found another building on the Bosworth premises.

The new studio measures 60x90 feet and is built entirely of steel and glass. It is equipped with a powerful and complete lighting system so that dark days can be utilized. Nothing has been overlooked and every detail of the construction has been found thoroughly in accordance with the demands.

"Cinderella" Christmas Booking at Strand

The week's feature at the Strand Theater has been Mary Pickford in the four-reel telling of the haps and mishaps of "Cinderella." The tale is charmingly told and the role of the little rag-and-cinder girl as charmingly interpreted. Owen Moore plays the Prince Charming, and the stepmother and her very homely daughters are well portrayed by Isabel Vernon, Georgia Wilson and Lucille Carney. A humorous conception of the characters of the stepsisters, together with puttied noses and a lavish use of other make-up aids, are resorted to successfully by the Misses Wilson and Carney. The king in his comedy costume might easily defy the recognition of the nearest of relatives. The photography and the camera work deserve credit for much of the story's charm and James Kirkwood did well with the direction. As always, Mary pleases.

"This new version of 'Cinderella,'" to quote from the herald on the films, "is a delightful blend of comedy and pathos, and provides an artistic treat for people of all ages. In the imposing and elaborate production which has been given this wonderful story, illusion and reality are skillfully mingled, and the famous little heroine of the children of all time lives and breathes upon the screen, immortal there as in their hearts, with a tender charm that is all Mary Pickford's own." S. Miller Kent Engaged

S. Miller Kent, for many years a prominent legitimate star and well remembered as leading man in the justly famous stage production of "Raffles," has been engaged by B. A. Rolfe for his appearance in the Alco Film Corporation's production of Clyde Fitch's play, "The Cowboy and the Lady." The production of "The Cowboy and the Lady" by the Rolfe people will be the first motion picture production of any of Clyde Fitch's bigger successes and marks a step in advance for Mr. Rolfe, who has recently announced the procuring of Mrs. Fiske's former success, "The Highroad," which will be done following "Satan Sanderson," in which Orrin Johnson is entrusted with the main part.

Jerome Storm, Frank Borzage and Louise Glaum make up the cast of principals to be presented in "In the Land of the Otter," a forthcoming Ince release.

Al Reeves and William Doyle, the famous burlesque comedians, are now working in a Universal comedy under Director Hamburger.

"When Love and Honor Called"

REVIEWED BY NEIL G. CAWARD

IN "When Love and Honor Called," a three-reel photoplay by Frank Blighton, the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company releases the fifth of the Essanay prize mystery plays which are being produced in conjunction with The Ladies' World.

The picture is a story of western frontier life, full of action and interwoven with a pretty love story. The leading roles are in the hands of G. M. Anderson and Marguerite Clayton, while Lee Willard enacts the heavy and character role of Juan Martin, a Mexican half-breed.

The photography is fully up to the Essanay standard and particular praise is due the director for some of the exteriors depicting ranch life. The views given of the round-up, in which a vast herd of cattle is seen being driven across an open prairie, is one of the prettiest which the screen has offered in some time. Lovers of the west will thoroughly enjoy the portions of the picture which depict ranch life.

Broncho Billy's first meeting with Elizabeth.

As the story runs Broncho Billy is sent out to break up a gang which has successfully rustled cattle from a number of ranches in the vicinity of a small Arizona town, and upon his arrival, meets at the hotel, Elizabeth Barton, who is bethrothed to a handsome daredevil, Juan Martin, employed on the Bar-O Ranch.

The friendship of Elizabeth and Broncho develops.

Broncho discovers that the girl has come to town to meet her lover, who is planning to get her to elope with him, since he cannot marry her with the consent of her invalid father. At a dance, Martin and another cow-puncher quarrel over who is to dance with Elizabeth, and Martin draws a gun to settle the argument, but at that moment Broncho Billy interferes, disarms Martin, removes the cartridges from his gun and hands it back to him.

Later the girl changes her mind about eloping, and when she goes to explain to Juan that she cannot go away with him, Broncho is the means of saving her, when the angered half-breed would have kidnapped her.

While at the settlement, Broncho meets George Chisholm, foreman of the Bar-O Ranch, and explains his mission. Broncho is given a job on the ranch in the hope that he may discover the identity of the rustlers, and starts away the next morning with the round-up outfit from the Bar-O. Martin plots with the cook and other members of the outfit to poison the coffee of the foreman and Broncho Billy, and to steal the cattle while they are drugged. The plan works out as anticipated, and Broncho Billy awakens next morning to find the cattle and the outfit gone, and the foreman dead at his side, he having been given an overdose of the drug.

Elizabeth goes to warn the sheriff of Broncho Billy's coming.

Overtaking the cattle rustlers near the border line, Broncho Billy holds them up and is about to compel them to return the cattle, when he is lassoed by the cook and overpowered. Martin and the others bind Broncho and take him back to town, where they accuse him of murder and turn him over to the sheriff.

Miss Barton has learned of Broncho's innocence and warns the sheriff of the plan for putting the crime on Broncho Billy. The sheriff locks Broncho up in a cell, pretending to believe Martin's story, and sets out to arrest the real thieves. In his absence, the citizens of the town learn of Broncho's arrest and start for the jail to lynch him. The girl goes to warn the deputy sheriff, in charge of the jail, of the coming of the lynching party, and Broncho, the deputy sheriff and Miss Barton arm themselves and upon the appearance of the lynching party stand them off, in the hope that help will come.

The sheriff, meanwhile, has rounded up the real thieves and from the cook obtains a confession which completely clears Broncho Billy. Returning to the settlement, the sheriff arrives just in time to save the prisoner from the angry mob, who have succeeded in getting into the jail, and when he makes known Broncho's innocence the lynchers unite in a cheer for Broncho Billy, while the girl throws herself into Broncho's arms and promises to become his wife.

Fielding to Head Round-the-World Company

With a company of twenty-one people, Romaine Fielding, Lubin's producer, will leave Philadelphia on January 4 for Phoenix, Arizona, where the first stop will be made in the world's tour scheduled by the Lubin Company. It is expected that Mr. Fielding and his people will be away from Philadelphia three years or more. Complete plans have not yet been announced by the Lubin Company, but it is understood that California, the Hawaiian Islands and Alaska will be among the places visited in order to secure the proper settings and atmosphere for some of the features which the author-director will put on.

Romaine Fielding.

It is the first time that a world's tour has been attempted with such a large and complete company. Three special cars will carry the players, with properties and automobiles, out of Philadelphia to the southwestern state. The company will leave on Monday evening and is expected to arrive in Phoenix Friday. There it will remain throughout the winter and, perhaps, part of the summer, to produce plays written and directed by Mr. Fielding and featuring him in the leading roles. From there, the company will move on to California where there will be produced, among others, pictures laid in and around the Panama exposition. The Hawaiian Islands and Alaska will follow in the tour which will then continue westward.

Cinema Club Dance

The Cinema Camera Club of America, Inc., made up of the moving picture cameramen will hold its second annual ball at the Palm Garden, Fiftieth street near Lexington avenue, New York City, on Friday evening January 8.

Arrangements have been made to have Lillian Russell and Robert Edeson lead the grand march. There will be a special dancing contest and the lady winning will receive a grand prize. Music will be furnished by the Hippodrome Orchestra. Most of the manufacturers have already made reservations for boxes and many notable and favorite photoplayers will attend. The Cinema Camera Club intends to make this evening one of pleasure as it has many surprises in store and has overlooked nothing.

New Leading Lady of "Beauty" Brand

Motion picture followers who are admirers of the "Beauty" brand of the American Film Manufacturing Company will have to add another picture frame to their gallery of favorite players, for Miss Virginia Kirtley is soon to claim a warm place in their hearts. She names Bowling Green, Ky., as her birthplace and says that the year was 1889. Her education came via Outler Academy and Colorado College, and in 1910 she made her first appearance on the professional stage at the Burbank Theater, Los Angeles, Calif., playing in stock with Florence Stone. For two years the speaking stage claimed her attention and then she was lured from the footlights to perform before the camera. Her talents have been displayed in several studios, but it is doubtful if she has ever been seen to better advantage than at the present time, surrounded by the splendid cast which appears in all "Beauty" productions . Her initial appearances occurred in "Brass Buttons" and "Love Knows No Law," which were released during December.

Virginia Kirtley.

New Year Remembrance

O. L. Meister of the Vaudette Theater of Milwaukee is remembering his friends with a New Year's card in which he wishes them a happy and prosperous new year during 1915. This sentiment appears in a cloud of smoke which issues from a huge rapid firing gun which Mr. Meister has loaded with the various brands that combine the Mutual program and which is aimed at a corpulent gentleman labeled "The Public." Motography feels sure that every recipient of one of these cards was pleased and also impressed with Mr. Meister's ingenuity and originality.

Burton King, "the mystery director," has joined the Universal forces near Los Angeles and in future productions at Universal City will direct the plays in which Edna Maison and Ray Gallagher appear.

Edison's "Tracked by the Hounds

REVIEWED BY CHARLES CONDON

ONE expecting to view a picture of the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" variety or a highly melodramatic production full of sensational developments and hair-raising thrills will be greatly surprised on seeing the two-reel Edison release of January 22, "Tracked by the Hounds." Its name suggests not only hounds of great size and ferocity, but daggers, guns, dark nights, villainous deeds, thefts, and kidnappings as well. A few of these qualifications, the bloodhounds, guns, and kidnappings, it lives up to, but the rest are supplanted by a pretty love affair.

The situation that really propels the plot, that of the disobedient and frolicsome young heiress who wishes to marry a worthy but unpretentious youth, and who scorns the man of her father's choice, an extravagant and presuming count in search of a dowry, is not by any means a new one, and avoids the rut worn by other such vehicles only by a small margin. The introduction of the two police dogs helps considerably in supplying new atmosphere, and they show remarkable intelligence in enacting their end of the play. A few hundred feet of film is devoted to an exhibition of the dogs climbing trees, ferreting out hidden articles, running, jumping, and performing other of the many tricks and feats they learned during their five-year connection with the German police force.

Gladys Hulette plays the leading part as Katherine Stuart, the haughty miss who, to the great displeasure of her father (William Bechtel), encourages the attentions of Frank Johnson, their hard-working neighbor impersonated by Harry Beaumont. Carlton King completes the cast as the overbearing and unscrupulous Count de Francisco. The direction was in the hands of Charles France, and he deserves especial credit for his choice of outdoor locations and the realistic fire scene in the climax.

Robert Stuart and Count de Francisco become

intimately acquainted, and later find that they can be of mutual benefit to each other. Stuart's ambitions point towards the count's title, and de Francisco is anxious to have Katherine Stuart, Robert's daughter, for his wife. The count broaches the subject to the girl's father, and he, seeing a chance to realize his ambition of having a title in the family, waxes enthusiastic over the idea of the match.

An interesting moment in Edison's "The Champion Process Server."

The next step, however, is somewhat more difficult, for Katherine turns up her nose at the count on meeting him, and scampers off to talk to Frank Johnson, the owner of the farm next to the Stuart estate. Stuart follows his daughter, scolds her for insulting the fine-looking, dignified count who is to be her husband, and compels her to accept his attentions. Katherine obeys her father while he is present, but the moment he leaves the room she flies upstairs, leaving her titled suitor sitting alone on the settee.

On several other occasions de Francisco attempts to press his suit, but with no better results. Angered by this he determines to kidnap the girl, and hold her for a large ransom which he knows Stuart will gladly pay if he thinks Katherine is in danger. The count hires a couple of Italian laborers, lately discharged by Stuart's gardener, to kidnap Katherine and hold her a prisoner in an old deserted barn nearby. This accomplished, the count instructs them to have the girl write a letter to her father begging him to leave ten thousand dollars at a designated spot to buy her freedom.

The blackmailer is with Stuart at the time that he receives the note, and advises him to pay it by all means. Before complying with the request Stuart decides to make an effort to find the girl, and borrows Frank Johnson's wolf hounds for the purpose. The rescuing party follows them to the strip of woods near the barn, but on entering the clearing is fired upon by the Italians.

During the gun fight which follows the barn catches fire, driving the two kidnapers out into the open. Katherine lies tightly bound in one of the inner rooms. Johnson rescues her at great risk to himself. In trying to clear themselves the Italians tell of the count's part in the affair, and the silk-hatted dignitary is placed under arrest. Stuart is happy in the knowledge that his daughter has escaped marrying such a scoundrel, and gladly presents her to her sweetheart, Frank Johnson.

Big Edison Night at Empire

Notwithstanding the bitter cold of last Tuesday night, the residents of the Bronx turned out in vast numbers to behold in real life at the Empire theater their screen favorites of the Edison Company. As early as 9 o'clock the magnificent theater was taxed to capacity and the spacious lobby held a throng eager to gain admission. After the showing of the Edison features "The Colonel of the Red Huzzars" and "The Best Man" Frank Bannon, the company's publicity man, introduced from the stage Sally Crute, Miriam Nesbitt, Gertrude McCoy, Duncan McRae, Robert Conness and Marc MacDermott. A grand ovation was tendered to the artists by the admiring fans and the ladies were each presented with a gorgeous bouquet of flowers. The players then retired to the rear of the theater, where they at once became engaged in affixing their signatures in books, albums and on programs in the possession of the fans.

New Mutual Publication

"The Film" is the title of the new booklet which takes the place of the "Our Mutual Girl Weekly" publication, and which can be obtained only at theaters which run the "Runaway June" serial. With Arthur James as editor and Albert S. LeVino as associate editor, the weekly issue of "The Film" promises to be one of worth. Its first number is the verification of this promise. It gives the story of episode one of "Runaway June" with a "still" illustration that shows the lavish attention given the detail of the first two reels which this episode comprises. There is the last of the "Mutual Girl" series (this by Mr. LeVino); there is a storyette on "Josephine Napoleon Crowell" by Elizabeth Sawyer; there are "Advance Spring Models" by Janet Cleghorne, and the reader is taken "On the Way to Spring Modes" by Marion Savage. May Manton fashions are pictured and there are forewords and afterwords of wisdom by the editor. A promising weekly is "The Film," and the Reliance Film Corporation is the publisher.

Alliance Exchange and Producers Hold Conference

Last week saw the first of a series of projected conferences that has been inaugurated by General Manager Cobe of the Alliance Film Corporation. These meetings are to consider from time to time the changing needs of the exhibitor and to find the ways and means to be taken to meet these needs.

Men representative of all the branches of the film industry met in Mr. Cobe's private offices. Among the exchange men were Felix Feist of the Celebrated Players' Exchange, Chicago; H. Schwalbe of the Electric Theater Supply Company of Philadelphia, Pa.; J. L. Fay of the Alliance Film Service, Pittsburg; F. Frane of the Eastern Film Company of Boston, and M. F. Tobias of the All Theaters Film Company of New York.

H. M. Blackwell of the Favorite Players, Arthur Rosenbach of the Excelsior Film Company, and Adolph Figman of the Masterpiece Film Company spoke in behalf of the manufacturer.

After the meeting Mr. Cobe said: "Of course, this conference was only a beginner and it was impossible to get together as many representatives of our associated concerns as I would have liked to discuss these matters, but we made big strides in the right direction."

Noted Animal Impersonator

Being "the goat" has no terrors for William Fables, for it is due partly to the fact that he is so good a goat that he was this week selected for the Edison stock company of stars—not to say of course that Mr. Fables is not also a good actor. To him belongs the unique distinction of being the best impersonator of animals on the stage or screen. In the Edison "Buster Brown" series Mr. Fables, as the wise goat companion of Buster, ever bent on trouble, made more of a hit than Buster himself. That so much humor could be extracted out of so serious an animal as the goat—and still be "life-like"—was the surprise of Mr. Fables' quaint art. He also added a new character to the film version of "Fantasma," the Edison feature, as the clown's faithful ally and companion, the goat. During the several seasons that he was with John Cort's stage production, "Alaska," as the bear, he brought many a laugh. Mr. Fables appeared for some time in vaudeville in his own acts featuring animal parts, and was also on the first program of the Hippodrome as the fabled "Wild Man from Borneo." As an acrobatic comedian, Mr. Fables has few equals, and some of his funniest work is to be seen in the Edison, "How the Students Cured the Cooks," soon to be released, wherein life for him is one eternal nightmare dodging skeletons.

"Elaine" in Loew and Fox Houses

Jules Burnstein, who so successfully manages the destinies of Eclectic's New York exchange, is wearing a broad smile these days and opines that it's a fine holiday season. Here's the answer. "Jule" has booked the "Exploits of Elaine" in twenty-one Loew theaters and eleven of the Fox houses. For good measure he has put the Pathe News into the big auditorium of John Wanamaker's for first run twice a week service.

Kleine Release Dates

The publicity office of George Kleine announces that release dates have been fixed on "Stop Thief" and "DuBarry." February 8 has been chosen as the date when "Stop Thief" will first be revealed to the public, and "Du Barry" will have its first showing on January 18.

How Big Is An Exhibitor?

WHEN a motion picture exhibitor grows so big that he has to spend a thousand dollars a day for film rental, while his daily attendance figures average well over twenty thousand, that exhibitor is a considerable factor in the industry. It would not take many like him, indeed, to make an industry without any assistance. In a purely commercial sense he is a purchasing power equal to two hundred average one-theater exhibitors. Less than a hundred of him would be able to operate all the picture houses of the country, and so constitute, in themselves, the picture theater business.

Perhaps the most interesting thing to our readers about this thousand-dollar-a-day exhibitor, or rather firm of exhibitors, whose somewhat meteoric but wholly safe-and-sane rise was told in a recent issue, is that they started with one small theater, just as every exhibitor in the world starts. But the interesting thing to the film manufacturer is that here, under one management, is a consumer of fifty reels of film a day, including practically all the first run subjects there are in all the programs.

We deem it important to emphasize these figures because so many still insist on regarding the picture theater business as a business of small units. It is true, of course, that most of its exhibitors do operate in rather a small way, with a single house, a daily admission of less than a thousand, and a weekly film rental of thirty or forty dollars. But while the mammoth enterprise we recently described is naturally exceptional, it is by no means alone in its class. There are more of these big exhibitors in the country than most people realize. Even in the trade not all are familiar with the concentration points of film disposal. Stories of some of the others will follow in due course, and the whole series will constitute a living monument to the magnitude and importance of that neglected factor of the business—the exhibitor.

More Twaddle About the Pictures

BEFORE an association of teachers meeting in Boston, Frederick R. Willard, in a carefully prepared paper based on observation of 3,700 boys and girls, made the statement that children in general are enthusiastic about motion pictures, but that as they get older and acquire knowledge they grow indifferent to them; that high school seniors, almost without exception, prefer the "legitimate"; that the cheaper theaters are attended by people who do not read; that children from the better class of homes do not go to nickel shows; that pictures tax the brains of children, and especially the educational subjects (!); that they learn nothing from them and take the melodramas and tragedies too seriously.

Most of this, we must admit, is news to us. It must be peculiar to Boston. Nowhere else, we are sure, is even the haughty high school senior indifferent to pictures. We did not even know there was anybody in Boston who did not read; though, of course, if they go to good picture shows they do not have to read. That children of the "better class" will not attend nickel shows is typical of the effete East to be sure; the nickel is a vulgar coin, sometimes called a "jitney" by vulgar persons. The dime being of noble metal, and the word being of legitimate descent from disme and decimus, is certainly more respectable, and the dime show is deserving of preferred patronage—at least in Boston.

It is surprising to learn, though, that Boston children are nonplussed, or even bored, by those subjects commonly called educational. Mr. Willard mentions as examples the making ready of beef for the market and the manufacture of soaps. Possibly these things are outside the ken of the Bostonians. The growing, harvesting, marketing and baking of beans would, we venture to wager, prove the theory false and create an extraordinary interest—even to awakening the enthusiasm of those haughty high school seniors. As to the children learning anything from such pictures, how could a Boston child learn anything from anything, except from a properly accredited adult Bostonian lecturer? And how could a Boston child take anything otherwise but seriously?

We are becoming fatigued—in other words, getting tired—of hearing the pictures criticized for what they are. Anyone of a philosophical turn of mind, such as the effete East is supposed to produce, must realize that the picture, as we have so often said, is but a reflection of anything, everything, that the human mind can conceive of. Not only that, but it is actually put to that purpose, so that today one can find film pictures on nearly every subject. The key to Mr. Willard's grievance seems to be that the Boston exhibitors are not giving shows suitably highbrow for the Boston mentality. There is no reason why they should not, unless it be that they are already supplying the real demand and know that the alleged superculture is a myth. For we have shows of all grades now, and can suit any taste. In fact, it may be said that we are suiting them, Mr. Willard and his like to the contrary notwithstanding.

TEACHING AN OLD DOG NEW TRICKS.

ONCE upon a time the high-browed dramatic critics, the dyspeptic legitimate producers and the supporters of the $2 shows looked down with scorn on motion pictures, which they chose to term "movies" and predicted that they were but a passing fad, which would soon die of nonsupport.

But today all this is changed, and the high-browed critic, the dyspeptic legitimate producer and the supporter of the $2 shows are pleased to note that the latest production of the speaking stage has adopted many ideas and suggestions from the once despised "movie."

No better example of this change comes to mind than the production of "On Trial," which opened this week at a certain loop theater in Chicago and was hailed the next morning by one of the foremost dramatic critics of the city (a man who draws his salary from a journal that has selected for itself the title "The World's Greatest Newspaper") as a photodrama of the speaking stage. He points out in his review of the production that such well known adjuncts of the photoplay as "fadeouts," "cutbacks" and "visions" are resorted to time and again, and all with the most pleasing and satisfactory results.

Attention is called to the fact that the opening scene is a courtroom where a man is on trial for murder, and that when a witness takes the stand and begins to testify, the lights are dimmed, the scene shifters busy themselves and when the lights flash up again one beholds the re-enactment of the murder. As the act closes the lights are again dimmed, the scene shifters once more busy themselves and when a glimpse of the stage is again permitted we find ourselves back again in the court-room and the witness is just finishing the testimony. The story goes on in this fashion, the court-room fading out each time into the scene in which the action takes place that is being described by the witness then on the stand. It proves wonderfully effective, according to all critics, and the once despised "movie" seems really to have taught the legitimate stage something new.

To be sure it takes time to effect revolutions in the form of our drama, but surely no one would venture to doubt that the general attitude of the high-browed dramatic critic, the dyspeptic legitimate producer and the supporter of the $2 show has changed remarkably as regards the pictures, within the last year or two. The time may even come when the celluloid drama will be regarded as a real friend and the production of it worthy to rank alongside what is known in legitimate circles as "art."

EDNA PAYNE, now ingenue lead in the Western Eclair company, five years ago was a prime favorite in New York and Brooklyn stock companies. She was leading ingenue in the Coarse Payton and Spooner and Gotham stock companies in Brooklyn, and later assumed the same position at the Academy of Music, New York City. Her next engagement was in vaudeville, and then came motion pictures. Three years ago she visited the Lubin plant while playing in Philadelphia, and was offered a small part in one of the productions being staged. Her charming personality and grace attracted the director's attention, and the result was a two years' stock engagement as ingenue. One day just before the eastern Eclair company left for Tucson, Arizona, Miss Payne met her old vaudeville director on Broadway. He was to direct the company in Arizona and signed her.

Edna Payne.

NORBERT A. MYLES, is the handsome curly haired cowboy, who is at present delighting the hearts of the feminine screen fans throughout the country by his splendid characterizations and daring feats of riding in the western productions of the Eclair Film Company. He has been playing in motion pictures almost since their inception as a standard amusement, and has appeared in stellar roles with companies of such prominence as Pathe, Lubin and Kalem. Born thirty years ago in Deadwood, S. D., he was brought up on a ranch until he reached the age of twenty. Mr. Myles has experienced every phase and condition of western life and his present excellent horsemanship was acquired through years of practice in herding cattle. Joining a theatrical road company as an extra, Myles worked his way up to the leading role.

Norbert A. Myles.

WILL SHEERER is one of the oldest and most popular actors in the Eclair stock company. He has had much experience in the field of theatrical work and before his entrance into pictures was widely known both in this country and abroad. During the twenty-three years he has spent behind the footlights, he has missed but two seasons; during the Spanish - American war, he fought the enemy in Cuba, and on one other occasion fell for the lure of Wall street. As a stock and bond salesman his native shrewdness brought him rapidly to the front but the call of the stage proved too strong and he answered it. Mr. Sheerer is acknowledged to be a past master of the art of make-up, and for years delighted vaudeville audiences with a protean act in which he impersonated ten different people. Thus far he has appeared in over one hundred and fifty Eclair releases.

Will Sheerer.

CLARA HORTON, popularly known as "the Eclair kid," has been a member of the Eclair stock company for the past two years, and for a child actress is somewhat of a prodigy, being only ten years of age at the present time. She is a petite little lady, and is fortunate in possessing, plentifully, the two greatest assets for screen portrayal, beauty and histrionic ability. When the Eclair company left the Fort Lee, N. J., studio for Tucson, Arizona, Miss Horton accompanied them to be leading lady in the juvenile company. She likes to play boy parts occasionally, but pities the poor knights of the trousers who never get an opportunity to wear the pretty clothes that girls do. Before entering motion pictures Miss Horton was an accomplished toe-dancer, and travelled from coast to coast in "Jack and the Bean-Stalk."

Clara Horton.

Brevities of the Business

Howell Hansel, the new manager of production at the Thanhouser studio, who was appointed to take the place of Lloyd F. Lonergan, resigned, has had more than twenty years' experience on the legitimate stage, and has had motion picture experience with Biograph, Pathe, Universal and Solax as a groundwork for his larger duties with the Thanhouser Corporation. He has been with the New Rochelle firm about a year. While with Biograph he worked in the pictures, but with Solax produced "Ben Bolt," the feature that all the reviewers proclaimed one of the most artistic produced up to that time. "The Million Dollar Mystery," nine miles long, was his masterpiece, however, and at present he is reconstructing "Zudora," the great Thanhouser series-serial, and also passes upon scripts that are to be produced. Mr. Hansel is a lovable character and script writers will find in him a sympathetic friend, if they show ability as writers, for, to the writer's personal knowledge, Mr. Hansel sent a letter about two pages in length, to a writer who showed promise, pointing out why stories were not accepted and suggesting how they could be handled to make them acceptable—service rare in these days of hustle.

In "Redbird Wins," a recent two-act American-Mutual racing drama, Jack Richardson was required to wear a raincoat. As the sky above Santa Barbara was crystal clear and the sun shining as it consents to shine only upon California, everybody at the studio guyed Mr. Richardson unmercifully. Later they were all caught in a storm and the "villain" reversed the laugh.

Universal City is all excitement, for in the early hours of December 21 a baby boy was born within its limits, the first child of either sex to have its name inscribed on the birth register of the infant city. Carl Bernie Oelze is the name he now bears.

The new Ye Liberty Theater, Spokane's latest contribution to the list of luxurious picture theaters, opens its doors January 20 with Kleine's "Julius Cæsar." Practically the entire line of Kleine attractions will follow.

That the demand for the productions furnished the Mutual program by Thomas H. Ince is increasing is shown by the erection of a large extension to the already mammoth stage at the Inceville studios. The stage now measures 200 feet by 75, and there is available space sufficient for staging a dozen different scenes simultaneously.

Since her automobile accident Dorothy Gish, the Griffith-Mutual star, has received letters and telegrams of sympathy from countless admirers throughout the country. Although still confined to her bed, Miss Gish is progressing nicely and expects to be at work again within the next two weeks.

Della Connor, who has done such splendid work in the last two Kleine attractions, "Officer 666" and "Stop Thief," has signed permanently with the Kleine forces and will be seen in future productions.

Director Lorimer Johnston of the eastern Imp company is now directing Mary Fuller and Curtis Benton in a two-reel fantasy the title of which is "Everygirl."

Betty Nansen, the great Scandinavian tragedienne, now appearing in moving pictures for William Fox, visited one of the largest insurance companies in New York this week and took out a policy not only on her life, but also one covering the original manuscripts of Henrik Ibsen which she brought to this country with her. The policy on her life is for $25,000, while the one on the writings of the eminent Scandivanian dramatist is for $50,000.

"On Desert Sands," the two-reel Big U western feature which will be released January 7, carries a double significance for all Universal fans aside from the story itself. It is the first release under the "Big U" brand and the first Sydney Ayres picture under the Universal banner.

King Baggot ceased rescuing heroines and foiling the plans of villains long enough on December 26 to give the patrons of the Universal ball at the Palm Garden, New York City, a fright they will remember for some time. With a number of confederates, he dropped a sand-dummy from his box and had said dummy quickly surrounded by tearful friends. It took the onlookers some time to realize that it was only a joke, but when they did, all enjoyed a good laugh.

Thanhouser Film Corporation—This stock registered a new low sales price of 70 last week. Several lots of stock are now offered at 76.

Mutual Film Corporation—Also had a reaction from a high point of 77 to sales at 70. While the motion picture stocks in general eased off very decidedly in the last ten days, the break in Mutual and the amount of stock that passed hands represented the most important activity in film stocks of the week.

New York Motion Picture Corporation—Reacted about 3 points, and it would be well for the stockholders of this company to bear in mind that the relationship between New York Motion Picture Corporation and Mutual is based on a contract, the expiration of which lies in the near future. The tendency of both Mutual and New York is wrapped up to a large extent in just one decision, namely, whether or not the contract between the two companies is extended.

Thanhouser Syndicate Corporation—This stock has also been a little easier in the last ten days. Most of the stockholders are awaiting some rather unusual developments promised with later episodes. The best single factor that has come into the situation recently is the knowledge that the American Film Company will handle operations connected with this company's next production, which will be on a rather pretentious scale.

World Film Corporation—For the benefit of a number of people who have made inquiry in regard to the World Film Corporation, some facts in connection with this company are given herewith. This company is organized under the laws of the state of Virginia, with a capitalization of $2,000,000 (par value $5). There is issued and outstanding at the present time $1,500,000. Mr. Selznick, the president, was formerly general manager of the Universal. Amongst the directors of the company are members of several New York stock exchange firms, George B. Cox, the Cincinnati capitalist, Lee Shubert, etc. The company claims to have had gross earnings in November of $35,925, and also claims its net would show close to 82 per cent on this figure. The company has a one-half interest in the capital of the Schubert Film Corporation, owners of one of the large studios at Fort Lee, N. J. It also owns certain rights in the moving picture productions of William A. Brady. In a general way the company may be said to have obtained considerable publicity for its securities, which have been actively traded in on the New York curb. Stock has sold as high as 6½, but, being in sympathy with all of the film stocks, has eased off and recent sales have been made at 5⅝. Realizing that 5⅝ is 12½ points above par (figuring par at $100), this stock, in comparison with companies that have been paying 1 per cent a month for a period of years, seems to be selling a trifle high, as seasoned corporations showing an income of 12 per cent can be had 25 points under par.

Al Ray, who has one of the shortest names in the theatrical world and who is also one of the youngest character comedians in the business, has decided to return to motion pictures. Since his closing with the Ramo Company he has been presenting a vaudeville sketch entitled "Breaking Into Society," with the exception of some time spent on the coast playing in slap-stick comedies. He has, however, received so many alluring offers from different film companies that he has decided to give up the stage entirely and devote his time to screen acting, most probably with the newly formed "Federal Films, Inc." Ray has been in pictures and on the stage for the past five years, although he is now only twenty years old. He is considered to be a very funny comedian and has original characters of his own.

Anna Little of Universal has been taking the luxury of another layoff, not because she wanted to, but because the doctor made her. During her short absence Director Turner is devoting his attention to his big forthcoming productions, and the producer of "Damon and Pythias" promises something startling in the near future.

They gave Charles Ray a dinner the other night—those of the De Luna club—and it was a memorable affair. The De Luna club is an organization composed solely of actors from Inceville.

Beatriz Michelena, California's favorite light opera prima donna, now under contract with the California Motion Picture Corporation, has just undergone a serious surgical operation as a direct result of the strenuous life sometimes demanded of a motion picture star. She is rapidly recovering.

Ruth Roland, who recently joined the Balboa Company, makes her initial appearance as the star of that concern in "The Price of Fame," a three-reel feature that will be included in the new Balboa series which attempts to solve twelve vital questions of life.

J. P. McGowan, the Kalem railroad director, who is spending a few weeks in bed at the hospital and who is directing his "Hazards of Helen" series from said bedside, is as cheerful as possible and in his enforced rest has been much cheered by the kindly interest of the Kalem company and by learning that his "Hazards" series is so successful that the picture will not finish as soon as was contemplated.

"When East Meets West," a forthcoming Thanhouser release through the Mutual program, was taken on the Walsh ranch near Denver, the birthplace of the famous $1,000,000 McLean baby.

Grace Cunard is adding new furniture to the big bungalow she built on the mountain side at Hollywood, Calif., for she expects her mother and a widowed sister with her child to come and live with her in the near future. Ever since she lost her son Mrs. Cunard has longed to come to her daughter, and now her hopes are to be fulfilled.

An astonishing fact about Thomas H. Ince, whose productions are released in the Mutual program, is the little sleep he seems to need. He averages four or five hours a night. Usually he reaches Inceville at 8:30 after a long motor ride from home, spends the day directing, has dinner, and in the evening goes over scripts with his scenario staff.

Director Charles L. Gaskill, of the Vitagraph company, sent one hundred pennies and a dollar bill to one of his little friends as a Christmas present and wrote this on the box: "Spend the dollar and let the pennies take care of themselves. This is from the revised edition of our old friend, B. Franklin."

Mona Darkfeather gave her friends an anxious time of it recently when she rode her pony "Comanche" over the hills. A bad rainstorm came up and the mountain roads and passes were almost impossible as far as riding was concerned, and Mona had to alternately walk and slide, and she says that it was a matter of alternation as to when she led Comanche or Comanche led her. They arrived home about 10 p. m.

Harry Pollard has started upon the four-reel photoplay entitled "Infatuation," which has been made into scenario form by Mary O'Connor from the book of Lloyd Osborne. In this Margarita Fischer will enact the part of the sprightly Phyllis, and Harry Pollard will play the male lead, as well as direct the photoplay.

Battle scenes, cavalry charges, hand-to-hand fights between native Sepoys and British grenadiers, massacres, wholesale arson, the siege of a fort, the death falls of natives from great heights—all will play a part in the massive production, "The Campbells Are Coming," a multiple-reel feature which Director Francis Ford is now staging at Universal City, Calif.

Walter Edwards recently climbed to the roof of a tall Los Angeles building to play a scene for "The Face on the Ceiling." Of course, someone stopped to stare. Then someone else stopped—soon there was a crowd and the reserves were called, but by the time they arrived Mr. Edwards had disappeared.

Miss Hazel Henderson, who made a distinct impression during her association with the Vitagraph company and who later worked with the Selig organization, has been engaged by the Balboa company of Long Beach, Calif.

Thelma and Beulah Burns, the two youngest leading ladies of the Griffith-Mutual forces, have found a new hero in Eugene Pallette. Jack Adolphi keeps the supply of pink and white-striped candy going, but Mr. Pallette appears to have supplied a sweeter quality of the luxury.

In "The Spirit of Giving," Joseph Harris of the American "Beauty" company has found a new vehicle for his versatility as Stone, the middle-aged business man who, through an accident, gains the true spirit of giving.

Since he was a child of two and for the last thirty-six years Eddie Polo, the latest recruit to the Universal Film Company's west coast studios, has appeared before the amusement public as an acrobat. At Universal City he will repeat before the camera the "stunts" that made him famous among circus people and circus audiences.

To the Room of the Green Rug came Christmas candies and calendars and cards and verbal greetings from many film folk, all of which brought pleasure to the recipient. Among the senders were Louis Selznick, Harry Reichenbach, Fred Beecroft, A. MacArthur, Jr., "Pop" Hoadley, H. A. D'Arcy, N. Lusk, Jack Cunningham, E. A. Kaufman, "Bill" Russell, R. C. Tucker, Valentine Grant, Harry Benham, A. D. Mitchell, "Bill" Barry, "Bill" Sadler, A. L. Haase, J. B. Skerritt, A. J. Lang, C. H. Greene, World Film Corporation, Helen Gardner and Charles Gaskill, William Huffman, Edward Earle and Frank Bannon, and E. J. Mock. Many thanks from the Room.

Among the newcomers at Inceville is Harry G. Keenan, who is to appear in Domino dramas. In the past he has been prominent on the dramatic stage, appearing with Henrietta Crossman and Robert Mantell. His favorite line is a strong actor lead.

For the exclusive benefit of the municipal Christmas tree in San Francisco, the home of the California Motion Picture Corporation, the directors of that organization evidenced their holiday spirit and sanctioned a special view of the new feature film, "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," in a matinee at the Gaiety Theater.

The thrilling Corona automobile races furnish the background for the plot in "The Record Breaker," the rollicking farce just produced by the Komic company. Eddie Pullen, winner of the race, plays the leading role in the picture, for release in the Mutual program, opposite Fay Tincher.

Employed at Inceville is a full-blooded Hawaiian, Kanemoku by name, who was "discovered" by Thomas H. Ince during a trip in the mid-Pacific archipelago. Kanemoku, a man of powerful physique and a wonderful swimmer, now does odd jobs about the Ince camp. Few persons there are aware that this silent islander once made one of the longest swims on record.

William Farnum and one of the deep interiors of "The Sign of the Cross," a Famous Players' production.

"Only a Volunteer," now being made by Director James Durkin at the Thanhouser-Mutual New Rochelle studios, is a story woven around a small town fire department, but presented in a brand new way. It is a good, old-fashioned comedy and makes a fine picture.

Universal Weekly camera men have obtained pictures of Hartlepool and Scarborough, England, which were bombarded by German cruisers a few days ago. The inhabitants of the stricken English coast towns are shown digging their less fortunate fellow citizens from the ruins of their homes.

George Fischer, formerly a stock actor well known in the Middle West, appears as the dashing stalwart college hero of "The Scrub," a play dealing with love and football, to soon be released by Broncho.

The Vitagraph Theater's program for New Year's week, commencing Sunday, December 27, included the most powerful screen story ever presented at this Broadway photoplay house, "The Sins of the Mothers," a five-part drama, produced by Ralph W. Ince from Elaine Sterne's first prize winner in the Sun scenario contest. In producing "The Sins of the Mothers" the Vitagraph company placed the entire resources of their Brooklyn studio at the disposal of Mr. Ince.

In order to aid the children's hospital fund in Los Angeles, Cleo Madison recently appeared on the stage of the Morosco Theater, Los Angeles, with Wilfred Lucas, her director, in "When We Were Twenty-One." Miss Madison's appearance netted the fund $1,200.

Louise Lester still appears now and then in her wild West regalia, which is just as becoming to her as ever. But of late she has been kept so busy "mothering" young stars of the American-Mutual that she hasn't had a chance to go off on any of her whimsical "Calamity Anne" stunts.

George Kleine's "Officer 666" was passed by the Chicago censors last week after an exhibition before an assemblage of city dignitaries which included Major Funkhouser, Chief of Police Gleason, Assistant Chief Schuettler, a battalion of plain clothes men, private secretaries and others.

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company has secured the rights to produce in photoplay form Bruno Lessing's stories of New York's Ghetto life. Murdock MacQuarrie will play leading roles in the forthcoming productions, the first of which will be "An Interruption," adapted from the magazine form by Bess Meredyth of the Universal west coast scenario department.

Maclyn Arbuckle, famous for his representation of the great American types, will be seen as Hi Judd, poet, postmaster and philosopher in "It's No Laughing Matter," a comedy drama produced by Bosworth and directed by Lois Weber.

Loretta Blake will be featured in a new Griffith-Mutual release in the Mutual program which is to be called "Probation," and deals with that court question and its application to criminals.

Thomas H. Ince wants no "fake stuff," and instructed Electrician Casey to install something that would cause real sparks to fly when the burglar touches the wires surrounding the safe in "The Deadly Spark," a Kay Bee release. Later Scott Sidney, who was directing the production, thought he'd just test out the wires. They happened to be going at even greater strength than necessary, and several hours later Sidney admitted in a weak voice that there wasn't any fake about them.

Friends of M. E. Hoffman, right-hand man of Lewis Selznick of the World Film Corporation, were surprised to learn that he left New York about Christmas time for Cleveland on his honeymoon. His bride was formerly Miss Lydia Koch and was private secretary to Mr. Selznick when the latter was with Warner's Features. The marriage occurred on October 14, but the pair kept it a secret until they left on their wedding trip.

Eleanor Woodruff, for two years a Pathe star, will be a Vitagraph "life portrayer" after January 4. Miss Woodruff's acquisition by the Vitagraph Company follows almost on the heels of her statement last week that she had abandoned the screen for a short vacation. It is said that her work for the Vitagraph Company will mainly include appearances in Broadway Star features.

"The High Hand," by Jacques Frutelle, will be the next production of the Favorite Players Film Company. This photoplay, arranged by Richard Willis, will be directed by William D. Taylor. A five-part film will be made from this famous story, and the leading part will be taken by Carlyle Blackwell.

Thomas Commerford's erect military bearing lends a realistic atmosphere to the part he takes in George Barr McCutcheon's "Graustark," which is being filmed by Essanay.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

General Program

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 87—DECEMBER 21.—This issue contains views of a submarine boat hauled through the streets of San Francisco, California, to the exposition grounds; the opening of the new Woman's Congressional Club in Washington, D. C.; the U. S. custom house at Naco, Arizona, protected from the rain of Mexican bullets just across the border; three torpedo boats dry docked at Charleston navy yard, and in the war section pictures of the British troops near Arras.

Pathe Daily News No. 88—DECEMBER 23.—This issue contains pictures of Red Fox James, a Crow Indian, who rode all the way from Montana to Washington to ask the president to set aside October 12 as American-Indian Day; Mrs. Walter Breck of West Orange, N. J., who has been missing from her home since December 14, information regarding whom is much desired; Harry K. Thaw, who is ordered back to Matteawan; a conference of representatives of eight South American nations on the neutrality of South American waters. In the war section views taken at Meuse, Belgium; London, England; Lisbon, Portugal; Fishes and Ramscapelle, France, are shown.

Pathe Daily News No. 89—PATHE—DECEMBER 28.—This issue of the weekly contains views of the oyster industry, showing how the savory bivalves are grown and gathered; views of winter sports in a number of cities, showing skating on the lakes in the vicinity of St. Paul, skeeing at Ottawa, Canada, and children playing in the snow in other cities. In the war section are views taken at Pervyse, France; Aershot and Brecht, Belgium; Brighton, England, and near Verdun and Nevelle, France.

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 88—SELIG—DECEMBER 31.—One sees in this issue of the weekly thousands of bird houses built by children of Toledo, Ohio; citizens of San Diego, California, gathered to attend a public concert on the new exposition grounds; damage wrought by a recent gale at Alamitos Bay and Long Beach, California; views of Uncle Sam's troopers at Naco, Arizona, on the Mexican border, and hundreds of barges and boats gathered at Erie basin for the winter.

Getting Father's Goat—KALEM—JANUARY 1—Judge Barr's daughter, Helen, tired of society life, determines to be a reporter and in her father's court that day meets Jack, a young clubman, and the two are mutually attracted. Later Helen accidentally discovers a gambling house and arranges to have the place raided by the police. Jack and Helen's father are in the place when it is raided and Judge Barr barely escapes being captured. When the prisoners are arraigned in his court, he sentences Jack to ten days at hard labor, but Helen has secured one of her father's I.O.U.s and with this manages to get the judge to release Jack. Marshall Neilan and Ethel Teare featured.

It is our aim to make this department as complete as possible, although to do this, we must have the co-operation of all the manufacturers of film in the United States. If brief stories of the films you are releasing this week are not contained in this department, it must be due to the fact that you have not supplied us with synopsis sheets. In that case please see that we are advised of your film titles and release dates, and furnished with a brief synopsis of the story. This department is intended for every film manufacturer, whether he uses our advertising pages or not.

The Girl Telegrapher's Peril—KALEM—JANUARY 2.—Another of the "Hazards of Helen" series in which Helen Holmes is featured. Blake, a telephone lineman, is injured and Helen cares for him, but rejects his proposal. Later Blake strikes Pete, a tramp telegrapher, and Helen goes to Pete's aid. Later Helen catches sight of Blake's three-year-old daughter crossing a high trestle over which the Elmwood Express is soon to pass. Running down the track Helen seizes the little girl in her arms and jumps off into the river beneath the trestle, just in time to avoid being struck by the train. Pete rescues Helen and the little girl from the river and Blake begs the forgiveness of both.

From the Shadow—BIOGRAPH—JANUARY 4.—Molnair, an employee of the Harmon Brokerage Company and in love with Harmon's daughter, is despondent when the girl refuses his proposal and plans to commit suicide. Meanwhile Harmon's son embezzles from the firm. Panic-stricken, he confesses to his sister and she suggests they get Molnair to help them. When the boy appeals to Molnair the latter conceives the idea of himself confessing the crime. The girl's father and brother visit Molnair's room and arrive in time to prevent his death. Finding the note confessing that he is the embezzler, the girl realizes his devotion and decides she loves him after all.

The Champion Process-Server—EDISON—JANUARY 4.—As Champion, the process server, Arthur Housman, is glue personified, but he finds a knight worth his metal in William Wadsworth's impersonation of Flighty, the swindler, who is never in when there is a subpoena to be served on him. The success of Lawyer Ketchem's case depends on Flighty's being brought into court before 4 o'clock, the adjourning time. But no one who has been commissioned to subpoena Flighty has so much as seen him. He is out of the world entirely as far as serving a summons on him is concerned. Champion happens into the lawyer's office and promises to bring in Flighty. The manner in which he accomplishes the feat makes an unusually funny comedy that is well worth booking.

Sweedie and the Sultan's Present—ESSANAY—JANUARY 4.—Wallace Beery and Ben Turpin have the leads in this farce. While the action at times is humorous, it drags in some places, but will be popular in houses where others of this series have "gone big." In the opening scenes Sweedie's domestic difficulties are illustrated, ending with her pitching her husband from the house. She falls asleep and dreams that the Sultan of Puff-Puff sent a servant to her as a present and forces her to accept by threatening her life. When her husband objects there is a strenuous argument, with the result that the sultan orders her to behead him. Just as she is about to wield the butcher knife she wakes up and finds her husband at her side, and again handles him in anything but a gentle manner and heads him for the sidewalk.

Cast Up by the Sea—KALEM—(Two Reels)—January 4—Lockwood, a professional gambler, meets and falls in love with Ruth Adams, daughter of a millionaire. He finds a rival in Count Dupont, a fortune hunter, who, after exposing Lockwood's profession, manages to marry Ruth. Ruth's father is ruined and the Duponts sail for Europe. Enroute their boat is sunk and Ruth, her husband and Lockwood, who has followed, are washed ashore on an island. Ruth learns that Lockwood is by far the preferable of the two men, but when the gambler builds a raft just large enough for two and aims to sail away, Ruth drops a bundle from which falls a tiny garment and Lockwood then realizes that it is Dupont who should be rescued with Ruth, and returns to the island. Dupont, learning the reason for the return, swears to turn over a new leaf and with Ruth sails away on the raft.

Patsy's First Love—(EPISODE NUMBER TWO OF THE PATSY BOLIVAR SERIES)—LUBIN—JANUARY 4.—Patsy, who is hopelessly in love with his school-mistress, Mary, is shocked to learn that Mary, within a few days, is to marry Jack Prince. Patsy endeavors to end it all by drinking a bottle of rheumatic liniment, but his sister interferes and bundles him off to school. At school, Jane tries to declare her love for Patsy, but the boy tells her he is sorry for her, but his heart is another's. The school board orders a holiday in honor of Mary's approaching marriage and they all go to help Mary decorate her new home. Patsy, after being nearly torn to pieces by trying to umpire a ball game, climbs a tree to see what's going on in Mary's new home, and is injured when the branch breaks. As a result of a clash with Sykesy, his deadly rival, Patsy sees his new long pants ruined, and to get even with Sykesy pours a bottle of nitric acid down his back. Clarence Elmer featured.

The Strange Case of Princess Khan—Selig—(Two Reels)—January 4.—A story of hypnotism, powerful in its appeal. Dawson, an author, attends a hypnotic exhibition and sees what is alleged to be the body of an Indian princess made to appear before his eyes. Later he comes into possession of a note which leads him to think the girl alive and being persecuted. With the aid of his friends he rescues her and eventually becomes her husband. Stella Razeto and Guy Oliver featured. See review on page 5, issue of Jan. 2.

Treachery in the Clouds—Vitagraph—(First Episode of "The Fates of Flora Fourflush")—January 4.—Frank Goodheart, a poor street cleaner, is run over by the automobile of Flora Fourflush and taken to her home to recuperate. When Sir Simon Blackheart's love is scorned by Flora and he attempts to seize a kiss, Frank hurls himself on the rascal and rescues Flora. Flora proposes, but Frank insists he must first make his fortune. Frank later foils the plan of Sir Simon to blow up Flora by a bomb sent through the mail. Blackheart next steals the engine of Flora's aeroplane and when she sets out in the great race across the ocean the airship wabbles terribly. Frank, watching through his glasses, realizes Flora's danger, and, jumping into a balloon, soars upward to rescue her. Sir Simon, witnessing Frank's rescue of Flora, sends a bullet into the gas bag of the balloon and both Frank and Flora are hurled to earth. Their adventures will be continued in another film.

Money—Biograph—(Two Parts)—January 5.—Mordaunt, a millionaire, is visited by his brother-in-law, Sir James Vesey, his wife and daughter, Georgina, also by Sir Frederick, a cousin, and Clara, a distant relative. Later Alfred Evelyn, a poor relative, calls and is snubbed by the Veseys and Sir Frederick, though Clara welcomes him. Mordaunt is friendly toward the only relative who does not fawn on him and when Alfred declares that he badly needs ten pounds for his foster mother, Mordaunt suggests that he work for it and Alfred becomes a servant. Clara sends the money anonymously to Alfred's mother and Alfred, not aware of the fact, continues to work for Mordaunt, though he is openly sneered at by the other relatives. Mordaunt, dying, wills everything to Alfred and the other relatives immediately seek his good graces. The Vesey's plan to marry him to Georgina and report that Clara has eloped with Sir Frederick. At length, suspicious that they want his money, Alfred pretends to have gambled and to have lost everything and the relatives all turn from him. As a further test he sends Clara a huge sum of money and the girl later returns it to him, to do with it as he will. Meanwhile he discovers that it was Clara who sent the ten pounds to his mother and declares his love for her, making known the fact that he is very wealthy, the gambling having been a mere ruse, and the wealthy relatives retire discomfited.

Olive and the Burglar—Edison—January 5.—Olive becomes a charity worker in this chapter of the "Olive's Opportunities" series, and is the means of saving a poor degenerate from prison. Returning from an unsuccessful attempt at burglary one night, Ballard finds his little child dying, and his wife sprawled across the table in a drunken stupor. He arouses the woman and rushes off to the settlement house for help. Ballard enters the reception room just as Olive refuses Vance Coleman's engagement ring. The temptation proves too much for the man and he enters Vance's house later and steals the ring. In the meantime Olive has cared for the child and sent for a doctor, but the baby is beyond recovery and dies before Ballard returns home. The police follow him into the house and attempt to arrest him, but Olive allays their suspicions and they leave, believing that they have made a mistake in their man.

The Gallantry of "Jimmy" Rogers—Essanay—January 5.—This splendid single-reel production accomplishes what has often been tried on the screen, but which has seldom proven successful—the springing of a surprise. A young man, Jimmy Rogers, sees a girl friend being threatened by one of the guests at a dinner party and later, when he consults the girl, she tells him of a former love affair which the villainous guest now threatens to expose to her sweetheart and tells him that some letters are his only evidence. The gallant young man prowls about the house at night and eventually secures the letters. As he is leaving the house, however, he falls into the arms of a policeman. He is marched into the parlor, where he is greeted by the laughter of all the guests and informed that the entire affair was arranged by the "villainous" guest to avenge an April fool prank played on him by Rogers. The story was adopted from the Smart Set magazine, and Francis X. Bushman, Bryant Washburn, Addison Maderia and Lillian Drew have the leading roles. The reviewer has no hesitancy in recommending this picture to the manager of any house, regardless of location.

The Waitress and the Boobs—Kalem—January 5.—Hicks, a patent medicine faker, with his partner, Della, falls into hard times and learning that the Greasy Vest Restaurant is in need of a waitress Della, disguised as a Dutch maid, secures the job. Soon all the male populace of the town are infatuated with the new waitress and Della promises to wed each of a dozen men, upon the understanding that each will present her with a diamond ring. Hicks owns the only ring and sells it time and again to Della's suitors, it each time being returned to him. On the day of the wedding, the suitors gather at the church, but the fair Della fails to appear and later they see her leave town with Hicks.

The New Editor—Lubin—January 5.—Wellington Jones, editor of the Gazette, being unable to collect from advertisers, roasts them, and then sells out the paper to Horace Gink. Colonel Gore, a politician, Luke McGluke, a prize fighter, and Josephine Boggs, a boarding house keeper, aroused by the roasts they have received in the paper, visit the office and lick the editor. Later Luke McGluke gets into a street fight, is handcuffed and, breaking away from the officer, seeks safety in the editor's office. Gink, seeing the bully's helpless condition proceeds to pommel him. The news spreads that the new editor has conquered the biggest bully in the village and all hustle to pay their bills. On the same reel is:—

They Looked Alike—Lubin—January 5.—Bill and Sam, two tramps, look so much alike that they fool the cops completely. The policeman that set out to chase Bill is run off his feet when Bill and Sam alternate in being chased. Finally the police discover the ruse of the tramps and both are captured and compelled to drag a wagonload of policemen back to the station.

Two Women—Vitagraph—(Three Reels)—January 5.—This is the first of the Broadway Star features to be released on the regular program, and has as its lead Anita Stewart and Earle Williams. John Emerson worships his beautiful, misguided wife, Cleo, although the wife flirts with John's employer, Robert Lawler. John, broken in health and spirit, leaves for the North woods and there meets Anita of the woodland, and after telling her of his past confesses his love for her. Mr. and Mrs. Lawler visit Europe and there Lawler tires of Cleo and becomes enamored of another. Cleo, now a widow, returns to New York and finally locates John in the North woods, but he scorns her and clasps Anita in his arms.

A Militant School Ma'am—Selig—January 5.—A picture that bubbles over with laughter. Gerald Bruce, a motion picture actor, after a dispute with his director, is discharged and becomes a school teacher. He falls in love with Ruth Winters, the school director's daughter, but when Ruth's father learns that he is keeping the girl after school to spoon with her Gerald loses his job as a teacher. Not to be foiled, Gerald makes up as a woman, comes back, again obtains the position of teacher and is allowed to spoon with Ruth to his heart's content. After inducing half the cowboys in the county to propose to him and leading even Ruth's father to make love to him, Gerald captures a cattle thief and is discovered to be not a woman, but his real self. Ruth's father is so pleased, however, over his capture of the thief that he consents to his daughter's marriage. N. G. C.

The Fable of the City Grafter and the Unprotected Rubes—ESSANAY—JANUARY 6.—The fact that the "shake-down" was invented in a small town is the idea around which this George Ade comedy was built. A band of "get-rich-quick" men go to a small town, where they plan to "clean up" the natives. The rubes think they have lots of money and take advantage of the fact by charging them double prices on everything they buy. The city men think it is a good gamble and spend their money liberally, but when they try to "cash in" they find themselves mixed up with the law, which extracts their last penny. They then start to walk back to the city where they can earn an "honest" living by grafting. Rapley Holmes, Robert Bolder and Leo White furnish considerable amusement as the would-be Wallingfords. C. J. C.

The Scorpion's Sting—KALEM—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 6.—An unusual picture, the ending of which is to be decided by the photoplay patrons of the country. Mann, a crook, shoots Marston, who has caught him in his home robbing his safe, and the murderer succeeds in escaping. Lyda, Marston's daughter, is accused of the crime, having quarreled with her father, but is eventually acquitted. Fate leads her to the same hotel in which Mann is staying and the two fall in love. Mann gives Lyda as a betrothal ring, a ring taken from the safe in her own home and the girl recognizes it as one belonging to her mother. She soon decides that the man she loves is the murderer of her father. Mann plans next day to take Lyda rowing on the lake, confess his past and ask the girl to help him reform. The girl, at the same time, decides to ask Mann to take her rowing and while on the lake accuse him of the murder, capsize the boat and perish in the water with him. As the picture closes one sees Mann and Lyda on the dock preparing to go rowing. The boat glides away and the finish of the picture is a sub-title requesting patrons of the theaters to write the National Board of Censorship what they would do if they found themselves in the same situation which confronts Lyda and Mann. Alice Hollister is featured in the production.

Comrade Kitty—LUBIN—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 6.—Hicks, proprietor of a face powder plant, desires his son Ned to marry Alice Trent, one of Hicks' most wealthy customers, but Ned insists on marrying Kitty of the shipping department. Hicks sends Ned with an engagement ring to call on the Trents and at the same time secure an order for a half million dollars worth of face powder. Ned takes Kitty with him and en route they encounter Colonel Martin, a former confederate soldier, who accompanies them. When they meet Alex Sweet, son of a rival face powder manufacturer, also after the big order, the colonel gets Alex drunk, so that Ned can arrive first on the scene. A ball is in progress at the Trent home and things are moving very slow until Ned suggests that the colonel pose as a count and Kitty as a countess, and suggests that as a novelty, Kitty distribute samples of face powder. This makes such a hit that Ned secures the order, marries Kitty and returns home to receive the blessing of his father. Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe featured.

In the Line of Duty—SELIG—JANUARY 6.—Helen Brandt, society editor of a newspaper, engaged to marry Robert Carter, who poses as a society man, but who is really a jewel thief, accidentally bumps into "Mickey" Turner, Carter's accomplice, and when he drops his pocketbook Helen secures it. At a function she is attending Miss Lamont, a guest, loses a diamond pendant and Carter is accused of the theft, much to Helen's indignation. Later, through pawn tickets in the pocketbook dropped by Mickey, she finds clews which lead to her discovery of the truth, when she immediately exposes Carter to the police. N. G. C.

Billy's Wager—VITAGRAPH—JANUARY 6.—Mr. Billy and Count De Meaux are rivals for the hand of the handsome widow, Mrs. Constance. A wager of $5,000 is made that Billy cannot earn his living for one month without help, and the widow promises to marry him if he wins it. Billy makes known the wages and invites all to attend a big party at his home on Hallowe'en. After some terrifying and discouraging experiences, he finds himself on the last day a hobo in the bread line. Then, remembering that it is the final day of his bet, he decides to return home and claim the widow, but is stopped by two policemen, who arrest him, and at 11:15 is thrown into a cell, and with only forty-five minutes' time Billy succeeds in getting Mrs. Constance to rescue him and appears among his guests on the stroke of 12. The count proves to be a crook and though Billy loses the $5,000, he wins the widow. Billy Quirk and Constance Talmadge featured.

Playthings of Fate—BIOGRAPH—JANUARY 7.—Unknown to Dr. Ross and his wife, Mrs. Ross has a double, a woman of the world. When Dr. Ross finds a child on the streets, he returns it to its guardian and there sees a picture of the other woman, whom he learns is the child's mother. On account of the striking likeness to his own wife, he is suspicious that his wife is leading a double life and plans to disown her. Called to operate on a child at the hospital, whose life can only be saved by a wonderful serum, he recognizes the child he returned home and is tempted to let it die. He finally overcomes the temptation and when the mother comes to thank him and he sees the two women together, he realizes the injustice he has done his wife, who really loves him.

The Battle of Snakeville—ESSANAY—JANUARY 7.—Considerable throwing of tomatoes, potatoes and other vegetables and a liberal application of water, via a hose, furnish the laugh-getters in this production. The well known Snakeville character actors—Victor Potel, Harry Todd, Margaret Joslin and Ernest Van Pelt—have the leading roles. The proprietor of the O. K. Hotel secure a lady cook, thereby taking the trade away from his Chinese competitor. Slim and Mustang Pete quarrel over the new cook and their quarrel results in the throwing of vegetables. When the sheriff and his men try to break up the fight, Slim and Mustang Pete unite forces and bombard them with aforesaid missiles. The hose then appears in the scene and by this means they are eventually forced to surrender. C. J. C.

A War Baby—LUBIN—JANUARY 7.—When the Civil War opens duty calls Captain Willis of the northern army from his bride, Louise, daughter of the Confederate officer, Colonel Frear. At the same time, Belle Daring, a zealous Confederate, breaks her engagement with Lieutenant Fiske of the Union troops, though he vows to return for her at the close of the war. A year later Willis has been assigned to capture Belle, who has become a famous Confederate spy. While on duty, Louise, his wife, determines to visit her husband and writes him to meet her at Simpson's Corners. He is delayed and learns upon his arrival that Louise has passed through with another woman, whom he guesses is Belle. Louise and Belle are captured by two officers and Belle persuades Louise to take the paper which she carries and gets a pass through the Union lines in exchange, since Louise is the wife of a Union officer and would not be searched. Belle then escapes with the baby. Louise is mistaken for Belle and with her husband is sentenced to be shot, when the general refuses to pardon them. Belle visits the general and offers to give up the famous Confederate spy if he will delay the execution. The general consents and Belle confesses her identity. Clarence Elmer, Justina Huff and Lilie Leslie featured.

Alias Greased Lightning—Mina—January 7.—Luck being against poor Verace, the landlord is just about to evict him from his humble "furnished" room when a message arrives saying that Verace has been left an enormous fortune by the will of his uncle. Verace immediately writes his sweetheart and, after donning his finest raiment, sets out to meet her at the ferry. Meanwhile a reward of $500 has been offered for the capture of "Alias Greased Lightning," a desperate crook. Verace is mistaken by the police for this fugitive and after some difficulty manages to elude his would-be captors. Numerous comical situations take place and the story reaches its climax with the explosion of a powder mill, the frustration of the cops and the escape of the much abused lovers.

The Man, the Mission and the Maid—Vitagraph—January 7.—Hal Gilman and Alice Blanchard are childhood friends and playmates. Hal goes to college and while there makes a bitter enemy of Bert Peyson by exposing him as a card cheat. Returning to Oakdale, Hal finds Alice a young woman, and in love with a man whom her father strongly disapproves of. Hal leaves again for the city to take up settlement work and Alice, journeying on the same train, confesses to Hal that she is running away to elope with her lover. Arrived in the city, the lover proves to be Bert Peyson, and Hal interferes and gives Bert two minutes to disappear. Alice is grateful to Hal for having saved her and is taken to a hotel by him, where they find a telegram addressed to Mrs. Hal Gilman, their parents having jumped at the conclusion that the two are eloping. The two decide to make the supposition real and are married. Dorothy Kelly and James Morrison featured.

The Barrier Between—Biograph—January 8.—Told that he has but two years to live, John Morgan decides to disillusion Ethel Ware, his fiancee, so that she will suffer less when the engagement is broken. At a cabaret performance which Ethel attends, John makes an exhibition of himself with another woman and Ethel breaks the engagement and marries George Gordon. John goes abroad after renting his apartment to Ralph Travers, Gordon's partner. Her husband, intent on business, Ethel flirts with Travers and finally attends a supper party in his room. John, returning home unexpectedly from abroad, finds her there. Gordon accidentally calls and finding Ethel's handkerchief in the room suspects the worst. John saves the situation by declaring, "She came out of pity to bid me good-bye, as I am going away forever," and then vanishes from her life.

Surgeon Warren's Ward—Essanay—(Two Reels)—January 8.—Captain Gordon ruins Surgeon Warren's character and causes his dismissal from the army in order to win the hand of Alice, Warren's ward. Later his crooked work is discovered and he is forced to marry Alice and flee. They reach the North woods, where they again encounter Warren. This time Gordon's manhood asserts itself and he takes his own life, leaving Alice and Warren free to love. A review of this subject will be found on page 15 of the January 2 issue.

Put Me Off at Wayville—Kalem—January 8.—Billy is on his way to Wayville to marry Betty Burton. Jasper, an escaped convict, boards the train, compels Billy to change clothes with him and then throws the boy off the train. Billy had ordered the porter to call him at Wayville and mistaking the number of the berth, the porter rouses and puts off the train Sammy Green, a newlywed. Meanwhile Jasper has learned of Billy's mission and resolves to impersonate him, since Billy is to receive $5,000 as a wedding gift. Jasper succeeds in getting the money, but attempting to escape from the Burton home is cornered by the bull dog. Billy eventually manages, with the aid of Sammy, to convince the sheriff of his identity and all proceed to Burton's where Jasper is arrested.

Love's Savage Hate—Lubin—January 8.—Andreas Monero, a wealthy Mexican, lives with his wife and daughter, Anita, in a hacienda near the border. Anita is loved by both Gabriel Romero, from the city, and Jose Fulano, a miner, but is unable to decide which she loves best. When the hacienda is attacked by Miguel Paredis, a bandit, the Morenos and Gabriel retreat to Jose's cabin, where they can defend themselves, and there Anita makes known that she loves Gabriel the best of the two men. Five days later when the provisions are all but exhausted, the defenders of the cabin draw cuts to see who will go for aid and Gabriel is selected. Jose suggests that he take a certain route in the hope that his rival will be wiped out, and Anita later learns that Gabriel has been captured, as Jose had foreseen. She rescues him and later the two, by hurling a box of dynamite into the camp of the bandits, destroy them all and rescue the party in the cabin. Velma Whitman and L. C. Shumway featured.

The Strenuous Life—Selig—January 8.—A ridiculous burlesque of the "feature thriller" in which Gladys Willing, a simple village girl, is pursued through African jungles, tied to a railroad track in front of an oncoming train, confined in a cage with wild beasts, and otherwise persecuted by Velis Canby, the "villyun." Manly Fellows, after rescuing Gladys from a number of dangerous places, decides that the life of a hero is too strenuous and marries Gladys' mother. Elsie Greeson featured.

N. G. C.

The Smoking Out of Bella Butts—Vitagraph—January 8.—Bella Butts, secretary of the Anti-Smoking Society, inaugurates such a campaign against smoking that soon not a man in the town dares light a cigar, and the mayor has to order the one cigar store closed. As time passes the men become so irritable that their wives regret giving in to Miss Butts' strong-mindedness. A cigar salesman appears in the town and his entire stock is instantly purchased, the men retiring to a shed to smoke. Miss Butts, passing by, turns in a fire alarm when she sees the smoke, and Farmer Jones is the fireman to respond. After the water is turned off a delegation is formed which escorts Bella Butts out of the town and insists that she stay out. Flora Finch featured.

A Safe Adventure—Biograph—January 9.—Mr. Bond sells his safe to Isaac's auction house. Mr. Curl buys it and after many adventures has it delivered to his home. Meanwhile Mr. Bond discovers he has left something valuable in the safe and starts in pursuit. After an exciting chase he finds the safe and recovers—his favorite pair of slippers. On the same reel—

The Fashion Shop—Biograph—January 9.—O'Splash and Fudge, proprietors of a fashion shop, have a terrible time to please a fat lady who, as Percy Partthare remarked, could not be fitted with a horse blanket. The next customer is a pretty woman who flirts with all the men, while her husband waits in an auto outside. Enraged at the delay, the husband enters and discovers his wife flirting and starts to wreck the shop. The policeman eventually quiets the rumpus and is consoled by the attentions of the operatives.

Girl Who Earns Her Own Living" series, featuring Gertrude McCoy. The love affair between the girl telegraph operator and the hotel clerk in the little village of Fairlawn gets along famously until the arrival of Joe Welton, known to the police as "Frisco Joe." He and his two comrades, Simpson and Hughes, plan to hold up number nine, which carries a large shipment of gold, and cut the telegraph wires to shut off communication with the next town. In his hurry in leaving the hotel one of the crooks has taken the clerk's hat instead of his own. The girl operator finds her lover's hat near the spot where the wires are cut and naturally suspects him of being the guilty one. Using a speeder, she meets the train several miles outside the village, flags it, warns the man in charge of the gold shipment of the intended robbery, and receives a generous sum of money collected among the passengers. Frisco Joe and his pals are captured and the hotel clerk vindicated.

Broncho Billy and the Claim Jumpers—ESSANAY—JANUARY 9.—By combining several trite incidents of the Western melodrama in a refreshing manner, this production places itself high above par of the average picture of this kind. It deals with the attempt of some claim jumpers to secure Broncho Billy's mine and the loyalty of the stage coach driver's daughter to Broncho. The claim jumpers plan to place

Broncho Billy in a position where he can not register his claim by having the driver of the stage coach "doped." Their plan succeeds and they ride off to the registration office, but the driver's daughter takes her father's place and passes the claim jumpers on the road, bringing Broncho to the office first. Broncho Billy rewards her by registering the claim in her name, as well as his, and claims her as his bride. G. M. Anderson, Lee Willard and Marguerite Clayton featured. C. J. C.

The Leap from the Water Tower—KALEM—JANUARY 9.—This is the ninth episode of the "Hazards of Helen" series. Rand, a fireman who has been discharged on a complaint made by Wadsworth, engineer of the through freight, plans to cause the engineer's death and a day or two later renders the air brakes useless by closing an angle valve between two cars. The scoundrel then attempts to escape on a passenger train, but falls and is badly injured. A lineman who goes to his assistance learns Rand's story and wires Helen, the operator at Lone Point. Meanwhile the runaway train is going faster and faster, since Wadsworth cannot work the air brakes. Helen, realizing the peril, dashes to a water tower, which extends over the track, climbs out on the spout and drops down on the speeding freight train as it dashes beneath. Making her way over the cars, she repairs the air valve which had been closed by Rand and the runaway is finally halted. Helen Holmes featured.

Feel My Muscle—LUBIN—JANUARY 9.—Will Denver and his wife, Mary, fail as a vaudeville acrobatic team, and Will, with his wife's clothing and a wig, seeks and obtains a job as physical instructor of a woman's gym. He makes an instant hit and no one suspects. One of the girls, Jane, has a sweetheart, Harry, who falls in love with the instructor. Will is horrified but has to go on playing the part. Nights, to get a little freedom, he dons men's clothes and takes walks. He encounters Harry trying to make up with Jane, and seeing a chance to square matters, when Jane insists Harry is insulting her, Will goes to the rescue and escorts Jane away. Jane is promptly infatuated with her lover and Will finds himself sought after as both a man and a woman. Will's wife finally arrives and Harry, seeing her with him, hurries to find Jane and expose her lover. Explanations finally occur and Harry gets back his sweetheart and Will is saved his job. Joseph Kaufman featured.

Further Adventures of Sammy Orpheus—SELIG—JANUARY 9.—Another story of the roving flute player, Sammy Orpheus, whose skill as a musician time and again saves his life. Sammy has some terrific experiences with a pair of lions, is captured by pirates and barely escapes with his life, and is again beset by beasts of the jungle, but the marvelous tunes which he plays on his flute charms the beasts and eventually permits him to escape and again discover his long-lost sweetheart, Bowery Jennie. Thomas Santchi, Bessie Eyeton featured.

A Daughter of Israel—VITAGRAPH—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 9.—Olga, a Russian refugee, leaves her child in the care of Israel Levi when she is compelled to go to a hospital. On the way there she is run over and killed by an automobile, and Israel, with the help of Mrs. Benjamin, a good-natured widow, brings up the child as his own. On her fourteenth birthday Israel gets Rachel a fine violin, and Rosenstein, hearing the child play, goes into raptures and interests a great Russian violinist, Ivan Strominoff, in her. Later Ivan's cousin, Loris, arrives and becomes enamored of Rachel, but Ivan refuses his consent to the match with "the daughter of Israel." Rachel, heartbroken, appeals to Israel, who tells Strominoff that Rachel is not a Jewess and not his daughter. He exhibits the wedding ring left by Rachel's mother and the engraving discloses to Strominoff that Rachel is his own daughter. There is a happy reunion and Israel at once gives his consent to Rachel's marriage with Loris. Van Dyke Brooke and Norma Talmadge featured.

Mutual Program

Mutual Weekly No. 105—MUTUAL—DECEMBER 31.—This issue of the Weekly shows the mailing of 500,000 letters written by Californians announcing the opening of Panama-Pacific Exposition; a motorcycle hill-climbing contest at Washington, D. C.; $500,000 fire at Springfield, Ohio; the winners of a twenty-four hour roller skating race at Madison Square Garden, New York City; the dedication of a new $3,000,000 cathedral at St. Louis, Missouri, and in the war section views of English artillery leaving London, ruins along the Oise River and numerous other scenes from the war zone.

The Legend Beautiful—AMERICAN—TWO REELS)—JANUARY 4.—Pietro swindles his brother Jose out of his share of their father's estate and the wronged man vows he will kill the other. After years of waiting he returns only to bow before a greater power, when he hears his brother's child tell of the "legend beautiful." A complete review will be found on page 45 of this issue.

Our Mutual Girl—RELIANCE—(CHAPTER 51)—JANUARY 4.—Arrangements are made for James Montgomery Flagg to meet and appear in a picture with Our Mutual Girl. Mr. Flagg arives at the appointed time at the Reliance studio at 29 Union Square, and, after being detained until identified by the doorman, enters the room of the green lights. Margaret, however, is late and while waiting for her the artist makes a sketch of the fat camera man. When Margaret arrives she and Mr. Flagg are photographed together. The director's assistant, who is staging a scene for "Runaway June" in the adjoining set, recognizes in Mr. Flagg the proper type for one of the parts and, thinking him an extra, orders him onto the stage. The artist stifles Margaret's excited protest with a sign and for the next half hour works diligently in the scene. At its completion he is paid two dollars, his first salary as a motion picture actor, and invests the money in a box of candy for Our Mutual Girl.

Her Menacing Past—THANHOUSER—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 5.—Anna Sanderson, trained by her father in the tricks of burglary, loves the life for its thrill of adventure. A fall while trying to scale a high wall renders her unconscious and completely blots out her memory. Realizing that neither of them can escape if he continues to carry his daughter, Sanderson places the girl in the vestibule of a house and makes his get-away. The young doctor and his mother, who are the residents of the house, find the girl, revive her and keep her in their home. A strong affection springs up between Anna and the doctor, and they later become married. The magnetism of the "menacing past" returns to tempt the girl with renewed vigor when her memory is restored by a fall from a horse, but it is quickly vanquished when she considers that she will have to give up the one man she loves in order to answer the call.

His Lesson—MAJESTIC—JANUARY 5.—"Bat" Murray, boss of the Seventh ward, meets Dorothy Randall, a banker's daughter and settlement worker, and mistakes her charitable interest in him for love. Thereafter he neglects his old sweetheart, Mamie, and tries to make himself worthy of Dorothy. "Bat" is elected councilman and later runs for the legislature. He learns that the boys of his old ward are against him for his high-brow ideas, and, to regain his prestige, "Bat" gives a grand ball and invites Dorothy. A fire breaks out and all escape but Mamie, who has returned to recover an expensive fan she borrowed for the ball. "Bat" rushes into the blazing building and rescues her, but is badly burned in so doing. In the weary days at the hospital it is Mamie who sits by his bedside. Dorothy sends flowers and sympathy. "Bat" then realizes that it is to Mamie that his love belongs.

In the Vale of Sorrow—BEAUTY—JANUARY 5.—A strong feeling of human interest pervades this film and the characters of a poor man, his wife and a rich old man are splendidly drawn by Joseph Harris, Virginia Kirtley and Fred Gamble. Miss Kirtley has her first opportunity in a dramatic role since joining this company, and though she is not convincing at all times she does very good work and appears to have a promising future before her. The plot deals with the sale of a child by a mother forced into desperate circumstances.

The father is ill and not expected to live, and when a rich man in whose home she has found work remarks that he would give $1,000 for a child like hers the desperate mother accepts the offer. Time passes and the father recovers. The mother tells him that the baby is dead, but later he finds it in the rich man's home. The latter understands the situation and says that he found the child on the street, sacrificing his own happiness that the wife's folly may not be discovered and that the poor family may be happily reunited.

The Alarm of Angelon—American—January 6.—George Field again demonstrates his ability as a character actor in this production and is ably supported by Ed. Coxen, Winnifred Greenwood, Josephine Ditt, John Steppling and Edith Borilla. Angelon, a poor Italian, comes to America to seek his fortune, leaving his wife and children behind. He is befriended by a young attorney and his fiancee, who are interested in settlement work. When he mistakes a fire alarm for a mail box he is arrested and sent to prison, this occurring directly after he had sent for his family. They arrive in America and are thrown upon the mercy of the city, but are rescued from a man of evil intent by the attorney's fiancee. Angelon's children are sent out to play and sing on the street and see their father in jail. Through the influence of the attorney he is freed and happily united to his family. The attorney then decides to help himself and secures the girl's consent to marry him. C. J. C.

A Night's Adventure—Reliance—January 6.—Dr. Watson is on his way east. As the train stops at a way station the doctor is informed that Granby, a section boss, is injured. He hastens to the injured man. The doctor is interested in the case and also in Granby's pretty daughter, May. He relieves Granby's agony, then finds that there won't be a train till morning, and is directed to the Red Horse hotel. In the back room of the hotel a faro game is in progress and the doctor starts to play. He wins all the money in sight. Bland, the gambler, and his assistants, Jack and Bill, conspire with the landlord to give him knockout drops, intending to rob him later. The doctor, who has only pretended to drink the drugged liquor, sees Bland's hand come through the opening of the panel, grasps it, then uses his hypodermic needle and injects morphine into the gambler's wrist. He drags the unconscious gambler into the room and, taking his bag, he starts downstairs. At the foot of the stairs the landlord and Jack and Bill are waiting. The doctor swings his coat, knocks over the lamp and escapes in the darkness, but is pursued. He hides in the shadow and allows them to pass, then makes his way to the cottage of the injured man. He tells May to get some rest, so May retires to her room in the attic. Jack and Bill discover the doctor. May hears them from the attic and with the aid of a blanket she manages to get from the attic window to the ground and run for help. The doctor is overpowered and about to receive his death blow when May arrives with help.

"The Collingsby Pearls"—Reliance—January 8.—John Collingsby is a wealthy broker. He buys his wife a string of pearls and she causes an article to be put in the society columns of a paper, describing the jewels. A sudden reverse comes to Mr. Collingsby and he is in need of a large sum of money. He pledges his wife's pearls unknown to her and has a duplicate set made. Dowling, a society thief, plans to steal the pearls. A member of the gang, to avenge himself on Dowling, steals the substitute pearls. Both he and Darling enter the house at the same time and have a terrific battle in the dark. The other man injures Dowling and he falls unconscious. The burglar makes away with the jewel casket. The fight awakens Mrs. Collingsby, who goes to the assistance of Dowling, whom she does not suspect, as he explains that he was passing the house, saw the burglar and entered to stop the theft. Mrs. Collingsby sends for a doctor and is attending the burglar when her husband returns home. He denounces her for supposed infidelity. She then tells him of the loss of the pearls. The successful burglar has been caught. He confronts Dowling and exposes him to the police. Mrs. Collingsby opens the jewel casket to find it is empty, the burglar, before being arrested, having taken the pearls and passed them to a confederate. Collingsby brings forth the real pearls and returns them with a warning against making chance acquaintances.

The Lost Receipt—Reliance—January 9.—John Powers borrows money from Col. Stone, giving him a bill of sale of his factory, and meets Stone's daughter, Lucy. When John's debt falls due, Stone will not renew it and John is compelled to borrow and pawn in order to raise the money. He and Lucy quarrel. John raises the money and pays the debt to Stone's clerk, who credits it by mistake to the wrong name, although he gives John a proper receipt. John returns to his office and finds his little sister there playing with a doll given her by Lucy Stone. The wind blows the receipt to the floor. The little sister picks it up and makes it a curl paper for her doll. John takes the doll from her and tosses it onto a shelf, being incensed at its being Lucy's gift. Stone has meanwhile discharged his clerk for carelessness, without discovering that John's payment was wrongly credited. Thinking the debt still unpaid, he takes possession of the factory on the bill of sale, and John has no redress because the receipt is missing. John determines to blow up the explosives in his factory rather than see Stone profit by the business. He opens a can of powder, setting a lighted candle in the powder. Meantime his little sister cries over the loss of her doll. Lucy Stone gets her father to take her and the child to the factory to recover the doll and incidentally the missing receipt. John reaches home and learns from his mother that his sister has gone to the factory with the Stones for the doll. He gets back in time to pluck the burning candle from the powder just in time.

Love and Business—Komic—January 10.—Fred is attorney for a windlass concern. One day while demonstrating the windlass, the hook catches on a spinster's dress and raises it enough to disclose her silk-stockinged ankles. She is indignant, of course, and becomes more angered than ever at Fred when the women of her own society, the Anti-Cigarette League, accuse her of permitting herself to be caught just to show her silk hose. Fred writes her a letter offering peace and settlement for the damages to her dignity, and on the same morning writes a sweet note to his wife with whom he has quarreled that morning. The office boy mixes the letters and much excitement and trouble results. After being thoroughly beaten by both women, Fred pours balm on the situation by exchanging the letters, thus satisfying all.

Christmas at Lonesome Gulch—Frontier—(Two Reels)—January 2.—Glancing at the calendar Fred, the lone miner of Lonesome Gulch, realizes that the next day is Christmas. It recalls memories of a day long ago when his mother and brother started on a career of crime. A desperado breaks from jail and, pursued by the sheriff's posse, takes refuge in Fred's cabin. As the vision fades out Fred finds himself facing his own brother. He misguides the posse, and allows the fellow to escape, but his help is in vain as the posse overtakes the desperado and shoots him.

Three Times and Out—Imp—January 4.—Jack pays a visit to his old chum, Ned, who has just been married. On the way to his friend's house Jack flirts with Ned's wife and she has him arrested. Ned bails him out. Jack and Ned's wife meet again at Ned's house and again at Ned's office, and each time the woman has him arrested. When Jack is finally introduced to Ned's wife he throws his hands up in horror and flees.

Two of a Kind—JOKER—JANUARY 4.—Reginald Cooper, suffering from dementia, is sent under the care of a trained nurse to an Eastern specialist, Doctor Fitzhuggins. The nurse delivers a letter to the doctor in which a statement of the patient's case is made. The doctor's niece, on the same train which carries the patient, is bothered by Jack Merryweather, a drummer. She takes refuge in the compartment and from the nurse learns of the patient's condition. At a station the patient escapes; the nurse leaves the train in pursuit and drops the letter; the niece determines to deliver the letter to her uncle. Jack follows her home. He seeks an introduction to her uncle and is trying to interest him in his wares when the niece enters. She presents the letter to her uncle and points Jack out as the patient. The doctor has him placed under restraint. Meanwhile the nurse has recovered her charge and brings him to the home of the doctor. He takes Jack's bag of samples and presents his wares to the doctor. The nurse endeavors to explain. Jack assumes a fit of dementia, and the doctor has him removed and discovers that Jack's assumed fit has thrown the patient into one of his paroxysms. He places the patient under restraint. Jack escapes. That evening Jack attends a ball given in honor of the niece, and is presented by his mother to the girl. She is greatly struck by Jack's resemblance to himself, and he sees her home. There Jack is seized but the niece, finding her heart has been won by him, tells the truth and the doctor gives his consent to the union of the happy pair.

The Adventures of Terrence O'Rourke —No. 5—VICTOR—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 4.—Terence O'Rourke and his friend Denny, are in Tangiers, Morocco. They have a patron in Billy Sennet, United States Consul General to Morocco. Capt. Von Wever, an officer in the German army, blackmails the countess of Seyn-Alberg, Sennet's sweetheart. A year before the story opens, Count Seyn-Altberg was accused of cheating at cards and was allowed to leave the country without being publicly disgraced. He came to Tangiers, took to drinking, and finally was bought by Capt. Von Wever in the slave market. Von Wever threatens to disgrace the family of the countess by exposing to the world the wreck that was once her husband. He has been exacting silence money from her.

O'Rourke and the countess become friends and she tells him her story. O'Rourke goes to the house of Capt. Von Wever who refuses to tell where Seyn-Altberg is hiding and O'Rourke horse-whips him. The captain agrees to tell, and leads the way to a sort of cellar where they find the count dead. The countess is now free and she and Sennet lay plans for a happy culmination to their little romance.

His Last Performance—BIG U—JANUARY 5.—Old Doc Jackson, a hypnotist, is unable to pay his wife's funeral expenses and, in desperation, hypnotizes his daughter Mary and sends her to the manager's wagon to steal the money. She comes out of the trance while in the wagon and is later discovered there. Henshaw, who has stolen the money a few hours previous, tries to place the guilt on the girl, but fate foils him, and the ink-stained bills are found in his possession.

The Mystery of the Throne Room—"MY LADY RAFFLES" SERIES — GOLD SEAL — (TWO REELS) — JANUARY 5.—Lucille, a young widow and protege of an American duchess, is guest at the duchess' week-end party, where she recognizes an international spy in "Count Hugo." Hugo is approached by Prince Frederick, heir to Queen Yvonne's throne should she refuse to marry the neighboring Prince Carlos on her twenty-first birthday, which is only ten days away. The Prince tells Hugo of Yvonne's love for one of the officers in her retinue, and of her expected refusal to carry out the wishes of her people and thereby save her country from falling into the hands of Prince Frederick. The machine brings Prince Carlos' couriers. Hiding, Lucille overhears the couriers tell Prince Frederick that Queen Yvonne has not refused to marry Prince Carlos, but if she accepts, is to signal this news seven days from then, by a gun shot. Lucille later overhears Frederick plot with Hugo to kidnap Yvonne. Lucille determines to warn the queen and goes to the palace. The queen arrives and reaches the throne just as the prelate starts the ceremony. Confronting Frederick, she is dumbfounded at the sight of her double on the throne. Lucille explains Frederick's plot against Yvonne. Frederick exits hurriedly, with Hugo, who recognizes Lucille. The prince, seeing Yvonne and her sweetheart exchange glances, realizes their love and promises to pay the country's debt himself and thus free Yvonne of the necessity of marrying against her will.

For the Good of the Cause—NESTOR—JANUARY 5.—The Newleyweds take up their home in their bungalow. Wifie receives a letter from her mother, a suffragette, announcing her coming. Wifie's mother arrives and arranges a series of receptions at the home of the Newleyweds. Newleywed is forced to take to the bath tub to sleep. He tries to break up one of the suffragette affairs by the unsuccessful use of the lawn hose. He changes his plan of action and brings flowers and bon-bons for mother. He also brings theater tickets and takes mother-in-law. After the theater it is a bird and a bottle and they are all in when they finally arrive home. Next morning wifie packs mother's traveling bag and rather forcibly escorts her to a taxicab outside. Newleywed is delighted with the success of his plan and is convulsed with laughter.

A Man's Temptation—REX—JANUARY 7.—Golonel Gerard, a retired army officer, practically lives at his club, neglecting his wife, Margaret, who is much younger than he. At a dance she meets Louis Lasalle, society fencing master. Margaret and many others take fencing lessons. Louis and Margaret both fall in love, but do not declare themselves in words. The colonel becomes suspicious. Margaret writes Louis to go away and sends the letter by the maid. The colonel investigates. The colonel starts for the studio to find Louis. Upon receipt of Margaret's letter Louis tears it in half. The colonel finds the lower half and reads it. Louis tries to explain to the colonel and is forced into a duel with him. Margaret gets the studio on the phone. Louis, fighting, backs to the phone and answers it, reassuring her, but is forced away by the colonel before he can replace the receiver. Louis wounds the colonel and phones for a phsician. Margaret and the physician enter and upon examination it is found that the colonel died of apoplexy.

Olive's Love Affair—STERLING—JANUARY 7.—Bob and Billy are rivals for the hand of the coquettish Olive. Each is favored and discarded several times in the course of the suit, but one day little Billy proves himself a real hero and is openly received by Olive.

She Was His Mother—IMP—(THREE REELS)—JANUARY 8.—Violet declares her husband must be a man of affairs, one of might, a man that she can look up to. Such a man comes into her life and loves and rides away. After his departure a child is born to her and she is thrust into the world by her parents. Meanwhile the man prospers. Violet makes merry where souls are bought, so she may support her child. The man seeks her out and tries to buy the boy. She thrusts him away. That night the man steals the boy. Violet returns in the gray of dawn and finds him gone. Time passes and the son, now a young man, looks upon his father as a demigod. His mother is thought to be dead but the son often thinks of her. The purse-proud father is elected to the governorship of the state. His son glories in his father's greatness while the mother wears her heart out in longing for her boy. Father and son leave the political clubroom while thousands crowd the pavement to see him and cheer him upon his victory. A wretched woman comes nearer and plays a memory of a melody upon a cracked violin. She recognizes the man. The son is instinctively drawn to his mother. He is about to embrace her when the father curses her with a vile name. The son's soul leaps to his mouth and he casts the father to the curb. The fall fractures the governor-elect's skull. The son is arrested. At the trial the mother sits with her withered hands clasped in her son's. The jury returns a verdict of "not guilty." The son looks at his mother. Her face is placid. He embraces her and finds that she is dead.

When His Lordship Proposed—Nestor—January 8.—Billie loves Jack, a clerk in her father's office, but father wishes her to marry his lordship. Billie arranges with her friend, Constance, to give a little party and Constance makes such violent love to his lordship that the nobleman wavers between Constance and Billie. Jack calls for Billie with his car and the two start away, with father, his lordship and Constance in pursuit. Before the pursuers catch up with Jack's car, his lordship proposes and is acceted by Constance. Father, much disappointed, gives his consent to Billie's marriage to Jack and at the wedding Constance declares she has decided to become a Red Cross nurse, so his lordship is dismissed.

Custer's Last Scout—Bison—(Two Reels)—January 9.—General George A. Custer is in command at Fort Lincoln. Marjory Woodruff, sister to Lieut. Woodruff, is the belle of the post, and Captain Bates and Chapman are rivals. Marjorie's brother has a decided objection to Chapman's suit. Chapman proposes to Marjorie, who tells him that she will give him an answer on the morrow. Bates proposes and is accepted. Marjorie writes the news to Chapman and sends it by a passing trooper. Lieut. Woodruff sees the action, holds up the trooper and forces the latter to give up the note. Chapman is sent to observe the movements of Chief Rain-in-the-Face, while Lieut. Woodruff and Kane and the trooper who figured in the note incident hunt antelope. The little party is ambushed and the officers and one trooper killed. The survivor is the trooper from whom Woodruff took Marjorie's note. Custer sends Captain Bates to Fort Rice. Bates discovers the bodies of the murdered officers and picks up the note written by Marjorie. Bates returns to the fort and accuses Chapman of having murdered Woodruff. Custer orders the scout arrested. The half-dead trooper arrives and explains that his superior officer had forced him to give up the note. Chapman is freed. Reynolds, the second scout, informs Custer that Rain-in-the-Face has Lieut. Woodruff's watch. Custer sends Bates, Chapman and Tom Cucter to Standing Rock agency to arrest the chief. They return with him to Fort Lincoln. The chief's followers begin warfare against the whites, and Custer goes to pacify the red men, taking with him the Seventh cavalry. Chapman is sent ahead, falls into the hands of the Indians, but escapes. Custer splits his command. The plans of attack call for a simultaneous movement from three sides. Reno, however, is drawn into an ambush and loses nearly half of his command. Bates is cut off, and Custer alone advances. His attack proves a failure. Chapman hastens forward, but is cut off. Hoping to circle the Indians, he climbs to the top of a hill, where he views the spectacle of Custer's massacre, unable to advance or retreat. Later he is able to leave his position. He finds Captain Bates sorely wounded and brings him back to the fort. Marjorie weepingly thanks him for bringing back her accepted suitor, and Chapman grimly rides away to live down his own disappointment.

A Political Mess—Joker—January 9.—Kopt and Votz are rival candidates for mayor. Votz has a bust of himself made by a sculptor and Kopt, not to be outdone, arranges to have a bust of himself made. Votz, who is getting the worst of the campaign, disguises himself as the sculptor and when Kopt calls to have the bust made, pours plaster of paris over Kopt's face and then rushes off to speak at a meeting. Kopt rushes wildly down the street, frightening everybody, and finally, through his wife's strategy, is proclaimed a hero and to the chagrin of Votz is overwhelmingly elected.

The Girl of the Pines—Powers—January 9.—When the girl's father, a prospector, dies, the girl disguises herself as a boy and is given a job by the foreman of a lumber camp. When the frail "boy" proves unable to do a woodsman's work, the bully of the camp abuses and finally fights him. As the fight begins the "boy" snatches off his cap and is revealed as a girl. The bully is much ashamed and the foreman has a house built especially for her and she soon becomes the queen of the camp. Eventually she marries the foreman. Edna Maison featured.

Her Dummy Husband—Eclair—January 10.—At the age of forty Tibby McGrath is still single, and very much afraid of burglars. Hearing that several robberies have been committed in the neighborhood she buys a tailor's dummy and keeps it in her house. Weary Willie drops in to get acquainted, changes clothes with the dummy and is found stretched out in a chair by Tibby. She gives him his choice of going to jail and marrying her. Weary does not see where either has a great advantage over the other, but picks the marriage anyway.

Cupid in a Hospital—L-Ko—January 10.—Billy's flirtation with a pretty nurse arouses the ire of an anarchist, who hits him with a wash bowl. One of the young doctors in the hospital also falls in love with the nurse, and he and Billy come to blows. The jealous suitor is taken to the hospital to be treated and there steals a bottle of gin from his old rival, the anarchist, who is also a patient. The nihilist plants a bomb under Billy's bed and, when the explosion is nearly due, discovers the nurse sitting on the edge of the bed talking to the intended victim. In the confusion that follows the anarchist is thrown into Billy's bed and the pair are blown through the roof.

Through a Knot Hole—L-Ko—January 10.—Through a knot hole in the fence a married man glimpses the pretty bride next door and proceeds to make himself agreeable. The jealous young husband starts out to punish the intruder. The pretty bride is forgiven, but the making-up is marred by the eye at the knot hole. Enraged, the husband slips up to the fence and pokes his finger in the eye, but in an effort to see through the knot hole what damage he has inflicted, he in turn gets his eye poked by the intruder. He gets his gun and starts out for blood; the intruder gets his gun, and it is give and take on the chase, until the wife of the intruder corners him, putting to good use her muscle.

The Star of the Sea—Rex—(Two Reels)—January 10.—Mario Busoni, a sculptor, is the ward of his uncle, Father Busoni, pastor of the Church of the Holy Name at Fiesole. The boy is selected to execute a life-sized statue of the Madonna for his uncle's church and the lad departs from the studio at Naples to fulfill his commission. Janice, a model, loves the young sculptor. She entreats him to remain with her, and he is on the point of yielding when the arrival of his uncle puts Janice to flight. A month later, an important letter arrives at the studio for Mario, and Janice delivers it to him. She attempts to ingratiate herself with Mario but is again defeated by the watchful uncle. Meanwhile Mario becomes dissatisfied with the conditions under which he is working, and obtains a living model in the person of a young fisher girl, the widowed daughter of a fisherman. Later Mario heroically rescues the girl's father from the sea. Soon after the girl and her baby boy pose for the young artist. Tomasco, a fisher lout, is in love with Mario's model. He offers marriage, is refused, and suspects Mario of being his rival. Meeting Janice, the two plot the destruction of Mario's masterpiece, the almost completed statue of the Virgin and Child. Mario has proposed and been accepted by the fish-girl. The beauty of the statue causes the man to refuse to destroy it. Janice seizes the hammer, the eyes of the beautiful Madonna open, and the poised hammer is dropped and both man and woman fall to their knees at the base of the statue where they sob out their penitence in contrite prayers. The bishop and his followers enter and view the marvelous work. In the sea-shore home of the fisher-girl, we find her and Marion and happiness.

Tillie's Punctured Romance—KEYSTONE (SIX REELS).—Marie Dressler, Charles Chaplin and Mabel Norman have the leading roles in this farce. It deals with the ups and downs of Charlie, a city chap who first woos Tillie and then Mabel. Throughout the six thousand feet he is continually kept in hot water and all the comical incidents familiar in Keystone comedy are employed. A complete review of the subject will be found on page 657 of the November 14 issue of MOTOGRAPHY.

Box Office

Samson—BOX OFFICE—(FIVE REELS).—Borchard, a Samson of society, has raised himself from a dock laborer to a position of wealth and distinction, through his unceasing efforts. In the early part of the film his advance from his lowly position, through his perseverence, is shown and the manner in which he became rich through the Egyptian copper market is illustrated. A worldly pair, the D'Andolines, marry their daughter, Marie, off to Borchard because they have become financially embarrassed. The rough man loves Marie with his whole heart but she detests him because of his uncouth ways. One day she meets Jerome Govaine, a man-about-town and an expert duelist, and becomes infatuated with him. Borchard is called to London on business but learns just before leaving that his wife plans to go out with Govaine. He remains at home and meets his wife when she returns from her adventure with the libertine, she having realized his character and escaped from his clutches. Borchard determines to avenge the insult, and as he knows he stands no chance with Govaine in a duel, he uses the Egyptian copper market to send him to financial death, his own wealth toppling in the deal. As he is about to leave France forever Marie tells him that she has learned to love him and at last he is made happy.

Gertie the Dinosaurus—BOX OFFICE.—A single reel comedy-cartoon subject drawn by Windsor McCay in which an amusing conception of the prehistoric animal performs at the cartoonist's command. A little story is built around the cartoon in which McCay bets George McManus, another artist, that he could draw a likeness of the far-famed dinosaurus, these views being the first and last incidents presented by the reel.

The Red Scar of Courage—PATHE—TWO REELS).—Scars are ever hideous things from the viewpoint of beauty, but in this play we see one that, though exceptionally prominent and livid, has an endearing rather than an abhorrent effect upon those seeing it. The reason is that the scar is an indelible mark of bravery, a reminder that its owner acquired it in shielding a brother officer on the field of battle. A pretty romance is the main plot of the story which is capably acted and staged in every particular. To gain General Baldeni's consent to marry his daughter Arturo Remenyi joins the army, and is assigned to Lieutenant Baldeni's regiment. Shortly afterwards war breaks out, and the regiment is sent to Tripoli. In a charge Lieutenant Baldeni, Petrina's brother, is severally wounded and about to be killed by an Arab when Arturo throws himself between the two, receiving the blow on his own head. It leaves a horrible scar, but, on his return Petrina, his sweetheart, disregards it entirely and accepts him for his brave and noble qualities. C.R.C.

The Clutching Hand—(FIRST EPISODE OF EXPLOITS OF ELAINE)—PATHE—(TWO REELS).—Craig Kennedy, the famous scientific detective created by Arthur B. Reeve is the chief figure in the opening installment of this new serial. Dodge, an insurance man, learns the identity of "The Clutching Hand," a master criminal, but his life is taken before he can reveal it. Kennedy's investigation of the case yields him but little information. The criminal secures the envelope containing the papers which expose him but when he gets to his room he learns that before his death Dodge had hidden the original papers and filled the envelope with blanks. A complete review will be found on page 47 of this issue.

The Secret of the Mountain—PATHE—(FOUR REELS).—The farmer sends his son to school in the city and boy's squandering of money on a girl leads to his father's mortgaging the farm. When the son returns home and learns that the farm is about to be taken from his father he decides to commit suicide in order to give the old man his life-insurance money. He leaps from a cliff, but escapes alive. Because his body cannot be found the money is not paid and the father losses his farm. He goes to the city, where he is cared for by the boy's extravagant sweetheart. The boy finally returns a millionaire. A complete review will be found on page 44 of this issue.

General Special

The Sage Brush Gal—VITAGRAPH—(THREE REELS).—Liza Filkins, the popular proprietress of the coffee-house, falls in love with Ted, a young easterner who gets in with bad company in the mining town and gambles. "Trigger Jim," a bad and dangerous man, induces Ted to give him the combination of his uncle's safe, which he robs. Liza, however, proves her daring and resurcefulness by locating the money and recovering it, although she barely escapes a terrific landslide and explosion which kills "Trigger Jim." Ted goes back to New York, where he has left a sweetheart, and marries her. Bill McTwirk, a reformed gambler, proves himself Liza's best friend. Gradually the greater love is awakened in her nature and soon wedding bells are heard in the little old town of Amador Junction, where Bill is considered a lucky man.

The Man Behind the Door—VITAGRAPH—(FOUR REELS).—Jack Delacy loves Maria Pierson, but her father, a professor, frowns upon his attentions to his daughter. Jack rescues Kelsey, a New York millionaire, from drowning and slips away before he is recognized. Kelsey determines to find his unknown preserver and show his appreciation. Maria and Jack quarrel and she accepts the attention of Kelsey, whom she meets at the home of a widow friend of hers. The widow is engaged to a Mr. Livingston. Livingston's butler and La Vinia Backsetter, a maiden lady, are introduced at this time and complications follow in rapid succession until the entire party is eventually led to a masked ball. When Kelsey learns that Jack is the one who saved his life, he steps aside and the young man and Maria are reunited, while Professor Pierson, after giving his consent, casts winsome glances at La Vinia.

Paramount

The Italian—INCE—(SIX REELS).—Beppo Donetti, an Italian, is shown toiling in a foreign land to earn enough money to bring his wife and child to him. A political boss is more or less friendly to Beppo but thinks nothing more of the matter. Finally the Italian brings his wife and while trying to steal some milk for his dying child he is arrested and sent to prison. When he is released he learns of his baby's death. Previous incidents lead him to believe that the political boss is indirectly responsible for the affair and when the boss throws him from his home, where he goes to seek aid, he determines to avenge himself. Learning of the illness of the boss' baby, Beppo impersonates a peddler and secures entrance to the house and hears the doctor say that the slightest sound will prove fatal to the child, and when the child is left alone for a minute, he reaches the side of the crib, seizes a glass shade from the lamp and is about to dash it to the floor when the baby makes a gesture which reminds him of his own child. It is too much for the Italian and, lowering the shade, he steals away. George Beban portrays the leading character and Clara Williams is effective in the role of his wife.

The Sign of the Cross—FAMOUS PLAYERS.—The film version of this well known novel and drama presents William Farnum in the role of Marcus Superbus. The costuming is correct in every detail and numerous sets of large proportions are used. Complete review of the subject will be found on page 18 of the January 2 issue.

Sawyer

As a Man Sows—AQUILLA—(FIVE REELS).—Hugo Gaspard, a bank cashier, takes funds which have been placed under his care and squanders them. He flees before he is discovered, making the loss appear like a robbery, killing the night watchman in so doing. A man is killed by a train and his body mistaken for that of Gaspard. The real culprit is thus freed of his identity and continues his life of crime. Twenty years later Gaspard's wife and son, who is an artist, are living happily together, the boy not knowing of his father's criminal life. He is in love with an actress, the daughter of the night watchman whom his father killed. Gaspard, now known as Ralston, and a comrade plan to rob a house in the suburbs of the city. The young artist follows the actress to the city and then calls on his mother for more funds, which she refuses. Gaspard enters the house which proves to be his wife's home and when she struggles with him he shoots her. Because of the dispute between mother and son, the young artist is accused of the crime, but the actress cleverly manages to get a clue to the real criminal. While trying to take the actress' life, Gaspard is killed and the girl manages to clear her lover. They are happily united and go to live with the boy's mother, who keeps the fact that the criminal was her husband a secret.

A Puritan Conscience — Flamingo— (Three Reels). — Puritan and Purity White are raised amid Puritan surroundings by their parents. The marriage of both cause them to separate, the girl going west while her brother takes up his residence in New York. In time both become wealthy and worldly, neither of them knowing the course the other has followed. Years later Purity, a widow with one daughter, decides to visit her brother and both determine to convince the other that they are still living according to Puritan ways. The brother rents a cottage in Massachusetts and dresses according to old Puritan style. The natives have never seen Puritan dress before and believe he is a Mormon. Purity and her daughter arrive and also dress as Puritans and when the neighbors see them going to the Puritan's house they believe he is getting two new wives. Puritan sends to the city for his servants telling them to dress in the custom of their ancestors and when they arrive it proves too much for the villagers. Just as they are about to run the entire party out of the district, Puritan gets in touch with some influential city friends and matters are explained. The brother and sister then decide that though they are wealthy and worldly, they are not necessarily wicked, as long as they possess a Puritan conscience.

Her College Experience—Darkfeather —(Two Reels).—This is the third of the Mona Darkfeather series and presents the popular Indian star in a different environment from that in which she is generally seen. She is first shown as the daughter of a chief in the West and is content until some wealthy easterners visit her tribe and offer her a college education and a home of refinement and luxury. The chief consents to let her go and Mona travels to the East with her new friends. She is sent to college where many dramatic situations develop, forcing the Indian girl to go through many trials, which the chieftain's blood within her alone gives her courage to conquer. Happiness comes to her in the end.

Thanhouser Syndicate

The Case of the McWinter Family— (Sixth Episode of Zudora) — Thanhouser — (Two Reels).—McWinter, a jealous husband is killed by a trap which he set to take the life of a boarder. The boarder, who proves to be Mrs. McWinter's brother, is accused of the crime. Zudora's clever detective work saves him from lynching at the hands of a mob. A complete review appears on page 9 of the January 2 issue.

United—Warners

Pagliacci — Warner's.—Neda's lover, Silvio, sees her flirting with another young man. He denounces her and tells her mother of her conduct. A quarrel follows in which she is driven from home. Eventually she joins a circus, of which Canio is master-mind. He makes love to her, but she spurns his advances. A year passes and she returns to her former home to play an engagement. She does not know that her mother and lover have been searching for her during her absence, but one night Silvio finds her and protects her from one of the company's players who attempts to kiss her. Neda and Silvio decide to leave the circus, but Canio is told of their intent by the man whom Silvio has just chastised. During a performance he is required to stage a quarrel with Neda, and this becomes real when he stabs her to death. Silvio rushes upon the stage to defend her, but is also killed by Canio.

Are They Born or Made?—Humanology—(Four Reels).—A gang leader while in the country falls in love with a farmer's daughter and marries her, despite her father's opposition. They are happy until election time, when she learns of his real occupation after he has been wounded in a pistol fight and the affair given publicity in the newspapers. She determines to return to her home, but before she can leave the gangster tells her of his past life and arouses her sympathy by the tale of his fight against unsurmountable difficulties. She feels that he is less to blame than the bad influences he was unable to fight against and agrees to remain with him if he will come to the country and make his home. He accepts the chance to reform and together they go to her father's farm where happiness awaits them.

to Professor Zandori, who has perfected a serum which will restore the mind. Both are in love with Jennie, Zandori's daughter; she favors Frank. Zandori does not wish the knowledge that his serum exists to be made public for some time and, in this, Jude sees a way to rid himself of Frank. He gives the news to the "Times" and signs Frank's name to the letter which exposes it. Zandori orders Frank from his home for betraying his confidence and the latter goes to Africa. In treating a patient, Zandori is contaminated and Jude renews his attentions to Jennie. She tries to tell her father that Jude is slowly securing possession of their estate, but the madman will not listen to her. Frank hears of the state of affairs and returns home. Jennie herself loses her mind and Jude is about to destroy the serum, thus killing the only hope Zandori and Jennie have of being restored to their natural self, when Frank arrives. He saves the serum and his skill in administering it to the afflicted ones retsores the minds of both. Jude's mind is affected but, as the serum is all used, there is no hope for him. Frank and Jennie are happily united when Jude's treachery is explained to Zandori.

Mexican Hatred—WARNER'S.—Juanita, a Mexican woman, vows to be avenged upon Captain Leonard Holmes when the latter directs the firing squad which shoots her boy as punishment for loitering about the military post. search for him and when they visit Juanita's cabin, they find only the sick form of her boy, but had their inspection been closer, they would have noticed that the form on the cot was not one of Juanita's sons, but Holmes, whom she had struck with a boulder while he was riding at the end of his regiment and whose mind had been made blank by the injury. His face, too, had been discolored by rubbing a bronze colored liquid into it. After the company has returned to the post, Lola is captured by a band of Mexican marauders while riding alone and delivered into the hands of Juanita. The Mexican woman sees a way to have Holmes killed, just as her boy had been, and that night sends him to the post and then frees Lola and tells her to warn her father that a Mexican man is about to kill him. Holmes attempts to enter the fort and is captured and placed in the guard-house. In the morning just as he is about to be killed, Juanita arrives at the fort to see the execution. Her anxiety, and Holmes' attempt to escape delay the shooting and when the captain is injured by a fall, his mind is restored. The troopers then recognize him and he is restored to his sweetheart's arms.

Universal Special

Damon and Pythias—Universal—(Six Reels).—Founded on the well known story of loyal friendship, this production has been carefully handled and deserves a place among the foremost feature productions of the year. Many spectacular scenes are used in developing the action and the whole is worthy of praise. A complete review will be found on page 23 of the January issue.

The Pit—Brady—(Five Reels).—The scenes of the drama are laid in Chicago during a period of speculation in the wheat pit. Cressler, a victim of rash speculation commits suicide just as Curtis Jadwin, a young broker wins the hand and heart of Laura Dearborn, a society girl. Their married happiness is menaced by Jadwin's infatuation for wheat speculation, which leads him to neglect his young wife. Corthell, a former lover appears to her and almost wins her away from her husband. The latter is temporarily won from his passion for money-making, but succumbs to it again and leaves the path open for Corthell. Jadwin plans a great wheat corner and starts in by winning back a fortune of which his friends deprived him years before. The market recedes and Jadwin quarrels with his partner, accusing him of trying to sell him out. Jadwin, thereupon, plunges into the market, but failing to corner it, hears the name of his firm "read out" by the secretary. The corner has been prevented; he is ruined. Quitting the tumult of the Board of Trade, he makes his way home, a beaten man. His wife is on the point of eloping with Corthell, but when she sees her unhappy husband her heart is touched. Dismissing her lover, she turns to Jadwin and promises to help him commence life afresh far from the feverish temptations of speculative business life. The leads are in the hands of Wilton Lackaye, Gail Kane and Milton Sills.

Miscellaneous

Officer 666 — George Kleine — (Five Reels).—Travers Gladwin, a young millionaire, decides to return home quietly, and notifies his chum, Whitney Barnes, to meet him at the Gladwin mansion. Al Wilson, a famous picture thief, arrives from Europe that same afternoon, purchases keys to the Gladwin residence from a discharged servant, and, assuming the name of Gladwin, wins the love of romantic Helen Burton, who consents to elope with him at ten-thirty that night. Later in the afternoon Helen and her cousin, Sadie Small, visit the Gladwin mansion, and there meet Travers and Barnes. Thinking the fellow a trusted friend of her fiance, Helen tells him of her planned elopement with Gladwin, and adds that they are going to take all of the costly paintings with them. Travers determines to capture the impostor, and borrows the uniform of Officer 666, sending that person out to the kitchen to amuse himself. After Helen leaves Sadie tells her aunt of the girl's intentions. She races to the Gladwin home, and demands her daughter. Barnes and Phelan, formerly Officer 666, deny they know anything about her, and, after the woman leaves, retire to the kitchen to await developments. Helen arrives at ten-thirty, as does Wilson, who proceeds to cut the paintings from their frames. Officer 666 (now Travers) appears on the scene, and is put to work helping him pack. Wilson leaves the room for a moment, and Travers explains the situation to Helen, advising her to hide in one of the closets to avoid scandal. The next hour is a whirl of laughs, surprises, and exposures. At the end of it Wilson's safety rests with Travers, who admires the thief for his coolness and cleverness and allows him to escape. As Travers improves his time by making love to Helen, and Barnes and Saidie talk over their coming marriage, Phelan, late Officer 666 but now unemployed, despondently meditates on the events of the past few hours, Travers arouses him from his gloomy reverie with the announcement that, as he has proven to be such a good guardian, he will employ him to watch his paintings, but elicits only the sighing response, "I'm a hell of a cop." A review will be found on page 22 of the January 2 issue.

The Black Spot — Cosmofotofilm — (Four Reels).—A band of students in Russia hold secret meetings at the home of Professor Scerloff, for the purpose of bettering educational conditions in Europe. The government, however, believes them to be anarchists, and one day troops raid the meeting and the professor is beaten and his daughter Olga roughly handled. The shock kills the professor's wife. Grand Duke Paul who is passing at the time feels sorry for them and has their sentence changed from an exile to Siberia to banishment from Russia. The professor and his daughter settle in London where they attend meetings of the Russian exiles. The grand duke visits the English metropolis and the society plans to kill him. He manages to obtain entrance to the circle of plotters and decides to better the conditions which oppressed them. Olga is selected as the one to kill the grand duke, but just before she commits the act, she learns from him that he is working for the same cause they are. The plotters believe she has been disloyal and send her father to fulfill her mission. He is also convinced of the grand duke's worthiness and at the risk of his own life manages to avoid killing him. At last the others are convinced and all ends happily.

Press Agent Says—

That a player who is forging his way rapidly to the top is Lon Chaney, a Rex-Universal character actor.

That though his wonderful acting for a boy of eleven years old in the Edison "Andy" series might make you wonder if Andy Clark is a "real boy," he now has the proof in prominent form. The proof is a bad bulge on his forehead which he got when another boy kicked him in the head while they were playing real football in the fall.

That there is a very pretty romance connected with the meeting and subsequent marriage of Max Figman and Lolita Robertson. Mr. Figman was in the employ of John Cort and engaged all of his people. Mr. Cort had been for years a friend of Miss Robertson's family, and gave Mr. Figman a picture of her, saying that he was sure she would be a desirable accession to the ranks of the Cort companies, and that he would like Mr. Figman to engage her if possible. The latter met her and did engage her—for life.

That Margaret Gibson, leading lady with the Vitagraph Company in Santa Monica, Cal., is the proud possessor of an Angora cat, which she taught to run every time it hears an automobile horn. Miss Gibson taught it this trick when it was only a kitten because of the enormous number of automobiles which pass her home. Running from the sound of an automobile horn has saved the cat's life more than once.

"Restitution" a Tense American Drama

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

SURPRISES come thick and fast in "Restitution," the two reel feature offered by the American Film Manufacturing Company, as its regular release on the Mutual Program, on Monday, January 11.

As the story begins, one beholds an attempted burglary and a dramatic finale showing a burglar ere he can escape from the mansion he has entered. Just as thoughts of the strict censorship—which this scene is sure to meet with—flit through one's mind, the screen shows us that the scene just described was only part of a drama being presented on the stage, and the following scenes flash out to the auditorium of the theater and show the appreciation of the dramatic bit by the audience gathered there. The curtain is seen to descend and one realizes with surprise that it was all play acting.

Rand discovers the murder.

The leading roles in this American drama are in the hands of Ed Coxen, Winnifred Greenwood, George Field and Charlotte Burton, and these screen favorites are ably supported by a large cast.

Following the dramatic production which has been introduced as described above, one sees Lester Harrison and Earl Rand introduced to Elsa Detrow, the heroine of the evening's performance. Lester's attentions to the actress result in the breaking of his engagement to Helen Ward, with whom he has long been in love, and though Lester assures his sweetheart that his attentions are paid to the actress solely on account of her talent and ability, and not at all for any sentimental reason, the girl sees fit to break off the engagement.

When Lester sulks under the rebuke of his late fiancee, Rand, his friend, suggests that he might as well have the game as the name, and proposes another meeting with Miss Detrow, the actress. The young men, in company with Carlton Fox, a mutual friend, meet the star at the stage door and the four adjourn to Fox's apartments where a supper party is planned. While Lester and Rand are absent, purchasing some wine, the actress and Fox quarrel, and the girl, to defend herself, makes use of a revolver that happens to be handy. Lester returns to find Fox dead on the floor of his own chamber, and a few minutes later, when he is examining the pistol with which the deed was committed, he is accused by Miss Detrow of the crime, the actress acting upon the suggestion of Rand.

Elsa testifies at Lester's trial.

At the trial the actress testifies that Lester is the guilty man and gives a graphic recital of the incidents leading up to the murder. All through the days of the trial Helen insists upon the innocence of Lester, much to the dissatisfaction of Rand, who attempts to make love to her.

Lester is sentenced to the penitentiary for life, but subsequently breaks jail and goes west, where he becomes known as One-Eye Pete, because he wears a patch over one eye, the better to disguise himself.

Meanwhile Elsa Detrow, on account of the notoriety she received at the murder trial, finds herself unable to secure another theatrical engagement, finally goes west herself, and secures a position as housekeeper in a hotel in the same town where Lester now resides, and to which afterwards comes Helen Ward as school mistress.

Some weeks later, Rand follows Helen west to renew his proposal, and, when rejected, takes advantage of his discovery that One-Eye Pete is Lester Hamilton, convicted of murder. He calls upon the sheriff to arrest the escaped convict.

Just as the sheriff produces his hand-cuffs and prepares to make the arrest, the hotel housekeeper appears, declares herself Elsa Detrow, and admits that it was she who shot and killed Carlton Fox, though she pleads self-defense as an excuse for the deed.

Rand departs in deep chagrin and shortly afterwards Lester makes known his real self to Helen, and their engagement is renewed.

Pathe to Take Over Eclectic

Charles Pathe is justly indignant at the senseless and unbelievably stupid rumors that have been in circulation for some time regarding the American business of Pathe. The fact is that there has naturally been some readjustment in the business because of many people who occupied prominent positions being obliged to go to war, and also because of Arthur Roussel's death. But such disturbances cannot have any definite influence on a stupendous business like Charles Pathe's, and he wishes it to be known once and for all that the leading position which the house of Pathe has always enjoyed in America, as well as everywhere else, will not be relinquished to anyone and that in the future, as in the past, the watchword of the house will be "Progress."

Feeling that the moving picture business nowadays has become just as much a commercial proposition as any other business, in spite of its artistic character, Mr. Pathe put in charge of his interests some time ago Mr. Felix Malitz, who has now been appointed vice president. Mr. Malitz has made an enviable reputation as a systematizer, organizer and executive, and when only twenty-one held an important position with one of Europe's most prominent manufacturing concerns. He has been in the United States for three years, and enjoys the enviable distinction of being able to converse in about twelve different languages, having traveled and lived in many countries.

Mr. Malitz says: "We have very big things in preparation and we feel most optimistic as to the future. Among other things, we are going to acquire a controlling interest in the Eclectic Film Company, the name of which will be changed to 'Pathe Exchange, Inc.,' and I shall be in charge of both concerns, seconded by most able and competent men, such as Charles Dupuis, who is an authority in all technical matters and has made himself known as an inventor of moving picture machines and devices; Ramirez Torres, who has been with the firm of Pathe for over eight years and has been appointed assistant managing director; Robert T. Furman, who has been in the film business for his own account and whom I have appointed director of exchanges; J. K. Burger, who has been with the Eclectic Film Company from the very beginning, and other valuable co-operators."

Call for Ohio Convention

The Ohio State League of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America will hold its annual convention in Columbus, Ohio, on Tuesday and Wednesday, February 9 and 10, 1915. Every exhibitor in the state of Ohio, together with his friends, is invited to attend.

It is understood that among the questions to be discussed are such subjects as the new building code, the state tax on picture theaters, closing of theaters on Sunday, whether children under seventeen years of age may attend theaters unaccompanied by parents or guardians, whether school children of Ohio shall be denied the privilege of attending theaters on any other day except Saturday, whether it shall be legal to use motors or not, and the ever-popular censorship discussion will also form a big portion of the program.

Among other important things will be the election of officers for the coming year. It is announced that this is to be a strict business convention and that the other attractions and entertainment offered exhibitors will be purely on the side.

The executive committee changed the meeting place from Cleveland to Columbus because the legislature will be in session in Columbus on the day set for the convention and the new governor will then be in office. It is planned to have the convention go in a body to the state house to recommend such legislation as seems desirable and to protest against any legislation which may be considered detrimental to the motion picture industry. The official call is signed by the executive committee.

"The Girl of His Dreams"

Beginning within a few weeks, the Mina brand of the General film program will issue a fifteen-reel comedy serial to be entitled, "The Girl of His Dreams." The picture will burlesque the big serials that have been run by various programs and will feature as its chief character Henry La Pearle, the famous circus pantomimist. It is understood the story will be syndicated as a serial by a well-known newspaper syndicate.

Kentucky Feud Forms Basis for Selig Film

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

A REALISTIC battle between two clans of Kentucky mountaineers is one of several features which go to make the two-reel production of the Selig Polyscope Company, entitled "His Fighting Blood," which will be released on Monday, January 18, a decidedly worth-while film.

The plot itself is enough to hold the attention of an average audience in a picture theater, but coupled with this are the beneficial elements of strong acting and excellent direction. In distributing credit among the players, Thomas Santschi is undoubtedly the first who should be mentioned. His character portrayal of a primitive mountaineer who loves a girl devotedly but who, by his brutal actions, makes her detest him, is a clever piece of work. It is likely to move those who see the film to sympathize with the man when he makes a final sacrifice which takes from him his last hope of winning the woman he longs for. Mr. Santschi also directed the picture, and his work in this department also is noteworthy, as much care has been given to details.

Bessie Eyton and Barney Furey share honors in the other important roles. Mr. Furey has a part which required skillful acting in several near-psychological scenes where a coward wakes to his own weakness, and he has handled it in a quite convincing manner. Miss Eyton, through her personality more than anything else, is attractive throughout, but there is but little opportunity for her to do any individual acting, for this is essentially a man's story.

The collecting of the mountaineers for the battle and the scenes in which the actual fighting takes place are well handled. The photography is clear throughout and the backgrounds chosen by Director Santschi vividly suggest the wild grandeur of the Kentucky mountains.

The story opens by introducing Jim, a mild-tempered mountaineer, who cares little for the rough amusements of his fellow-workers and devotes most of his time to study. Hope McTrigger, a beautiful girl of the open, is his sweetheart. One day, while Jim is telling her of his love, Sam Buck, a rough character who also belongs to the McTrigger clan, interferes and, after handling Jim in a rough manner, himself makes love to Hope. The girl repulses him and he goes away declaring he will win her hand in time. When they are alone, Hope denounces Jim for his cowardice and tells him that she can never love him.

A short time later a mountain dance is given, and Jim rescues Hope from Chuck Sampson.

Hope, to goad her lover, spends most of the evening with Sam. Chuck Sampson, the leader of a clan which has long been an enemy of the McTriggers, visits the dance and sees Hope. Her beauty attracts him and he determines that she shall be his bride. The next day he visits the McTrigger cabin, carrying a flag of truce, and tells Hope's father that if the girl marries him the Sampson clan will never fire on a McTrigger again. The offer is rejected and it is only through good fortune that Chuck escapes with his life.

Angered by the refusal, Chuck returns to the other side of the mountain, where he gathers his followers about him in preparation to making an attack on the hated clan and capturing Hope. In the meantime Jim, alone in his cabin, realizes his own cowardice and sets out to avenge the insults of Sam. He goes to see Hope first and finds Sam there. When Sam again attempts to treat him as a weakling he knocks the latter down. Hope sends both away from her, but is happy in the realization that her lover is not a coward after all.

The Sampsons swoop down on the McTrigger cabin while Hope's father and brothers are at work and carry the girl away. Jim and Sam see them and, in their hatred for the other clan and their fear for Hope's safety, they forget their own differences. Jim follows the Sampsons, while Sam gathers the McTriggers together to battle the kidnappers. Jim manages to gain an entrance to the Sampson cabin, in which Chuck has imprisoned Hope, and in a pistol battle between the two men the girl's lover kills Chuck.

The other Sampsons, however, attack the cabin and the lives of Jim and Hope are in great danger until the McTriggers arrive and, in the battle which follows, drive off the rival clan. Jim, Sam and Hope are brought together again, but this time Sam realizes that the girl loves the other man and offers Jim his hand, sacrificing his own longing that Hope may be happy.

"The Garden of Lies"

For the making of "The Garden of Lies" the All Star Feature Corporation, under the direction of Mr. Pratt, journeyed to Jacksonville and St. Augustine, Floridaa, where most of the exteriors were made. The shores of the Gulf of Mexico were made the basis for a number of the magnificent scenic settings, and numerous old castles and mansions dating far back into the Spanish period were secured, and many of the interiors made therein.

Besides Jane Cowl, the cast contains Violet Horner and other prominent All Star stock players. The scenario was made by Louis Reeves Harrison. "The Garden of Lies" is a five-part production and will be released by the Alco Film Corporation, January 4.

Washburn Invades Nashville, Tenn.

On New Year's day the manager of the Hippodrome theater, Nashville, Tenn., offered his patrons a special treat when he had Bryant Washburn, the popular actor of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company appear before them in person. Mr. Washburn spoke both in the afternoon and evening and was heartily received by the audiences on both occasions. Part of his address, which appeared in the Nashville Tennessean, is as follows: "I have spent several years in the dramatic profession, but I don't believe twice the amount of my present salary would tempt me to return to the legitimate stage. The pictures give to its actors the two crying needs of our civilization—a home and a position that is permanent if you make good. Look at the excellent dramatic actors who sometimes average only eight or ten weeks' work during a season. That is—work that had a salary attached. If an actor happened to be in the cast, of a success—fine! If a failure, his work may be exactly as good, but—the show closes. I've worked steadily for over three years with Essanay."

Bryant Washburn.

Twilight Sleep Shown in New Serial

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

IN the second episode of "The Exploits of Elaine," Craig Kennedy, the famous scientific detective, long a central figure of Arthur B. Reeves' stories in the Cosmopolitan, proves himself not only a detective with wonderful scientific knowledge, but a man who cannot be easily frightened by threats and anonymous letters.

The second episode deals with that much discussed subject "twilight sleep" and demonstrates in a pictorial fashion, the method by which the drug, necessary to produce the famous "twilight sleep" is administered, as well as shows the complete helplessness of the patients while under the influence of the drug.

Kennedy, however, through his intimate knowledge of all things scientific, makes the "twilight sleep" a means to learn the methods of operation of the criminal, as well as a means of serving that criminal in accomplishing his evil purposes.

Though the action depicted in the second episode gives little opportunity for either Pearl White, who is "Elaine," or Arnold Daly, who is "Craig Kennedy," to show their real ability, both enact their roles convincingly and the story moves smoothly along to its climax, and finally breaks off at a point where the interest is intense, which fact should prove a gold mine for exhibitors, inasmuch as it will surely lead the public, who have become interested in episodes one and two, to return to the theaters where Elaine is being shown for the purpose of seeing what happens next.

As the second episode begins, Kennedy, who is in the home of Elaine Dodge, is startled to have a brick hurled through a window in the living room and to find wrapped about the brick, a message to the effect that further activity on his part will surely result in his death. The note is signed by the clutching hand.

Though Elaine urges Kennedy to give up the case there and then, the detective merely laughs and assures Miss Dodge that he will stick to the trail until the criminal is finally rounded up.

The fortunes of Kennedy and Miss Dodge are temporarily laid aside, and one is introduced into the office of a modern hospital where he beholds a famous doctor, just arrived from Germany, conducted to the maternity ward and shown the marvelous powers of the "twilight sleep." One sees the drug administered to the patient and, later, in another room, sees the patient awakening from the sleep and learns that she is totally unconscious of all that has happened while she was under the influence of the drug. Following the departure of the famous guest from the hospital it is discovered that a small vial containing the drug which causes the "twilight sleep" is missing and suspicion directs itself towards the recent visitor.

After the spectators are thus made to thoroughly understand the nature of the so-called "twilight sleep," the story jumps back to the boudoir of Elaine Dodge and one sees the clutching hand enter through a window, reach stealthily out to the white arm of Elaine, withdraw from a pocket a syringe containing the drug that causes the "twilight sleep," and apply the syringe to Elaine's bare arm.

When the girl is thoroughly under the influence of the drug, the clutching hand causes her to arise and makes her visit an outer room and there open the safe belonging to her father, his object being to secure a missing paper that he had tried to get at the time Miss Dodge's father was murdered. The paper, however, is not in the safe and enraged by his failure, he then causes Elaine to write a note to Craig Kennedy, and when this is finished sends her back to bed, while he disappears into the night.

Next morning Craig receives the note signed by Elaine. Kennedy uses the telephone and quickly ascertains that Miss Dodge has not written the note, or, at least, is not conscious of it.

He immediately visits the Dodge home and amazes Elaine by proving that the note he received must really have been written by her, although she is not conscious of ever having written such a message.

Craig offers to demonstrate to Elaine what really happened and with her consent, he, himself injects the "twilight sleep" drug into her arm, and while she is under the influence of the drug, she relates to him the happenings of the night before, including the visit of the clutching hand to her boudoir.

The story finished, Kennedy awakens her, and at the same moment is startled to see a paper thrust through the portieres which hang in a nearby doorway. Upon seizing it he discovers it to be another warning from the clutching hand, in which death is threatened again in case Kennedy does not immediately cease his activities. As the film ends, Kennedy is telling his client that he intends to relentlessly pursue the case to the bitter end.

Dustin Farnum Stars in "Cameo Kirby"

"Cameo Kirby," the current Lasky release through the Paramount program, deals with the romance of a gambler in the south during the "sixties." Dustin Farnum enacts the title role and the picture production is adapted from the work of Booth Tarkington and Harry Leon Wilson.

Cameo Kirby attends the slave trade.

The photography throughout the film is of the highest quality and a novel idea is used in the introduction when the leading character throws a handful of cards on the table and out of each of these cards one of the principals of the cast steps.

The story deals with the life of Cameo Kirby. Left penniless at the death of his father, he resorts to gambling as a means of livelihood. Later he sees an old friend being cheated in a game of cards while on board a Mississippi river boat. He enters the game, determined to save his friend's estate, and returns winner, getting all of his friend's money but planning to return it. The loser, ignorant of Cameo's good intentions, kills himself. The other gambler lays the blame of the man's death at Kirby's door, and the man's son swears vengeance. A number of powerful situations follow, bringing the story up to the point where Cameo falls in love with the dead man's daughter. The great obstacle between them, however, forbids Cameo to mention his feelings towards her, but later developments lead to a duel between him and the other gambler, in which the latter is killed. The truth becomes known and the girl recognizes Kirby's worth and accepts him as a suitor.

Kirby meets his dead friend's son and daughter.

Vita Remembers Employes

The Vitagraph Company, following its usual custom, distributed among its employes, the day before Christmas, the usual checks and turkeys, giving to each employe a turkey weighing not less than fifteen pounds. There were enough of the national birds to remember also those who had been of service in a subsidiary way to the firm. It was a remarkable sight to see the long line of four or five hundred persons standing in line and receiving their gifts.

Messrs. Smith and Blackton, the heads of the company, shook hands with everyone as they passed by and handed them a little envelope containing a token of their good wishes, and at the same time received a hearty handshake and a cordial "Merry Christmas and Happy New Year."

A happy crowd of Vitagraphers with their Christmas turkeys.

The generosity of the Vitagraph Company was not in any way curtailed on account of the existing war in Europe. The spirit of good cheer and the general good feeling displayed throughout the whole establishment, from the heads down to the office boy, will be a mutual incentive to everyone in the work and its results in the coming year.

Florence Reed Makes Screen Debut

Florence Reed, the celebrated emotional actress, whose amazing talents have been seen to advantage in such recent Broadway successes as "The Typhoon" and "The Yellow Ticket," in the latter of which she won a distinct personal triumph, makes her first appearance in motion pictures in the Famous Players Film Company's realistic and artistic screen adaptation of Henry Arthur Jones' world-famous drama, "The Dancing Girl," which will be released on the Paramount program January 11.

Standard Secures New Offices

The American Standard Motion Picture Corporation has moved its general office to more spacious quarters in the Mortimer building, 164-166 West Washington street, Chicago. The progress made by the Standard Program has been rapid and, in the near future, release dates will be named for single and multiple reel dramatic, single reel comedies and educational films.

"The Valley of Lost Hope"

REVIEWED BY MABEL CONDON

IT takes more than a mere stampede of studio extras, even though carefully made up, to put realism into a mining camp story. In addition to locale, to the detail of the story itself and to its direction there still remains the problem of "atmosphere" which is as inevitably a part of a mining camp as are the miners themselves. In the Lubin five-part feature made by Romaine Fielding and entitled "The Valley of Lost Hope," Mr. Fielding solved the problem of "atmosphere" by taking his camera men and principals down into a Pennsylvania mining town and securing miners to provide the necessary atmosphere not alone by their type but by the screen registration of various mannerisms peculiar to the life. Then he brought a certain number of them back to the Lubinville studio, and there, on that big estate, a mining village was built and the remainder of the scenes were constructed.

Romaine Fielding as the parson.

And so it is that "The Valley of Lost Hope" is replete in "atmosphere"—

"You've read of the trail of Ninety-eight, but its woe no man may tell;
It was all of a piece and a whole yard wide, and the name of the brand was 'Hell'."

That typifies the force of the story, the authenticity of the scenes. The blending of both, under the direction of Mr. Fielding, makes the picture the strongest of its kind. The greed for gold when, "—— a curse might avail where a prayer would fail and the gold lust crazed them all," is the story's foundation. It leads up to two moments of especial bigness, though providing, meanwhile, events of interest and importance and, at all times, realism. But the thrills of the picture are the respective moments of the crash of two trains into each other and the purposeful explosion of dynamite which blows a whole village into instant perdition and oblivion.

The wreck took place in a lower Pennsylvania town and its happening made for the people a holiday. The explosion was that of a portion of rock cliff at Lubinville (Betzwood). And both climactic moments in the finished film are startling in effect.

As is Mr. Fielding's method, he picked types for the taking of the various roles, reserving for himself, as he puts it, "a bit." As the clergyman who has saved his sister from the wrath of a drunken husband and taken her to a village where a gold stampede is on, he goes through the story and the camp, as an incidental character; one who begets respect, not alone because he is a "parson," but also because he has made the strength of his muscles known, on occasion.

There is a prologue to the story which shows the death of the village's first prospector. He has found the soil barren of gold, so writes this information, places it in a strong box and in his fight with Indians, the box is displaced and rolls into the crevice of a rock where it remains for twenty long years wholly undisturbed.

The mining camp in Lubin's "The Valley of Lost Hope."

The passing of these twenty years brings us to the stampede inspired by Ewing, a get-rich-capitalist, who gets all the money possible for claims, then places his son in charge of the further sale of land and prepares to depart for the east. The son is ignorant of his father's unprincipled policy and it is not until he is instructed to bring all the money to the train so that his father and his two promoters may safely get away with it that he learns of the nature of the land sale. He rushes the money to the train and entreats his father to let him return it. But one of the miners has found the lost statement of the town's first prospector, another has secured the noted of instruction to young Ewing and informed the others. There is a general rush for the train. Two safe-blowers seize the opportunity to blow open the safe in the saloon in which the savings of "the boys" are kept. Word is carried to the already infuriated miners, they return to find the safe-blowers, and the Ewing private car slips away toward the east. A wrong track is taken, however, and an unavoidable crash into an on-coming box-car brings death to the men whose mission was to rob others.

Back at the mining camp, the dissolute husband of the parson's sister sets fire to a fuse which connects with stored-away dynamite and only those at the extremes of the little village escape death. Among these are the parson, his sister, young Ewing and an old lady whose chief care is a plant of wonderful blossoms. Ewing adopts the old lady as a mother, secures the parson's sister as a wife and the blessing of the parson. To these four people the "Valley of Lost Hope" was productive of happiness.

"Runaway June" Begins Her Career

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

ON Monday, January 4, Chicago exhibitors were given an advance private showing of parts one and two of "Runaway June," the new serial now being offered by the Serial Publication Corporation. The picture, which was prepared from a story by George Randolph Chester, in collaboration with Lillian Chester, his wife, has been produced in motion pictures by the Reliance Motion Picture Corporation, with Norma Phillips and J. W. Johnston in the leading roles.

Photographically the piece is unusual, and from the comments made by the exhibitors gathered to view the advance showing, it seems likely to score a tremendous success in the middle west.

The story is based on the problem which confronts every bride when she is called upon to accept money from her husband, June, in the story, running away from her husband because she feels like a beggar when forced to depend upon him for spending money.

Director Oscar Eagle has hit upon a novel idea for the introduction of the film, and after showing George Randolph Chester and his wife in a parlor set, depicts the way in which the story was inspired. On a little table in the center of the room stands a statuette of a man and woman, the man holding a bunch of grapes just out of reach of the woman and insisting that she ask for it. When she asks why, he replies that it is customary; that things are in man's power to give and it is woman's province to ask. Trick camera work effectively gets over this little introductory bit and a subtitle which follows makes clear that this function of man's to give and this duty of woman's to ask is to be the problem which is worked out in the serial.

The man with the black vandyke was found at Rector's.

The story in the first two episodes, briefly, runs as follows: June Warner starts on her honeymoon with Ned, her husband, without a cent, her pocketbook having been dropped as she was leaving her home. When she explains her difficulty to her husband he offers her money, but she shrinks from accepting it, since she feels that she is being forced to enact the role of a beggar. The train opportunely stopping at that moment, she takes advantage of the chance given to run away and, by selling her watch, secures funds with which she can reach the home of her friend.

The departure of the bridal party.

The watch she sold was redeemed by Gilbert Blye, the man with the black vandyke. He presents June with his card and informs her that at any time she wishes to redeem the watch she has only to communicate with him. Ned, June's husband, meanwhile sets out in pursuit of his missing wife, unaware that in another taxicab Blye is also following. The two men lose track of June and she is able to reach the home of Mr. and Mrs. Bobbie Blethering as the picture ends.

The second episode shows the means by which Ned finally locates June in the home of the Bletherings and goes there with June's parents. June, meanwhile, has taken advantage of her parents' absence from home to go there in quest of some clothing she needs. Meanwhile, missing her from the home of the Bletherings, Ned and June's parents visit the address of Blye, given on the card, and inform Mrs. Blye of the conduct of her husband. Mrs. Blye, who is of a shrewish disposition, immediately sets out on the trail of her recreant hubby and, accompanied by the whole party, she eventually discovers him in Rector's cafe. Blye there publicly disowns his wife and sets out to seek June. As the second episode ends, June departs in a taxicab from her own home, clocely pursued by Blye in one taxicab and Mrs. Blye, Ned and her parents in another.

Mabel Trunnelle in "Olive's Other Self"

BY MABEL CONDON

AN entire change of Olive's nature, occasioned by an automobile accident, is the substance of the eighth episode of the Edison Company's Olive series. "Olive's Other Self" it is entitled, and those who figure in it are Mabel Trunnelle, already well known as Olive; Edward Earle, who is popularity's choice for the role of suitor for Olive's hand and who gains a new following at his every interpretation of Vance Coleman; Bigelow Cooper, as Maurice Castle, the artist of bestial intent; Viola Dana as the dancer who arouses Olive's jealousy, and Anna Leonard as Miss Coburn, a settlement worker.

The preceding chapters in the story of Olive's experiences show Vance to be opposed to Olive's journeyings into the settlement district. Believing herself harm-proof, Olive persists in carrying on her interest in the work, in which she finds Miss Coburn an agreeable helper. The eighth release of the Olive stories finds her a victim of an accident in the settlement neighborhood, and before its conclusion is reached and Olive has attained safety, her experiences have gone toward making her a sadder girl.

Olive suffers from aphasia.

The story is told in the usual two reels allotted each of the episodes, and Miss Trunnelle finds it a vehicle for work of especial dramatic merit. She assumes with grace the role of the girl who has lost her reason and whose nature has experienced a decided change. Her portrayal of the artist's model in whose eyes the light of reason is lacking and whose every action is one of undirected impulse is a fitting interpretation of the part. We like Edward Earle as Vance; we want his attentions to Olive to have the effect of restoring her liking for him in a return of reason. But his various calls and thoughtful offerings are inadequate to produce the desired result. "Nothing but a great shock will restore her reason" was the doctor's decision, and just what that shock is to be furnishes the element of suspense which brings the story to its satisfactory conclusion.

It is while Olive is returning home after a visit among the settlement's poor that she sees a child in peril in front of an approaching automobile. She hastily runs into the street and pushes the child into safety, but falls a victim to the heavy machine, which was taking the artist, Maurice Castle, to his studio. She is taken to a hospital and Miss Coburn notifies Vance of the accident. He hastens to the hospital, but in the eyes of Olive there is no recognition for him. She turns fretfully away and the doctor explains that she is suffering from aphasia and only a very great shock will cause her to recover. Then follow days when Olive displays a fancy for almost everything she formerly disliked. And, worst of all, in Vance's sane judgment, she consents to pose for the artist, Castle.

A gay Spanish type is the character in which he is to paint her and, so costumed and with a cigarette between her fingers, Olive poses. Between times she is encouraged to find pleasure in the sip of colorful wine and the soothing effect of "My Lady Nicotine," until one day, the spell of her upon him, Castle throws aside his easel and brushes and seizes his Spanish model in a clasp that rouses the cunning resistance of this new Olive and she assumes a hurt dignity that more than ever serves to fascinate the artist and leads him to resolve that she shall belong to him. He gives parties at his studio, he has a lithesome dancer as entertainer and on one occasion when he shows an admiration of her, Olive displays a jealousy that makes him resolve that she shall not leave his studio that night.

The guests depart. A fear of something imparts itself to Olive and she listens while Castle calls a number on the telephone. Fiendishly he talks to Vance. "Yes, she's here and I'm going to keep her here!" is his message. Olive's glance seeks a stilleto, an artistic trinket, and, softly approaching the curtain behind which is Castle, she strikes with vital swiftness. The heavy body of Castle plunges through the opening in the curtains and lies at her feet. She is about to flee, when Vance makes an excited entrance. The gaze Olive turns upon him is one of reason—the shock has restored her memory and, leaving the wounded artist to the care of his servant, Vance leads the terrorized girl away.

Regular Program for Pathe

Charles Pathe intends early in the spring to put out a regular program, the best that money, brains and experience can furnish. To assist in the making of this program he offers to producers inducements which are out of the ordinary, a liberal price for all acceptable films, joint publicity and a world-wide market.

When seen recently, he briefly outlined his plans as follows: "The house of Pathe is unique in regard to its world-wide connections and a name for years universally synonymous with high-class film productions. In the making up of this complete program I desire the co-operation of the best producers of both comedies and dramas. There is room for every really capable producer in the country to join with me in putting out the finest regular program ever seen—a program which will go into every part of the world and which will bring liberal profits and a world-wide fame to the men who make it possible."

To Film Athletic Events

A number of daily newspapers are carrying a story to the effect that the Selig Polyscope Company has arranged with a notable promoter of athletic events to film contests in every branch of sport. According to the story, the champion wrestlers, fighters, skaters, baseball and football stars, track athletes of note, famous billiard players and, in fact, the leading lights of every branch of sport will appear before the Selig cameras. To date, however, the Selig Polyscope Company's publicity department has not confirmed the report.

Will M. Ritchey is now in charge of the scenario department of the Balboa Company at Long Beach.

Felix F. Feist, of the Celebrated Players Film Company of Chicago, was a recent visitor at the office of the Favorite Players and Excelsior Feature Film Company in New York City. Asked to express his views on what constitutes a good film, Mr. Feist outlined briefly what he considered the essential points of a modern production—points necessary to insure the success of a film. Mr. Feist said:

"What I demand in a picture, and what I insist upon in every picture accepted by the Celebrated Players Film Company, is 'screen value.' What I mean by 'screen value' is that the picture itself must have the elements necessary to create interest. These elements are humor, dramatic interest, pathos or surprise. Any picture containing one or more or these qualities is bound to be successful, although I attach the greatest importance in either a comedy or a drama to the quality of surprise.

"Do not misunderstand me or think I underrate the value of progressive advertising methods. Probably no man is stronger for all forms of advertising than I am. In fact, as you know, the Celebrated is one of the exchanges liberal in the use of trade paper advertising, and we constantly back up our personal solicitation with circular matter of all kinds. Advertising, unquestionably, brings the people to the theater. Attractive heralds, good paper and interesting photographs are all excellent methods of telling the public what you have to show, but the picture itself must bear out this advertising. The picture itself must furnish a full evening's amusement to the spectator and live up fully to his anticipation and hopes for a pleasant time. A picture that disappoints or that is lacking in any feature, either photography or interest, disappoints the spectator and makes him feel that he has paid his money, no matter how small the amount, upon false representation.

"For these reasons, I hammer home constantly to every one of my bookers, to every manufacturer that I meet, and to every theater with which I come in contact, the enormous value of 'screen merit.'"

Announces Lasky Casts

Samuel Goldfish announces the following complete casts for the Jesse Lasky productions of "Young Romance" and "The Goose Girl," to be released, respectively, on January 21 and 25. Edith Taliaferro is the star of "Young Romance," and her supporting company includes Tom Forman, Frederick Wilson, Ernest Garcia, Marshall Mackay, Harry de Vere, Parke Jones, Charles Wells, Florence Dagmar, Violet Drew, Mrs. Lewis McCord, Miss Kellar, Miss Abril and Miss White. By courtesy of the Famous Players, Miss Marguerite Clark assumes the stellar role of "The Goose Girl," and that company includes Monroe Salisbury, Sidney Dean, E. N. Dunbar, James Neill, L. Payton, P. E. Peters, H. B. C. Carpenter, Ernest Joy, J. M. Cassidy, Miss Johnson and Jane Darwell.

Vitagraph Issues Denial

The Vitagraph Company has written MOTOGRAPHY denying the statement which appeared in the eastern papers stating that Ralph Ince and Anita Stewart had joined another company. Both these players are to remain with Vita and will continue to make features similar to the ones which have proved so popular in the past.

Types Well Chosen in Essanay Drama

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

VERY often a character is altered until it becomes a type which will fit the actor who portrays it. Not quite so often is an actor chosen because he fits a type, thereby submerging his personality within it. This occurs in the two reel Essanay production entitled "The Lieutenant Governor," which will be released on January 22, however, and two players, Eugene O'Brien and Joseph Byron Totten, seem to virtually live the parts they play.

It is the initial appearance of these players and the work of both is very creditable. The plot of the story which is told by the film is itself highly dramatic and offers several splendid situations, all of which have been used to good advantage by the two actors mentioned above, ably assisted by Ruth Stonehouse, the woman lead, and Lester Cuneo, the heavy.

Despite the fact that the first reel gets a rather slow and labored start the interest is held throughout, working up to a highly dramatic climax and a touching denouement. The entire story is supposed to have been narrated by a convict to his lawyer, the day before he was to go to the gallows for killing the governor of the state.

The lawyer visits him, bringing the news that there is no hope of securing another trial. Just before he leaves he asks the prisoner, whose name is Russ Cook, why he committed the rash act. Cook confides in the attorney and tells him that he is not sorry for his act and then relates the following story:

Helen Rathbawn, the daughter of a mill owner, was kind to him and he mistook her interest for love and lived for her alone. Then one day the awful truth was brought home to him when he learned that she had promised to become the wife of John Barclay, the lieutenant governor of the state. Heartbroken, he lost all interest in life and started on the downgrade. He gave up his position and took to drink.

About this time Dennis McGrath, a corrupt political boss, fell in love with Helen. When she refused to accept his attentions he threatened to cause trouble at her father's mills, unless she became engaged to him. When she had the servants throw him from the house he deliberately set out to avenge himself. Going to the mills he secured the good will of the easily influenced workers, who felt that he was fighting for their cause, by purchasing drinks, and then persuaded them to strike.

Cook learned of the affair and hurried to Rathbawn to warn him. The mill owner called on the police for protection, but because of McGrath's influence received no satisfaction. He then appealed to the governor of the state to send the militia, but again the boss interfered. When Barclay called on Helen and was told of the situation he advised Rathbawn to fight, for he knew that there was no hope of obtaining protection from either the city or state while McGrath was opposed to it.

When the boss learned that the lieutenant governor was opposing him, he determined to place him in a bad light before the people and had an article published blaming him for the whole affair. Despite the obstacle which this raised in his path, Barclay managed to retain the confidence of the wives of the strikers and promised them that within a few days he would be able to punish the man who was responsible for their suffering.

He planned with Helen and her father to trap McGrath and had the girl go to the boss and promise that she would become his wife if he made the governor call out the militia to quiet the strikers. He then had a delegation of the strikers' wives come to his office, which adjoined that of the governor, to hear the official obey the command of the boss. But another complication appeared at this time. McGrath sent one of the men to kill Barclay and Cook saw him.

He followed the would-be murderer and, after a struggle on the ledge of the building, wrested the pistol from him, just as McGrath and the governor were confronted with proof of their guilt in the room within.

Cook's brain was afire. There was a chance before him to make the man he admired governor and bring a position of dignity to the girl he loved. He closed his eyes and fired the shot that killed the governor. He finishes his story and the lawyer shakes his hand and leaves. Then Cook sits down to wait for his call to the gallows. Before him rises a vision of Barclay, who by now has become the governor, and Helen, happy in each other's love, and he feels that his life will not be given in vain and that with his one good act he has submerged his bad ones.

The climax.

Rathbawn learns of the trouble.

Cook realizes he has loved in vain.

The Morals of the Profession

A WOMAN writer in the December number of the Green Book, a magazine of the so-called popular class, specializing on theatrical subjects, has seen fit to impugn the morals of motion picture players in general. She boldly intimates that frequently the success of the picture actress comes because she is a "friend" of the director, a "protege" of the manager or a "favorite" of the leading man. If it were a man that made such statements in a public place he might look for a coat of tar and feathers. But it is a woman who seems thus willing to soil her own hands in casting mud at her sisters of the studio.

"I believe," she says, "the films breed more immorality than the stage ever did."

What sort of mind is it that wishes to be responsible for such an utterance? What psychological process could reconcile that thought with even the most rudimental philosophy of life, or with the common sense that even the ignorant are supposed to be blessed with?

It is time wasted to comment on the execrably bad taste of publishing such an article; the thing has been done, and the writer, in the sentence quoted above, has been permitted to use the immorality of the stage as a yardstick by which to measure the immorality of the studio. Those very expressions are the exclusive property of the prude, the jumper to evil conclusions.

What is this "immorality of the stage"? We have all heard the term used before; and everybody who has put any thought at all on the subject knows how the theory was born. "Tights"; short skirts; the caresses of "business"; it is the thoughts that these things give rise to in the prurient mind that brought the stage its undeserved stigma. Even night itself, when the players work, suggests evil to the prude. The "immorality of the stage" is but the immorality of those furtive mentalities least familiar with stage life.

But if we can give the stage a clean bill of health (though we cannot do as much for prurient minds), how much more effective is an analysis of the film studio's moral atmosphere. The picture player is protected even from those elements of stage life which move the salacious spectator. The film actress works daytimes and goes home nights—to a real home, and in many cases to a husband and children. She works hard all day, and often at tasks that give her strong muscles and a healthily tired body, a clear brain and a calm outlook upon life. Her wage is sufficient to provide all the necessities and all the reasonable luxuries. There would be but one possible motive for immorality—the ambition to lead. To rise, she might be tempted to substitute price for the talent she lacked.

Go to your nearest picture theater and watch the acting of the leading lady in any film. Do you need any further evidence that she got the lead honestly? Try to find a picture company whose leading lady lacks talent and ability. You can't do it. Every one of them has risen to the top of her profession by sheer hard work and natural gift and good health. The screen itself is the evidence.

Toward the writer of the Green Book article we must try to be as charitable as possible. Some unpleasant experience has doubtless colored her vision; for we take it she is sincere in her misbelief. We cannot look as calmly, however, upon a publisher who, knowing better, would allow the women of a noble profession to be maligned for the sake of a little brief sensationalism and a few extra newsstand sales.

The Admission Price Question Again

QUITE a number of prominent and successful motion picture men have given enthusiastic endorsement, from time to time, to the project of raising admission prices to picture theaters generally. Carl Laemmle, Lewis Selznick, William Hodkinson, William Fox—these are some of the familiar names which have appeared in advocacy of the higher price standard.

As every argument has two sides, it is not particularly surprising to find an equally earnest and enthusiastic friend of the five cent admission in P. A. Powers, who has just told the New York Times that over-ambitious exhibitors are likely to drive the public, or a considerable portion of it, back to the vaudeville and "legit" galleries.

Frankly, Mr. Powers' arguments against higher admission prices are very good and very interesting. Possibly some of his statements will be challenged by those of opposite convictions; but the fact remains that a good many of his epigrammatic sentences strike home. Here are just a few of them:

The exhibitor thinks he is adding "class" to the business by having a few autos stand in front of his theater.

The best picture made can be shown for a nickel, with a good profit to the exhibitor.

Big volume of business may dictate an increase in certain houses, but the picture business is primarily a five-cent proposition and will remain so.

Can the picture drama cope with the legitimate stage? Can it usurp the place of the spoken drama? It never will; it cannot. It is inherently a brief-bill, small coin attraction, holding a place all its own in the amusement world.

The sooner the men who are trying to make of it a "big" show get back to basic principles, the sooner will the cost-of-admission problem be solved.

He (the exhibitor) grew rich charging nickels. He will grow poor charging quarters, believe me.

Your chances of pleasing your audience are diminished in proportion to the length of the film shown.

The biggest factor in the vogue attained by the motion picture has been convenience.

Except for a few men and women, who, because of recurrent appearances and excellent characterization have caused themselves to be singled out by patrons, the star system is all wrong in pictures.

We agree so far as this; that while a certain not-too-large percentage of exhibitors can and will charge comparatively high prices for really big shows, the others must stick to the five cent admission and the short program. We believe the picture business is big enough for both kinds of picture theater—the high and the low price; and that not until both those fields are covered will the motion picture have reached its maximum opportunity and its maximum usefulness. We do not believe that any particular circumscribed niche in the scheme of things entertaining should be set aside for pictures. There is a demand for high class entertainment at good prices. There is a demand for clean, short, convenient entertainment at low prices. The motion picture can supply both these demands and all their intermediates. Is there any reason why it should not do so?

ARBUCKLE IN NEXT BOSWORTH RELEASE

Maclyn Arbuckle, one of the most prominent portrayers of typical American characters on the legitimate stage, will make his initial appearance on the screen under the Bosworth banner in "It's No Laughing Matter." Written and directed by Lois Weber, "It's No Laughing Matter" presents the jovial Arbuckle in a role for which he is specially adapted, as Hi Judd, poet, postmaster and philosopher of a little country village. The story is simple, yet strong in the unfolding of its half humorous and half romantically dramatic plot.

Supporting the star is an exceptional cast, including such artists as Adele Farrington, Myrtle Stedman, Herbert Standing and Charles Marriott. Miss Weber has spared no effort to make this one of the most picturesque and true-to-life photoplays ever produced, and as a delightful comedy-drama it has no precedent. "It's No Laughing Matter" is the next Bosworth offering on the Paramount program and will be released January 14.

The third story in which William S. Hart appeared for Broncho is "The Scourge of the Desert."

Just A Moment Please

After viewing the second installment of "Runaway June" almost anyone can guess why Gilbert Blye, the man with the black vandyke, ran away.

We venture to guess that a lot of the rabid picture fans who are "just crazy to act," after seeing the Universal's submarine films at the Fine Arts (or elsewhere), will decide that acting is no business for them.

CAN YOU BLAME THEM?

Some exhibitor who has booked the film is going to advertise the Biograph picture, "The Girl He Brought Home in two parts." When folks discover on the screen that the boy's parents object to his choice do you spose they'll wonder at it?

At last we believe we've hit upon a scheme for abolishing or at least bettering the censorship of such strict and servere bodies as the Chicago board. The idea came while viewing the second episode of "The Exploits of Elaine." Why not gently apply the "Twilight Sleep" to the ever busy censors and awaken them after an "O. K." has been obtained to the picture then being viewed? The doctors tell us, and so eminent an authority as the famous Craig Kennedy vouches for the fact, that the sleep itself is harmless and that upon awakening the patient recalls nothing of what happened.

The latest issue of the Selig Weekly Press News contains an item that reads in part as follows:

Mr. W. N. Selig has purchased about four miles of film from E. Swift Train, who has just come back from a trip to the Alaska-Siberian coast. He was gone eight months and——

One can thus almost positively decide that there's nothing in a name—E. Swift Train—gone eight months. Why a slow train could make it in less time.

Charles Chaplin in a Serious Mood

Charles Chaplin.

YOU, who have laughed at his antics—and there are many of you—will pardon me for introducing Charles Chaplin, comedian-producer of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company. The pardon is asked because most of you have met "the funny man of the films" via the screen route, and once you have met him it is not likely you will forget him, for he is one of those rare comedians who causes a smile to appear on the face of the most cynical critic every time his funny "stunts" are recalled.

He arrived in Chicago the latter part of last week, in company with "Broncho Billy" Anderson and will remain at the Essanay studios in that city indefinitely, producing his inimitable farce comedies which have proved such a drawing card for exhibitors in all parts of the world. He seldom moved as fast while on the screen as he did during the first few days of his stay in the Windy City. "Charlie" was wanted here and "Charlie" was wanted there, from the time he arrived in the studio in the morning until he left at night. Therefore it was a rather difficult task to catch him, but I finally managed to corner him in the advertising department of the big studio on Argyle street for an interview.

"A funny thing about my work before the public," he said in reply to a question about his work, "is that my greatest desire when I adopted the stage as a profession, was to become a leading man—one who would be called before the footlights several times after every curtain. It was only the usual ambition of a comedian to attain the sublime, I suppose, but it took me a long time to become reconciled to the fact that I was best fitted for comic work.

"I toured England and the continent for several years before coming to America. My first visit to this side of the water was made while I was playing the lead in a pantomine production, 'A Night in an English Music Hall.' It was my work in this production that attracted the attention of Mack Sennett and when an opening occurred in the Keystone forces he wired east for me. As I had appeared under several names, much difficulty was experienced in getting in touch with me but finally I received their offer. I at once had visions of myself as a screen hero, hurling villains over cliffs and rescuing fair heroines from a thousand varieties of unknown danger. I was sure that I had forever shaken the 'comedy' hoodoo off.

"It was a sad blow when I arrived in Los Angeles and learned that instead of being a hero I was to be the thing I had grown to detest—a funmaker. I was very dissatisfied for a few weeks, but slowly I began to realize that there was some attraction in the film work which was lacking on the stage. In less than a month my fascination for it entirely overcame my prejudice and I threw myself into the work with my whole heart."

"Do you know to what extent the popularity of your comedies has reached?" I queried.

"No," he frankly replied, "but I have been told that they are quite amusing. I often wonder if the people sitting in a theater realize the immense amount of thought we put into our efforts or the depth of screen psychology."

Yes, friend reader, the care-free vision that "skates" into a scene on one foot or that throws pies at his "opponents," is really a serious thinking young man. Young because it was only 25 years ago that he was introduced to this life, England being the first country to be honored by his presence.

"I have a distinct theory regarding farces," continued the laugh-getter, "and one which, to my mind, meets with public favor. I believe that a plot which could easily become a dramatic subject, but which is treated in an amusing manner and which burlesques events of daily life, with which the average person is familiar, depending principally upon its humorous action for laughs, is the one to make a successful farce comedy. There are many things in farces which I do not favor. I believe I have been ridiculed for some of my actions, but whatever I have done has been unintentional I am sure, for my one object in life now is to amuse, and to do it in a clean way. Many persons see a subject on the screen and say that such-and-such a thing should be done this way or that. They do not realize that we do things on the spur of the moment and that our minds are under a constant strain, for we must concentrate on our work from morning till night."

He paused again and I asked him if there was anything he would like to tell our readers.

"Just say that I am doing my best to please them and that I hope my releases under the Essanay banner will be as agreeable to them as my past work. And say! Tell them that I'm just a fellow, a human being like they are and that I enjoy almost everything that is enjoyable."

He said that he was just a fellow, but I would like to add the adjective "regular" before "fellow," for Charlie Chaplin is just as likeable in real life as he is funny on the screen.

Christmas Issue of Essanay House Organ

The Christmas issue of The Photoplay Review and Essanay Guide, the official house organ of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company in England, has just reached MOTOGRAPHY. Special effort has been exerted to make this issue of the book attractive and the purpose has easily been accomplished. The text consists of reviews of the Essanay films and stories about the actors under the banner of the same company. The pictures of G. M. Anderson and Francis X. Bushman appear on the cover.

Bosworth Engages Fritzi Scheff

The week ending January 2 brings forth an announcement from the studios of Bosworth, Inc., that on the face of it shows the greatest activity by the Bosworth concern. First and foremost and undoubtedly one of the most important announcements yet made, comes word that Fritzi Scheff, magnificent, talented, temperamental and much sought after, is now a Bosworth star. She will appear in the Bosworth production of "Pretty Mrs. Smith," highly successful, and which has just concluded its run at the Casino theater, New York, but four weeks ago. This is the first time in the history of filmdom that a play has been produced in pictures so shortly after leaving its important career on Broadway. Fritzi Scheff in "Pretty Mrs. Smith" will be released on the Paramount Program about the middle of March.

Who has not been waiting for the Bosworth release of "Nearly a Lady," featuring Elsie Janis? Well, the picture is now completed, according to reports from the Bosworth studio at Los Angeles, and in its finished stage is being shown next week to Miss Janis, who is delaying her departure from the coast in order to see the production run off.

Dustin Farnum in "Captain Courtesy" will be an early Bosworth release on the Paramount Program. Mr. Farnum, under the direction of Lois Weber (Mrs. Phillips Smalley), is now in the foothills of the San Fernando mountains of the Bosworth reservation, where many of the exteriors will be made and where the environments offer opulent opportunities from a topographical standpoint. In addition to Mr. Farnum, the cast of "Captain Courtesy" will contain Miss Winifred Kingston, well remembered in numerous other Paramount productions.

The Girl of the Golden West

The Lasky Company's presentation of David Belasco's successful play, "The Girl of the Golden West," is an equally fine and enjoyable photoplay. There is everything commendable in the film, which has the following well-chosen cast: The Girl, Mabel Van Buren; Jack Rance, Theodore Roberts; Ramerrez, House Peters; Wowkle, Anita King; Sidney Duck, Sydney Deane; Ashby, Billy Elmar; Nina, Jeane McPherson; Castro, Raymond Hatton; Senora Slim, Dick Le Strange; Nick, the bartender, Tex Driscol; Antonio, Art Ortego; Stage Coach Driver, John Ortego; [illegible] ames Griswold; Old Minstrel, Ed Harley. The [illegible] ns as follows:

"The Girl of the Golden W[illegible] is an orphan who keeps the saloon in the California mining to[illegible] cloudy during the days of the '49 gold rush. Her u[illegible] and fearlessness command the respect of all the [illegible] her many suitors, the one she is most disposed to [illegible] ck Rance, the sheriff-gambler from New Orleans, [illegible] ewhat less rough than the rest of the men.

At the time when the sto[illegible] he community is at a high pitch of excitement conc[illegible] xploits of a city-bred road agent, whose real name [illegible] but who is known as Ramerrez and leads a particul[illegible] te band of Mexicans. In spite of the fact that $5,000 [illegible] en offered for his capture, Ramerrez holds up the Wells-Fargo stage, robbing all the passengers. While doing this he receives a slight wound on the wrist and when his band disperses with the booty, remains behind to bathe the injury. The "Girl" chances to ride by, is interested by her very first glimpse of the fascinating stranger, comes to his aid and binds up the wound with part of her bonnet string.

This is the beginning of a romance between the "Girl" and the road agent, whom she knows only as "Mr. Johnson." Not knowing that the "Girl" is the proprietor of the Polka saloon in Cloudy, but having heard that the miners leave their gold in the care of the woman who runs that place, Ramerrez plans to rob the establishment. He goes to the saloon himself in advance and there meets Rance, the sheriff-gambler, whose jealousy at once becomes apparent and who is prevented from making trouble for the stranger then and there only because the "Girl" vouches for him.

From this point exciting events follow in rapid succession. While Rance is following a blind trail for the road agent, Ramerrez has an early morning breakfast with the "Girl" at her cabin. In attempting to leave he is seriously wounded by Rance and apprehended, though the "Girl" seeks to conceal him in the loft. His presence is revealed by the dropping of his blood through the cracks of the loft. Rance and the "Girl" play cards for the life of Ramerrez, and the "Girl" wins by the ruse of changing her losing cards at the last moment.

After recovering from his wounds, Ramerrez is pursued and caught a second time. The "Girl" comes to his rescue at the moment when he is about to be hung for his crimes against the law, and the drama concludes with the "Girl" and Ramerrez leaving the mountains to begin a new life.

Betty Nansen's Golden Gown

The most striking creation, far and away, of the many magnificent gowns brought to this country in forty-five trunks by Betty Nansen, the eminent Scandinavian tragedienne, is one known as "the golden gown." When Miss Nansen, who is stopping at the Hotel Plaza and is over here to appear in a series of great feature films for William Fox, entered the dining room of the hostelry wearing the dress diners first shielded their eyes from the gorgeous effulgence of the confection and then gasped at the dazzlingly daring effect of the whole creation. The tunic part of the dress alone is said to weigh forty-two and one-half pounds. It is of stiffened cloth of gold, encrusted with seed pearls and tiny diamonds and trimmed with brocade embroidered with fine gold. The rest of the gown is of old rose silk, hand embroidered with wonderful skill. The clasps at the throat are of platinum, set with diamonds. The gown is one of the last designed by Paul Poiret before he left for the front. Miss Nansen will wear it in the William Fox production of "The World and His Wife," Jose Echegaray's great play. William Fox was compelled to furnish a bond of $50,000 to cover the value of Miss Nansen's stage costumes while she is in this country.

Nat'l Censorship Discussed

A luncheon at which gathered the publicity men of all the eastern manufacturing companies plus representatives of the motion picture press, was held on the last day of December at the Cafe Boulevard. The host was the National Board of Censorship, whose hospitality was dispensed by J. W. Binder of the publicity department, W. D. McGuire, Jr., executive secretary, and Orrin G. Cocks, advisory secretary.

The get-together meeting was the result of an investigation of the Ohio censor condition just completed by Mr. Binder and Mr. Cocks, which investigation convinced them of just how wrong legalized censorship would be, were it to get a further foothold, and just how unsatisfactory is the condition wherein this form of censorship already exists.

The National Board contends that "Legalized Censorship" is the greatest danger confronting the motion picture industry from without, today. The most imminent dangers from such censorship, Mr. Binder declared, are:

1. It puts the whole art under suspicion of being illegal or immoral.

2. It disrupts distributing organizations. States in which there are legalized censor boards make it difficult for exchange men to keep up to their schedule.

3. Legalized censorship attempts to solve a question pre-eminently one of morals through politics. It can't be done.

4. Legalized censorship, through a small politically appointed board, whether that board be backed by federal or state authority, opens up unlimited possibilities in the direction of graft. This condition, the speaker continued, confronted the industry today in three states; Pennsylvania and Ohio having legalized state censor boards, and Chicago having a legalized municipal board.

"To combat this evil," said Mr. Binder, "there is one force which is all powerful. That is the force of publicity. No public wrong can long endure in this or any other country, if it is illuminated by the white light of publicity. There is no more potent factor in creating and shaping public opinion than publicity. In order to be effective, however, a campaign of this character must be carefully thought out and unified. There must be no division. Each person who has to do with the giving out of publicity matter must tell exactly the same story. What happens when this is not done is confusion and loss of effectiveness."

Jo Brandt offered a solution, which, if carried out, promises to help more materially, so the entire force of publicity men agreed, than anything they could do in the forwarding of the Board's cause.

"Get the directors of our companies together and tell them what you have told us," advised Mr. Brandt. "Tell them the things you'll have to cut if they insist upon putting them into their pictures. Go to see them in the studios once a month and impress upon them the importance of toning their pictures to meet the requirements. That's where you will actually gain. I'm sure you would get results. And if you also appoint a committee to keep in touch with the publicity men and let them know what you are doing—and that would be the only way of their knowing—co-operation would result all around."

And the entire force of publicity men, stated collectively and individually, that Mr. Brandt's statement of the case was theirs exactly.

Mr. McGuire introduced various speakers and added several thoughts to those already expressed by his fellow board members.

Those present numbered: L. C. McChesney, Edison; William Wright, Kalem; H. W. Gittens, Biograph; P. A. Parsons, Pathe and Eclectic; S. M. Spedon, Vitagraph; Joe Brandt, Universal; Bert Ennis, Eclair; E. J. McGovern, N. Y. Motion Picture; Jay Cairns, Thanhouser; E. B. Hesser, Sawyer; H. Z. Levine, Box Office Attractions; B. P. Schulberg, Famous Players; J. S. McSween, Great Northern; Whitman L. Bennet, Jesse Lasky; Mrs. J. S. Johnson, Paramount; W. T. Gentz, Warners; Jacob Wilk, World Film; Carl Horton Pierce, Bosworth; W. A. Johnston, News; W. Stephen Bush, World; Miss Mabel Condon, MOTOGRAPHY; Mr. Mooney, Biograph; H. Goldberg, Casino Film Co., Detroit; W. G. McGuire, National Board; Orrin G. Cocks, National Board; J. W. Binder.

Leopold Wharton, Director

Leopold Wharton, selected from a large field of experts to direct the Pathe serial, "The Exploits of Elaine," has had a long and interesting experience. He was born in Manchester, England, in 1870, but was brought to this country only two years later by his parents, who settled in Hempstead, Tex., at that time known as "Six Shooter." Being of an adventurous disposition, he ran away from home when only eleven years old and became a fancy roller skater on the stage, earning a good salary by the time he was twelve. At this time he met Minnie Maddern, who wanted to adopt him and make a great actor of him. Her kindness to him made him think of home and mother, so back he went to his own people. In 1888, however, the call of the stage was too strong for him, so he again ventured into the theatrical world. In 1909 he became interested in pictures and scored a hit as Abraham Lincoln in the Pathe play. He became a director for the same company a short time later and continued as such until about a year ago, when he and his brother Theodore formed Wharton, Inc.

Brevities of the Business

H. A. D'Arcy, head of the Lubin publicity department, paid a week-end visit to New York, New Year's, and was a welcome visitor at the Room of the Green Rug and the other offices to which he paid his respects.

Cheery wishes for the New Year gave "The Room" further cause for gratitude. Came prosperity wishes from the Essanay Film Company, with the names of Vernon S. Day, Charles F. Stark and W. Fay Lynch appended; from Mr. and Mrs. B. P. Schulberg, from Ruth Stonehouse, Neil G. Caward, Agnes Egan Cobb, Augusta Cary, Romaine Fielding, Nicholas Power; Edward Earl, secretary of the Nicholas Power Company; from the publicity department of the Mutual Film Corporation; representative of Arthur James, director; Merritt Crawford, Stanton Leeds, Henry James, Marion Savage and Albert S. LeVino; Mr. and Mrs. Harvey L. Gates, Mr. and Mrs. George Blaisdell, Agnes Kessler and Paul Panzer.

The annual meeting of the Photoplayers' Club of Los Angeles will be held on Saturday evening, January 9. Officers for the new year will be selected at that time.

Some sixteen members of the World Film Corporation's comedy company will leave the end of this week for Jacksonville, Florida, where many productions will be staged under the direction of Fred Mace. Pliny Horne, son of the well known and popular "Billy" Horne will act as cameraman

John Harden, manager of the Chicago branch of the Eclectic Film Company, loaned several reels of film to an international gathering of insurance men banqueting at the La Salle Hotel on Monday evening, January 4. Among other prints run off was the first installment of "The Exploits of Elaine," in which one of the leading characters is the president of an insurance concern.

Arthur Rosenbach has resigned as sales manager of the Excelsior Feature Film Company and will become a member of the executive staff of the Alliance Films Corporation.

William Watkins, captain of the extra players of the Vitagraph company, has been in St. Mary's hospital, Brooklyn, for three or four weeks. Mr. Watkins underwent an operation for appendicitis. He is reported convalescent and expected to be on duty in a short time.

Max Spiegel, one of the owners of the Strand theater, New York city, while on his honeymoon with his bride in Florida, met Frank Powell, director of the William Fox players in the "A Fool There Was" company. Mr. Powell, always keen on engaging big personalities for his productions, lost no time in impressing Mr. Spiegel and his bride into service and used them in one of the big scenes of the play.

The Williamson Submarine Expedition motion pictures, which began a run in the Fine Arts theater, Chicago, Monday, December 28, under the auspices of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, at the close of the first week have smashed all records for crowds and box office receipts.

Mark Daniels, general superintendent of all the national parks in the country, was a visitor recently at the Thanhouser New Rochelle studios. Mr. Daniels is working to interest Congress in the value of motion pictures as a means of popularizing the national reservations. The Thanhouser company has a series of scenic and dramatic films taken in Yellowstone Park, already released or soon to be released in the Mutual program.

Not a day was lost by Max Figman of the Masterpiece company after finishing "The Truth Wagon" and shipping the negative East to the Alliance Films Corporation, before he and his players were busy at work upon another picture. "Jack Chanty," from the pen of Hulbert Footner, the noted journalist, is the next production to be made. This is to be followed by "Lord Loveland Discovers America," from the novel by C. N. and A. Williamson.

E. D. Horkheimer, secretary and treasurer of the Balboa Amusement Producing Company of Long Beach, Cal., who has been in New York since early in November, has been kept busy exhibiting and selling Balboa feature films, which are in big demand among such discriminating buyers as Charles Pathe.

After an ad asking for babies between 8 and 18 months of age appeared last week in the Flushing (L. I.) Journal, babies in carriages and babies in go-carts arrived at the Gaumont studios to the number of twenty-five or more for a new comedy the Gaumont Company is producing at its Flushing plant. Joseph Levering, director, was limited to a selection of fifteen babies and had to use a great deal of tact and diplomacy in making his selections, so that no mother would go away offended or feeling that her infant cherub had been refused a place in the movies on account of lack of beauty and sweetness.

Billie Walsh, the popular Broadway comedian, has joined the Keystone forces and will accompany Harry D. Ward, the Dutch character comedian, and Messrs. Kessel and Bauman to the California studios of that company.

House Peters has been selected to play the role of northern officer opposite Miss Blanche Sweet's southern belle character in the Lasky production, "The Warrens of Virginia."

Henry Otto, the American-Mutual director, is just now having the odd experience of seeing two sets of pictures directed by him offered to exhibitors at one and the same time. These two sets comprise the ones made recently while working with the Balboa Amusement Company, and the pictures he is making now for the American Company.

Harry Todd is nursing a sore nose as the result of a battle with potatoes with Slippery Slim in the Essanay play, "The Battle of Snakeville." Both pelted each other fiercely with the vegetables until they were bruised from head to foot.

At the automobile show now being held at the Grand Central Palace, New York city, the Vitagraph girls are in evidence. By special request of the committee, Anita Stewart, Lillian Walker and Eleanor Woodruff, the Vitagraph players, will have charge of the souvenir program booth.

The World Film Corporation has just appointed C. W. Sawin its southern district manager. Mr. Sawin's neighborhood will extend from Washington, D. C., to Florida on the eastern side and goes from the coast to Dallas, Tex., in the other direction. His more immediate object is to build up work around Atlanta, Ga., and Birmingham, Ala.

Biograph Company—There has been a fairly active demand for this stock within the past week, but very few transactions.

Mutual Film Corporation—A decline in the common from 77 to 70 apparently has had more than a market reaction back of it, and some developments in this stock may be expected in the next two weeks.

New York Motion Picture Company—Is now being bid for, with any rights that originate in January, and 78 has been bid on this basis. The word "dividends" subtly suggests itself to stockholders.

Thanhouser Syndicate Corporation—The later episodes—from the 7th to the 15th—have been reconstructed. We understand Daniel Carson Goodman and Mr. Sullivan—in the respective roles of scenario originator and director—are now conspicuous by their absence, and Howard Hansell has sole charge of production. Both preferred and common have declined within the past week.

Syndicate Film Corporation—This stock is a little easier and some was offered at under 150 last week.

Willie Hoppe, the billiard player, was a recent visitor to the Griffith-Mutual studios in Los Angeles, where his brother-in-law, Raoul Walsh, plays before the camera. He became greatly interested in motion picture work and appeared in the mob scene of "The Lost House," a Richard Harding Davis feature soon to be released on the Mutual program.

Two imported Persian cats valued at $2,500 will be seen in "Zudora." The pets were purchased from Commodore E. C. Benedict of Greenwich, and possess titled pedigrees that would make jealous some of the courts of Europe.

Harry L. Reichenbach, formerly general press representative and advertising manager of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company and recently with the Alco Film Corporation, resigned his position with the latter concern this week to join the forces of Bosworth, Inc., and will be associated with that company at its eastern headquarters, 220 West Forty-second street, New York city.

The American Film Manufacturing Company, under direction of Henry Otto, is staging "Silence," a two-reel drama written by Webster Campbell of the Beauty company and dealing with heredity.

William Crimmins, who made a good impression on all who saw the Kinetophote's "The Coming Power," because of his realistic presentation of the character of the "vulture," has been engaged to do two character parts in Richard Bennett's production of Eugene Brieux's "Maternity," which is to open soon at the Princess theater, New York.

S. J. Berman is now the manager of the New York exchange of the World Film Corporation. He took over the direction of that branch Monday, December 28. Prior to coming into this work, Manager Berman was located in Kansas City, where he represented the Thanhouser Syndicate Corporation and devoted his attention to the "Million Dollar Mystery" and "Zudora."

The scenario editor of the Lubin Company in Philadelphia and his staff of writers do some exceedingly clever and instructive acting in Emmett Campbell Hall's new play, "Such Things Really Happen." George W. Terwilliger, who is directing the play, admits the acting, and the writers themselves concede the rest. It was a great occasion in the Lubin studios, for the scenario board rarely performs for the camera.

Eddie Dillon is taking a brief rest from comedy production and has staged for use on the Mutual program the Griffith-Mutual two-reel society drama, "The Love Pirate." Fay Tincher, who scored as the siren in "The Battle of the Sexes," is again playing the role of a vampire woman. Miss Tincher has been playing nothing but comedy parts for almost a year, and as Ethel, the stenographer, in the "Bill" series she has won great popularity.

Helen Dunbar's little Japanese baby, which the Essanay actress adopted several weeks ago, saw its first Christmas tree last week.

A night letter by telegraph was received at the Vitagraph studios on Christmas eve from John Bunny, in which he says: "Greetings and heartiest best wishes to you and to all my colleagues for a merry Christmas and a happy New Year.

A reconstruction gang was at work in the Edison plant within a few hours after the last fireman departed from the scene.

Though denied the privilege of participating in the festivities, I am with you in spirit and longing to return to the fold."

In "The Lost House," a film adapted from Richard Harding Davis' novelette and now a Griffith-Mutual release in the Mutual program, more than a dozen real live newspaper men make their first appearance upon the screen. The scene is a press club. Director Cabanne wanted realism and asked Los Angeles newspaper men to volunteer for the occasion, and he shortly had a dozen of them rehearsing.

The little ones at the New York Foundling Hospital had as happy a New Year's day as any set of youngsters could hope for. An equipment for the showing of the moving pictures was set up by the Kinetophote Corporation, which also showed several Italian comedy films without charge to the institution. A fireproof booth was put up in the assembly room at the hospital and the place was turned, for the time being, into a regulation motion picture theater.

One of the surprises of the new year will be the picturization of "After Dark." This is the famous old melodrama in which William A. Brady made a great impression as an actor. Mr. Brady is at work on the scenario now and he will assist in the production of this photoplay. It will be released on the World Film Corporation schedule in the near future, with Robert Warwick and Alice Brady in the leads.

Pauline Bush spent a nice, quiet, uneventful day on the 25th of December. She and Alan Dwan, her fiance, you know, went to the University City Hospital to see Fred Williams, whose skull was badly fractured and who is in rather a bad condition. Then they took presents around and saw a lot of people and received lots of congratulations. Later came dinner with Marshall and Mrs. Neilan, and then, as a sort of finish up, they attended the real old southern open house party given by James and Mrs. Neil.

It rained at Inceville, Cal., several weeks ago, and Thomas H. Ince made good use of it in "A Midas of the Desert," released by the Kay-Bee company. As the threads of the story unweave, the fall rains bring malaria. Mr. Ince planned a number of different ways to obtain the proper effect, and while the scenes were still pending, the real rain came.

Edwin August, who is making that mysterious picture for the Kinetophote, and Bliss Milford, his leading woman in Kinetophote productions, have been invited to lead the grand march at the initial ball of the exhibitors of Trenton, N. J., on January 18. Hal August, who is playing in his brother's first Kinetophote picture, will accompany him and Miss Milford to Trenton.

Commencing on January 4, 1915, the World Film Corporation will make a weekly presentation of "Bertlevyettes," in one reel, showing Bert Levy himself and his work. Mr. Levy has been before the world for many years as a stage entertainer, and the man and his work are familiar to millions.

In the latest announcement from the American-Mutual studios at Santa Barbara, Cal., lovers of literature and readers of novels, as well as the motion picture fans, will find reason for rejoicing, for the American Company is to film for the Mutual program the great novel of Stevenson's son-in-law, Lloyd Osborne, published several years ago and entitled "Infatuation."

At the Vitagraph theater on Monday evening, December 28, the patrons of that evening were very much startled to find a gentleman with a very familiar face taking the tickets at the door. He did it with such a businesslike air and snap, everybody was so taken aback they paused in astonishment. His identity was finally discovered by Jimmy Young, who could scarcely believe his eyes and gave vent to his surprise with: "Well, I'll be blowed. It's Sidney Drew." Shaking hands, they indulged in a hearty laugh and everybody joined in the chorus and acknowledged Sid's versatility.

In preparation at the Imp-Universal studio in New York city are three feature photoplays. Director Stuart Paton is putting on a two reeler, the title of which is "The Black Pearl." Following that he will produce "The Eternal Pursuit," a two-reel comedy drama. Mary Fuller will star in another two reeler, "The Ingle-Bacon Compact."

"Josie" A. Levy, traveling representative of the World Film Corporation's Pittsburgh office, spent last week in Hagerstown, Md., and points along the southern part of Pennsylvania. He reports bookings good. "Josie" brought his wife to Pittsburgh recently from Philadelphia.

In producing "Runaway June," the new serial photoplay based on the novel written particularly for this purpose by George Randolph Chester, the Reliance Company, which is making the production, has spared no expense in honoring Dame Fashion. It has assembled a company of men and women who not only know how to act, but who also know how to wear clothes. As they are to have the right clothes—right from the viewpoint of Fifth avenue—it is also essential that they know how to wear them in the right way, and they were selected with this essential requirement in view.

ROLL OF STATES.

ALABAMA.

A disastrous fire in the down town district of Birmingham destroyed the Alcazar theater.

ARKANSAS.

The Pastime moving picture theater, Lake Village, suffered a loss of $1,200 by a recent fire.

H. E. Wood of the Princess theater, De Queen, has acquired the ownership of the Queen theater, and the business of the two houses has been consolidated. For a time Mr. Wood will continue to show pictures at the Princess, while the Queen is being improved.

CALIFORNIA.

The new Turner & Dahnken theater on Kittredge street, Berkeley, was opened December 10. It is one of the handsomest and largest theaters on the Turner & Dahnken circuit. The design of the building is of the Grecian type and the decorations are very beautiful. It will be devoted to high-class photoplay masterpieces.

The Orpheum moving picture house, under the management of George Lasher, and the Buchwalter moving picture house, under J. Buchwalter, have consolidated and are running moving pictures in the Orpheum building, Susanville.

J. A. Quinn, a wealthy moving picture theater operator of Los Angeles, is planning to enter the motion picture business in San Francisco. Negotiations are now being conducted for the lease on property and the construction of a new moving picture theater in the down town district that will be built on more elaborate plans than any now being operated in this city. The new theater will have a seating capacity of 3,000.

The Film Makers. Capital stock $150,000; subscribed $5.00. Directors: Paul Weidenbeck, Myrtle A. Weidenbeck, Jesse H. Buffum, L. C. Smith, J. Karl Lobdell.

CANADA.

The Gem theater in Brantford has been closed. J. C. Spence was confirmed as assignee and W. T. Henderson and A. M. Hartly were appointed inspectors.

DELAWARE.

Photo Drama Releasing Company, Philadelphia. Capital stock, $50,000. To carry on a general photo play film and other amusements. Incorporators: F. R. Hansel, Philadelphia; George H. B. Martin, S. C. Seymour, Camden, N. J.

FLORIDA.

The Arcade theater, West Palm Beach, has again changed hands, reverting to W. E. Moorehead, who sold out several weeks ago to Chambers & Ruff. Mr. Moorehead has engaged A. A. Tano of Kissimmee to manage the Arcade, which will continue to show a good line of motion pictures and up-to-date vaudeville.

ILLINOIS.

C. A. Conley, who sold the Majestic theater, Second and Gooding streets, La Salle, some months ago to W. H. Taylor, has again taken up the management of another show house, this time at Waukegan.

The new Diamond & Deckert motion picture theater in Havana has opened.

C. A. Conley, of Monmouth, has purchased the Barrison theater in Waukegan.

Republic Theater Company, Chicago, $2,500; theater business; P. C. McCarahan, B. W. Veirs, J. S. McClure; correspondent, J. S. McClure, attorney, suite 1314 Hartford building, Chicago.

D. Diamond and J. F. Deckard will shortly open a picture show in Havana.

A. C. von Wald, who has conducted the Palms theater in Harvard, has rented a building on North Ayer street and is having same remodeled. The theater will be known as the Majestic.

Treble Cleff Musical Movies company of Illinois, Chicago; capital, $2,500, to manufacture and deal in moving picture films, slides, etc.; incorporators, Isador Wagner, R. C. Honeck, G. D. Rose.

Optigraph company; $5,000; moving picture machines, stereopticons, photographic apparatus; James A. White, Rossiter L. White; Payton J. Tuohy.

The United Photoplay company has chosen Wilmette as the home for its new $60,000 studio. The company has purchased three acres on Wilmette avenue, one mile west of Fifteenth street, and has agreed to commence building within sixty days and have the studio completed within the next six months.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

Pathe Daily News No. 90—PATHE—DECEMBER 30.—This issue of the weekly shows the Detroit business men who were once newsboys again selling papers for charity; the famous free bread and coffee line maintained in Chicago by Charles C. Dawes; views of the various places at Naco, Mexico, along the border, protected from Mexican bullets; views of the road race held in New York City under the auspices of the Bronx Home News and in the war section views taken at Staden, Belgium; Revigny, Douai and Arras, France, also from Cape Town, South Africa.

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 1—SELIG—JANUARY 4.—This issue of the weekly shows the steamer Lusitania arriving in New York with the largest shipment of mail ever received there; the $125,000 fire at Chelsea, Mass.; the U. S. cruiser, Dixie, being overhauled in Charleston navy yard and, in the war section, a remarkable set of pictures taken in Frankfurt, Germany, by special arrangement with the German government in which German recruits are shown being drilled preparatory to being sent to the front. These are claimed to be the first pictures received from the German faction in the great European war.

Pathe Daily News No. 1—PATHE—JANUARY 4.—This issue of the weekly contains views taken at Los Angeles, Cal., and at New Orleans, La., showing a close-up view of Hans Hallo, who was caught trying to place an infernal machine aboard a French steamer; scenes in Boston, Mass., when the first cold snap permitted the opening of the various toboggan slides and skating ponds, and in the war section, views taken at or near Lens, Werwick, Menin and Ypres, Belgium; Chatham, England; Thann, Verdun and Avernes, France.

Expensive Economy — EDISON — JANUARY 6.—A comedy on the tipping habit or rather, the "necessity of tipping," that will bring more than one laugh from the spectators. Arthur Housman and William Wadsworth are seen in the leading roles. Walter Jones tires of being met with a silent request for a tip every time he looks at a waiter, bootblack, or barber, and organizes an anti-tipping society. The walking delegate of the Something For Nothing Union shadows him around, and sees that he is impressed with the importance of tipping if he wishes service. Jones is shamefully treated by a bootblack, his face handled as though it were leather by the barber, and kept waiting forty minutes in a restaurant. Through the delegate's efforts his taxi misses the train. This is the last straw. He mentally resigns from the anti-tipping association, and the delegate offers to take him home free in celebration. Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 2—SELIG—JANUARY 7.—This issue of the weekly shows the great shipment of cotton from New York to Germany; General Scott and General Bliss of the U. S. army in conference at Naco, Ariz., on the Mexican border; Harry K. Thaw, who has just been ordered back to Matteawan by the Supreme Court of the United States and, in the war section, views of German prisoners led through the streets of London and some more of the remarkable scenes taken in Germany, in several of which Emperor Wilhelm is seen at close range.

It is our aim to make this department as complete as possible, although to do this, we must have the co-operation of all the manufacturers of film in the United States. If brief stories of the films you are releasing this week are not contained in this department, it must be due to the fact that you have not supplied us with synopsis sheets. In that case please see that we are advised of your film titles and release dates, and furnished with a brief synopsis of the story. This department is intended for every film manufacturer, whether he uses our advertising pages or not.

The Girl He Brought Home—BIOGRAPH—JANUARY 11.—Young Bruce goes down to open the family's country home and meets the gardener's daughter, who has ventured into the great living room, thinking no one about. Thus unconventionally brought together the two young people soon fall in love and one day Bruce announces that he is bringing home a bride with him. The family arranges a reception to introduce Bruce's wife to his social set, but on the evening of the reception is scandalized when the young lady slips off her tight slippers and wiggles her aching toes. When Bruce's former sweetheart calls, the girl Bruce brought home overhears the remark, "I wish he had married you," and, enraged, makes a scene and then returns to the country. Bruce, however, follows and later they are reconciled.

A Superfluous Baby — EDISON—JANUARY 11.—Wood B. Wedd's sentimental experiences continue to be discouraging and laughable. Darby Jenks makes his marriageable friend, Wood B. Wedd, acquainted with charming Lotty, and the couple become ardent lovers. One day a lady approaches Darby and Wood B. who are standing in front of a fashionable department store, pushes her baby into Wedd's arms, and disappears into the store. The presence of the baby proves embarrassing in time, and in the end ruins the romances of the two bachelors. C.R.C.

Sweedie's Suicide—ESSANAY—JANUARY 11.—Another of the inimitable Sweedie comedies with Wallace Beery in the leading role—jilted by her sweetheart, Sweedie determines to commit suicide and writes a note to her lover explaining all about it. Meanwhile some tricksters dope Sweedie and while she is asleep erect a tombstone beside her. On waking Sweedie does not know whether she is alive or a ghost, but when she beholds her lover mourning at her grave she determines to make sure and so sails in and all but annihilates the mourners, thus proving conclusively to herself that she is alive.

The Adventure at Briarcliff—KALEM—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 11.—Upon their graduation, Edith, Claire and Evelyn vow never to marry until full suffrage has been granted their sex. Edith and Claire, who own adjoining estates, return home and shortly afterward Edith, egged on by Claire, orders Dan, who has been camping on Edith's estate, off the place. Dan, attracted by the girl's beauty, announces his intention of staying. The girl summons the constable and has Dan locked up. He is finally tried and fined $10.00. Pretending to be $1.00 short, he borrows from Edith and promptly returns to his camp. Dan later serenades the girls with his piccolo and Edith joins him near his camp. Meanwhile Jenkins, the stableman, burglarizes the house and Dan, who has been summoned by Edith, thrashes Jenkins and throws him out. For revenge Jenkins shoots Dan and the following morning Edith discovers the wound and the fact that she loves him. Evelyn appears at this moment and seeing Dan throws her arms about him. Edith is inclined to be jealous until she learns that Dan is Evelyn's brother. Snapping her fingers at the oath Edith plans to marry Dan. Marguerite Courtot and Tom Moore featured.

Patsy at College—(THIRD EPISODE OF THE PATSY BOLIVAR SERIES)—LUBIN—JANUARY 11.—Patsy sets off for college at the opening of this reel and is accompanied by Sykesy and his sister, Jane, as well as Tilly Grace. Patsy finds upon arriving that his clothing attracts considerable attention. Going in for athletics Patsy is injured in the first football game in which he takes part. One day while training on the road for the team, Patsy is passed by an automobile containing Sykesy, Tilly and Jane and another student. All these stop for luncheon at a roadhouse and while there the auto is stolen. Jane gives the alarm and a bike cop starts in pursuit. The thief, passing Patsy on the road, offers to give him a lift home and when the bike cop pinches them for speeding Patsy goes to jail. He is freed, however, on Jane's evidence and as the reel ends, Patsy is caught placing a cow in the president's library and suspended. He returns home and is put to plowing on his father's farm. Clarence Elmer featured.

The Old Code—Selig—(Two Reels)—January 11.—Pierre and Langlois, two woodsmen quarrel over the love of Marie, a forest maiden, and after engaging in a hand-to-hand combat, finally resort to the old code—a fight to death on the island. When Langlois seems likely to win on account of his treachery, Marie arrives in time to save Pierre and the lovers are finally reconciled, while Langlois is driven away. See review on page 49, issue of January 9. N.G.C.

The Treasure Temple of Bhosh—(Episode Two of "The Fates and Flora Fourflush")—Vitagraph—January 11.—The first installment of this picture ended with Flora, the beautiful millionairess, and Frank, the honest young street cleaner, falling from their balloon in the heavens, which had been burst open by the villain, Sir Simon Blackheart. As this picture begins the balloon falls into the conservatory of Flora's home and, after taking tea, the millionairess decides to visit India accompanied by Frank. They are attacked by pirates en route, the chief of whom is Sir Simon. Frank is captured, but Flora escapes in her yacht. Frank is thrown overboard after a cannon has been tied to his neck, but, by holding his breath, the brave young man manages to pick up the cannon and walk along the bottom of the ocean to safety. He finds a small boat and rows out to sea. The pirates see him coming and fire upon him, but when the shell drops in his boat, Frank picks it up and hurls it back at the pirate ship, where it explodes, killing all but Sir Simon. In India, Flora visits the famous treasure house of the Rajah which is a vault in the figure of a huge elephant. While she is within, Sir Simon, disguised as an Indian fakir, creeps up and pulls the elephant's tail, causing the roof to slide down crushing the helpless Flora. Frank who has just arrived, breaks through a stone wall with his bare hands and rescues her. Sir Simon then prevails upon the rajah to have the foreigners thrown into the alligator pit. Here the next installment will be taken up.

The Third Act—(Two Reels)—Biograph—January 12.—Roberts, an actor, neglects his wife and child for the leading lady of his company. Mrs. Roberts is driven insane by the neglect of her husband and the little daughter never forgets that awful night on which her mother finally lost her reason. The girl grows up hating her father and devotes her life to vengeance. Roberts becomes a prominent theatrical manager and his daughter eventually secures a position in one of his companies, rises to the position of leading lady and finally is able to urge Roberts to go abroad, leaving a famous playwright and herself to prepare his next big production. When he returns the girl induces him to stay away from rehearsals and on the opening night he occupies a stage box and sees the great play develop to the third act, which is a faithful reproduction of the night of long ago. Memory goads him and he cringes in his place until the star reaches her climax, points at him and declares "Thou art the man." He then leaves the theater a broken man. Years later the star, now famous, enters the theater one night with her husband, the playwright, and sees a familiar figure turned away from the stage door. It is her father, ruined and an outcast. Pity overcomes her life-long hatred and she takes him in her arms.

Olive's Other Self—(Eighth of the "Olive's Opportunities" Series)—Edison—January 12.—Olive is run down by an automobile in which is Maurice Castle, a well known artist, and when she awakes in a hospital is suffering from aphasia. She turns from her former friends and becomes a model in Castle's studio, drinking and smoking as if she were used to it. Castle attempts to attack her and she stabs him. The sight of her blood-stained hands restores her memory and her sweetheart calls and takes her away in a fainting condition. Mabel Trunnelle featured.

By a Strange Road—Essanay—January 12.—Jim Melcher, a swindler, induces Rhoda, a society girl, to marry him and she, through a sense of loyalty, stands by him even after she discovers his dishonesty. Melcher proposes to pull off the biggest robbery of his career in the home of Miss Herrick and sends Rhoda there to apply for a job as companion to Miss Herrick and later assist him. She meets Captain Featherstone there and falls in love with him. Refusing to help her husband with his scheme, Melcher makes the attempt alone and is killed by a detective, thus clearing the way for Captain Featherstone to marry Rhoda. Bryant Washburn, Gerda Holmes and Richard Travers featured.

A Bold, Bad Burglar—Kalem—January 12.—Pussyfoot Pete, a burglar gains entrance into the home of Araminta, an old maid, who, instead of being frightened, thanks Providence for sending her a man. The burglar relates the sad story of his life and robs Araminta of her valuables, while the old maid is preparing a meal for him. The burglar tries to escape, but is caught in the window and kindly assisted by the sheriff to safety. Later the sheriff misses his watch and concludes that Pete must be a burglar. Araminta and the sheriff set out in pursuit and finally capture him and Araminta gives him the chance to either marry her or go to jail. Pete, after one look at her face, decides to go to jail, and the sheriff, overcome with admiration for the fearless woman who has captured the burglar, pops the question. Ethel Teare featured.

Baseball and Trouble—Lubin—January 12.—Jack Potts goes to attend a ball game and arranges with his wife to 'phone the boss he is ill. The boss insists on coming out to the house to see how Jack is and Mrs. Potts hires a tramp to take Jack's place. She does him up in bandages until he is unrecognizable and tells the boss that Jack tried to go to the office, but was run over by an automobile. The boss then insists upon telephoning for an ambulance to take Jack to the hospital and while he is telephoning Jack returns home and the tramp demands more money to play his part. When the boss returns, Mrs. Potts explains that Jack is his twin brother. The boss meanwhile is out looking for the coming of the ambulance and Jack, by changing the numbers on his house and another, manages to have the boss himself taken to the hospital in the ambulance. Lilly Leslie and William Cohill featured.

Harold's Bad Man—Selig—January 12.—Admirers of Tom Mix have that rare opportunity in this picture of seeing their hero as he looks in real life, for this is one film in which Tom Mix does not appear as a cowboy, but rather as a young easterner on a vacation in the west. The film abounds in action and there is much comedy since the easterner is mistaken for an outlaw and scares the sheriff nearly to death before he learns that the newcomer is only a tenderfoot. N.G.C.

The Mix-up in Dress Suitcases—(Two Reels)—Vitagraph—January 12.—Returning from his honeymoon, Henry Brown finds a letter from Stella La Blanche, threatening to publish his love-letters unless he sends her a large check. He starts for Philadelphia to meet Stella and tells his wife he is going to visit Stevens, an old friend. He secures the letters and, returning home, accidentally exchanges his suitcase for that of Gentleman Harry, a crook. During his absence his wife has learned that Stevens' home had been robbed of its silverware, finds her husband knows nothing of this, and becomes suspicious, and still more so when, upon opening his suitcase she finds it filled with silverware. She believes her husband a thief and starts for Philadelphia to return the silverware. Meanwhile Gentleman Harry calls on Brown and demands his suitcase. Learning that Mrs. Brown has it, the crook refuses to give Brown his letters and in the waiting room of the depot swaps suitcases with Mrs. Brown. Thinking Harry still has his letters, Brown causes his arrest and receives a reward of $500. He then follows his wife and manages by a clever trick to secure the letters. His wife is amazed upon opening the suitcase to find the silverware transformed into her husband's quite ordinary belongings. The wife explains and apologizes for her suspicion, though she is still wondering what became of the silverware. Lee Beggs featured.

McGinty and the Count—Edison—January 13.—Edward O'Connor and Edward Boulden are here seen as the duelists, McGinty and Count Bunkio, the former choosing bricks and cobblestones as his weapons, and the latter, adhering to the ancient custom of settling differences with swords. The quarrel began at the ditch in which Dinny McGinty presides over four or five Italians. Count Bunkio happens along, and is rudely insulted by Dinny. The count insists on settling the affair on the field of honor, and Dinny arrives at dawn of the appointed day armed with brickbats and other missiles. After the fusilade Dinny accepts the proffered fencing sword, and the duel begins. The count dodges one of the Irishman's full arm swings, and tries to run him through, but the sword will go no further than the coat-lining. One of Mrs. McGinty's biscuits located in his inside coat pocket has saved Dinny's life. C.R.C.

Curing the Cook—EDISON—JANUARY 13.—On the same reel with "McGinty and the Count." The situations are a little far-stretched but nevertheless clean and humorous. The idea of the three young fellows being so chummy that they always walk in lock-step is a little overplayed. Bridget, the cook, allows her love of liquor to overcome her better judgment at mealtime, and the hungry boarders decide to cure her. They obtain a human skeleton, and take particular pains to see that it confronts Bridget in the most "spooky" places. The cook swears off on drinking, and the boarders thereafter receive their meals on time. C.R.C.

The Fable of the Fellow Who Had a Friend Who Knew a Girl Who Had a Friend — ESSANAY — JANUARY 13. — Mr. Angora was called up by a lodge brother, who knew a corker who had a school chum visiting her. They went to call, but the school chum proved a lemon, who preferred art and literature to baseball talk. Sometime later Mr. Fyxit had another friend who had a friend and again Mr. Angora was the goat. They all went to a cafe and Mr. Fyxit being called to the phone failed to return and Mr. Angora had to pay the check. Leo White featured.

The Stolen Ruby — KALEM — (TWO REELS)—JANUARY 13.—Patrolman Killegren hears shots and hurries out of his home. He meets two brother officers who tell him that they have been pursuing two thieves who have just sought refuge in his home. Positive that no one had entered his home, Killegren conducts the policemen through the house and is startled upon entering the room of his son, Alex, to find the boy at home. Knowing that the boy had not been in the room more than five minutes, Killegren is filled with a terrible suspicion. After the officers have departed, the father returns to Alex's room and learns that the boy had been duped by Marcia Judson, an adventuress, into helping her steal a ruby from Duare, a collector of gems. After the robbery he had aided her to escape from the police by hiding her in his room, but when he attempted to take the jewel from her he had been struck from behind and knocked senseless. While the father is debating what to do with the boy, he learns that the ruby has ben recovered and that Marcia has been captured by Duare's Hindu servant. Delighted at the turn of events, Killegren arranges for his son's exoneration. Henry Hallam featured.

When Honor Wakes—(TWO REELS)—LUBIN—JANUARY 13.—Waring, an army lieutenant, who had been compelled to resign from the service for cheating at cards, goes to a cheap hotel in San Francisco and plans to commit suicide. He is attracted by the smell of gas from an adjoining room and on investigating finds Ann Gray, a young woman who is also attempting suicide, having been tempted to commit a theft in the department store in which she works. Both tell their story of disgrace and a moment later the great San Francisco earthquake occurs and the man and girl rush forth to safety. The lieutenant manages to organize some of the refugees and shortly afterwards rescues Mrs. Blake, wife of Major Blake, who had him discharged from the army, from a burning hotel. Blake assists in having Waring restored to the service on account of his heroic deed and Ann and Waring seem likely to marry as the picture ends. L. C. Shumway and Velma Whitman featured.

The Richest Girl in the World—SELIG—JANUARY 13.—This Selig story seems to prove that love is far more to be desired than riches. Doris Payne, with an income of more than a million dollars a year, is unhappy until she appears in an exceedingly humble role on the farm of an admirer, who does not know of her tremendous wealth. Finally finding true enjoyment in the simple country life, Doris makes known both her wealth and her love for the young man. Stella Razeto and Guy Oliver featured. N.G.C.

The Hair of Her Head—VITAGRAPH—JANUARY 13.—Jeremiah Sinks is fearfully jealous of his bride of a few months and, after visiting a fortune-teller, is led to believe his wife flirting with another man. On the way home Sinks sees a gentleman similar in appearance to the one described by the fortune-teller, accompanied by a veiled woman, and after following the couple to the sea shore, he throws the man into the water and carries the woman home, thinking her his wife, but on arriving home is confronted by Mrs. Sinks herself, and a moment or two later two policemen enter and arrest Sinks. The strange man appears to claim his wife and proves to be Jim Gladden, from Mrs. Sinks' home town. Introductions follow and all visit the station house, where Sinks explains how everything happened. Sidney Drew featured.

Getting Into a Scrape—BIOGRAPH—JANUARY 14.—Wifey sends hubby out to get a shave. He enters a shop where lady barbers operate. While waiting for his turn he is seen by his enemy flirting with the pretty manicurist, and the enemy brings wifey. She takes the place of one of the lady barbers and, with a dull razor and a shaving brush which insists on getting into his eyes and mouth, convinces hubby quickly of the error of his ways. On the same reel is—

The Cheese Industry—A near-educational in which one sees all of the details of this industry, following the milk from the cow to the customer, though there is a lot of rollicking fun along with the instruction given in the picture.

When Slippery Went for the Eggs—ESSANAY—JANUARY 14.—When eggs go up to $6.00 a dozen, Slim and Sophie try in every way to make their hens lay. Mustang Pete sends Slim a note advising him to give the hens hot water to drink and when Slim does this according to directions, Mustang stands outside the coop and slips several eggs under the hens through a hole in the wall. Slim is delighted, but suddenly catches sight of Mustang's arm. He fastens it inside the coop and going outside manages to make Mustang pay dearly for his fun. Victor Potel featured.

The Friendship of Lamond—(TWO REELS) — LUBIN — JANUARY 14.—Victor Lamond, a soldier of fortune, goes to visit his friend William Hardy on his Virginia plantation. He discovers that Elsie, the girl wife of Hardy, is flirting outrageously with Harold Maxim, a handsome rascal. Lamond determines to save his friend from humiliation and to foil Maxim, though to do so he has to pose as a rival and by frustrating the elopement of Maxim and Elsie he causes Elsie to become more infatuated with him than she had been with Maxim. Realizing it is picturesque heroic action that the girl is really in love with, Lamond arranges to disillusion her, and while she is present he insults her husband over the card table and when the husband challenges him to a duel apparently with cowardly intent fires while the husband's back is turned, and then cringes with fear and begs for mercy. The husband's anger changes to contempt and Lamond is ordered out of the house. As he had calculated, however, Elsie turns to her husband with all the admiration and love of which her nature is capable, while Lamond departs forever from her life. Earle Metcalf and Ormi Hawley featured.

Distilled Spirits—MINA—JANUARY 14.—A spectacular trick film in which one beholds many of the seemingly miraculous feats possible to motion picture photography. McQuarrie spends his last cent for a bottle of spirits and when thoroughly inebriated, crawls into a barrel and falls asleep. He dreams the devil appears, seals up the barrel and rolls him down the mountain side. The barrel plunges off the precipice and is dashed to bits on the rocks below. McQuarrie is then picked up by some soldiers and taken before their general, the bottle of spirits being found, he is sentenced to death, placed in a huge cannon and blown to atoms. He lands in a boiling caldron in which some savage islanders are cooking and when they discover the bottle, he is sentenced to wander alone on a desert island. There he meets Gideon, king of the giants, who, upon the discovery of the bottle crushes McQuarrie into a bag and hurls him back to the land from whence he came. After numerous other exciting adventures, McQuarrie seeks rest for himself by crawling into the battered barrel from which he had been hurled, and the barrel rolls back up the precipice and the mountain side to the very spot in which he went to sleep, and there he discovers that he has only been dreaming. The lesson, however, causes him to vow never to drink again.

The Legend of Lone Tree—Vitagraph—January 14.—In a beautiful series of visions the Legend of Lone Tree, as it is related to a young Indian boy by an old medicine man, appears on the screen. Twanda, a Chippewa maiden, is loved by Red Wolf, a Chippewa brave, and Many Feathers, a Delaware brave. Lone Tree, the maiden's father, favors the suit of Red Wolf, though Twanda loves Many Feathers. When Twanda finds herself unable to avoid a marriage with Red Wolf, she runs away and meets Many Feathers. Lone Tree, the father of Twanda, and Tired Horse, the father of Many Feathers, set out in pursuit of their children and when Lone Tree finds the lovers together sets upon Many Feathers. After a bitter struggle Lone Tree manages to hurl Many Feathers over a high cliff and Twanda, with a cry of despair, throws herself after her lover. When Tired Horse arrives and learns what has happened, he, in a terrible rage, visits a curse upon Lone Tree and there on the mountain top before the wondering eyes of the watching braves, Lone Tree, in accordance with the curse, dissolves into a lone tree. Myrtle Gonzalez and Alfred D. Vosburgh featured.

The Inevitable Retribution—Biograph—January 15.—Desperate because his mortgage is due and he cannot meet it, a young farmer murders an itinerant peddler who visits the farm, casts his body into a stream and secretes all evidence of his crime. However, he retains a shawl from the peddler's pack, which he gives to his wife, telling her that the peddler gave it to her for her kindness to him. Friends of the peddler set out to seek him. When all the clues point to the farmer's house and they see the wife wearing the shawl, the farmer is arrested and brought to trial. It is discovered that the peddler had not died, but had been saved, taken to the hospital and, his memory completely restored, he appears to testify against the farmer. The picture ends with the conviction of the farmer for assault with intent to kill.

Lena—Edison—January 15.—The Miggles family have a serious time keeping competent help as each maid proves to be worse than the one before. Jeanette Brewster, president of the Society for Improving the Condition of Domestic Servants, determines to get some experience and at an employment agency is hired by Mr. Miggles. Jack Miggles, the son, falls in love with the new maid at which Mrs. Miggles is horrified. When Mrs. Miggles visits the society of which Miss Brewster is head, she learns with surprise that her "Lena" is none other than Miss Brewster, and so consents to Jack's marriage to her. Mariam Nesbitt featured.

Dear Old Girl—Essanay--(Two Reels)—January 15.—Ted Warren, a student at Cornell, is to be married on his graduation day at the fraternity house. Passing through the campus on his way to the station to meet his bride, Warren hears the university chimes ring out the melody of "Dear Old Girl" and he remarks to his companions that he is the happiest man in the world. A few moments later a telegram arrives, stating that the train on which his bride was to arrive was wrecked and she was killed. Warren's mind is unbalanced by the shock and he is taken back to the fraternity house, though each day when he hears the chimes ring he thinks it is his wedding day and insists on going to the station. One day he manages to elude the servant who watches over him and in his eagerness runs down the track. His friends set out to find him and discover him badly injured in a ditch beside the track, he having been struck by the train. Dying he sees a vision of his bride coming to greet him, this vision scene being the close of the picture. Francix X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne featured.

A Boob For Luck—Kalem—January 15.—When his uncle Hiram forbids Jed to marry Mary, Jed leaves the farm to make his fortune in the city. At the same time Hiram receives a message from two confidence men offering some green goods for sale. Hiram arrives in the city with a $5,000 bank roll from which he is quickly separated by Hoyle and Casey, the confidence men, and Jed at the same time is waylaid and robbed by highwaymen and thrown into an alleyway. Hiram discovers that he has been swindled and starts in pursuit of the crooks and the latter, threatened with capture, throw Hiram's roll of bills into an alleyway. By chance the bills fall at the feet of Jed, who is just regaining consciousness, and after buying himself a new outfit, returns home with the roll of money which overcomes his uncle's objections and Jed marries Mary. Leon Coleman featured.

Out of the Storm—Lubin—January 15.—Buck Hennessy holds up and robs the paymaster of the Bonnie Bell mine and then seeks refuge in the cabin of Phil Martin, an employee in the mine. Phil is absent and Hetty, his wife, her baby and a dog are alone in the cabin. Buck locks them up in the tiny kitchen and threatens to shoot the first person entering the cabin door and then falls asleep. Hetty knows that she must prevent the return of Phil and fastens a note to the neck of the dog, forces the animal through the chimney, from which the stove pipe has been removed, and sends him to meet Phil. Phil receives and reads the note, procures help and rounds up the bandit.

The Snailburg Volunteers—Selig—January 15.—A Selig burlesque on sudden patriotism in a rural community when news arrives that war with Mexico is imminent. The villagers hastily organize a volunteer force to repel invaders, and two hobos, one disguised as a Mexican spy and the other as an American officer pursuing him, have the time of their lives before the volunteers wake up to the fact that they are being bamboozled. John Lancaster is featured in the role of Ollwiz Braggen. N.G.C.

Chiefly Concerning Males—Vitagraph—January 15.—It all began through Sonny Jim's love for the make-believe. He wants to be a real postman and so when father gives him an important business letter and Bridget, the cook, a letter to Patrick, the iceman, and his aunt Alice a letter in which she refuses her suitor, Peter, because of a trifling quarrel, the little postman deposits all the letters in the oat bin in the barn, for that was his make-believe letter box. Daddy soon discovers that a big business opportunity had been lost, Bridget waits in vain for her lover, Peter not hearing from Alice, believes himself forgiven and apparently there was to be serious trouble all around. Alice decides to really forgive Peter, Bridget and Patrick settle their differences and Daddy discovers that the business deal into which he had contemplated going is a fraud, so the little postman eventually explains what he did with the letters and is forgiven. Bobby Connelly featured.

The House of Horror—Biograph—January 16.—Unable to satisfy his wife's demand for money, Clark visits his friend, a money-lender. But prior to the visit he had imbibed a little too much and his friend puts him to bed. In the morning he awakens and discovers the money-lender dead and is horror-stricken with the thought that he has murdered him while under the influence of liquor. The discovery of Clark's cane fastens suspicion upon him and when the police visit his home he escapes through a window and visits a slum district. He gives the detectives the slip and while crouching in a dark hall overhears two thugs in another room boasting of their crime and one confessing he killed the money-lender. Clark, in his excitement, makes a noise which attracts the attention of the men and they set upon him. The detectives, who, meanwhile, have been seeking Clark, are attracted by the hubbub and arrive in time to apprehend the real criminals.

The Banker's Double—EDISON—JANUARY 16.—This is one of the "Below the Dead Line" series. Felix Boyd is called on the telephone one day, and told to hurry to the offices of Hursey and Smith. The detective catches the word "robbers," but the voice stops abruptly in the middle of the sentence, and a second later a noise as of a body falling is plainly heard over the wire. Arriving at the bankers' offices Boyd finds Smith lying on the floor apparently unconscious. When revived the man tells a very plausible story, but Boyd instinctively feels that there is something behind it all, and determines to watch Smith. The result is that the banker leads him to master-crook Wyckoff's headquarters where he sees them divide the money taken from the bankers' safe. Boyd captures the gang, exposes Smith's put-up job, and later astounds Jimmy Coleman of central headquarters with his explanation of how simple his deduction system really is. C.R.C.

Broncho Billy and the Sisters—ESSANAY—JANUARY 16.—Broncho Billy becomes engaged to Mae, whose sister, Marguerite, is a cripple. Marguerite starts saving $100, necessary for an operation that will cure her. Broncho Billy is caught making moonshine whiskey and Mae returns his ring, but Marguerite uses the $100 it took her so long to save, to release him, she having learned that the government would release captured moonshiners upon payment of $100. That evening finds Broncho Billy asking Marguerite to be his wife, while his sister becomes engaged to another man. G. M. Anderson featured.

The Broken Circuit—KALEM—JANUARY 16.—Another episode of the exciting serial 'The Hazards of Helen." Helen, who lives in a room adjoining the telegraph office, hears men rifling the safe and appears with a revolver. The crooks overpower her, rob the safe and escape on a hand car. Helen, endeavoring to pursue them, gets as far as the railroad track when she falls across the rails. The noise of an oncoming train warns her of her terrible peril. The sight of the bonding wires connecting the ends of the rails gives her an inspiration and with a desperate effort Helen tears the wires loose with her feet, thus breaking the circuit and causing a semaphore fifty yards away to flash out its warning, which stops the train. As a result of the girl's story, a message is sent to a nearby switch tower which results in the hand car being derailed and the bandits captured. Helen Holmes featured.

Mr. Stubbs' Pen—LUBIN—JANUARY 16.—At a party given by his business acquaintances Mr. Stubbs is presented with a fountain pen. Next morning in attempting to fill it, he spills the ink all over himself, his stenographer and his office in general. When a client enters to have an important document signed, he spatters it so much that in anger he throws the pen out of the window. The pen strikes a street peddler who reads the name "J. Stubbs" on its side, returns it to Stubbs and demands a reward. After spoiling several vests and cigars, Stubbs ties the pen in a handkerchief along with a brick and drops it into the river. A fisherman hauls it ashore in his net and sells it to a jeweler and later Mrs. Stubbs, seeking a present for her husband, buys it from the jeweler and presents it as her gift. On the same reel is:

Spaghetti and Lottery—LUBIN—JANUARY 16.—Antonio and Pascale spend all their money for a lottery ticket and when it comes time to eat enter a restaurant and on pure nerve order the biggest dish of spaghetti ever served in the place. When the other customers ridicule the order that is served they start a fight. As a result of the fight spaghetti is hurled to all portions of the room and Antonio and Pascale flee, but are finally captured and are about to fare badly when the policy dealer appears with the money which their lottery has won. They square the damages and are once happy.

Robert Thorne Forecloses—SELIG—JANUARY 16.—An exciting chase in a motor boat by another craft of the same variety forms the punch of this one-reel Selig drama in which Robyn Adair and Virginia Kirtley are featured. The story shows how Violet Fitzhugh, at the moment when a mortgage is to be foreclosed on her humble home, discovers by an old document that her father had concealed a small fortune in the fireplace of his home, just before the home was attacked by the Confederates during the Civil War. She searches the fireplace where the treasure is supposed to be hidden, and after an exciting chase of a thief who robs her of the treasure box, which she finds in the chimney, she eventually secures the strong box and upon opening it discovers the treasure consists of Confederate money. Robert Thorne, the president of the banking concern who holds the mortgage, learns of her distress and having already fallen in love with her, forecloses his mortgage on her heart, rather than on her home. The Scrub—DOMINO—JANUARY 7.—Gordon Elliott, a senior at a big university, has been unable to make the football team. Owing to his superior method of passing the ball he is awarded a position at center, although his lightness is against him. This is his last season and it seems as though his chance has come. Elliott overhears the head coach say that Dick Blackwood would make a better center if he could only master the pass. Elliott in his loyalty to the school, teaches Blackwood the pass, thereby eliminating himself, although by so doing he believes he has lost out with Marjorie. The big game is played and won, largely through Blackwood's efforts, and he is the hero. At the banquet where the letters are awarded, Blackwood tells the story of Elliott's sacrifice and he is awarded one of the letters, and also succeeds in capturing the fair lady.

A Midas of the Desert—KAY-BEE—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 8.—Money is the god of Jed Thompson. He goes to the gold fields and opens a supply store. Malaria starts in the mining town and Jed charges the miners five dollars a dozen for quinine capsules. "Old Bill" Knowles is taken ill with malaria and his son, Ray, goes to Jed's store for quinine, asking Jed to charge the medicine to him. Jed refuses and cautions Dora, his daughter, to sell no quinine on credit. The next day Ray returns to the store to make another plea, as his father is worse. Dora is alone and gives him the quinine. Her father becomes unwilling to trust her further and remains to tend the store, forcing Dora to work his claim. As a result of exposure Dora is taken ill and Jed is too stingy to give her quinine. Delirious, she is picked up by Ray, taken to his home and nursed back to health. Her father comes to claim her but she refuses to go with him. The miners give Jed his choice of selling out or being kicked out. Jed chooses the former. He starts out across the desert, finds a little gold in the sand and uses all his water in panning it. After suffering all the tortures of the damned, he dies of thirst on the desert, where everything appears to have changed into gold.

Married by Installment—ROYAL—JANUARY 9.—Mrs. Acre, a widow with ten children, reads the advertisement of a matrimonial agency and answers it, describing herself as "a widow with ten acres." Fritz Snell, a waiter, sends her the photograph of a handsome friend purported to be himself. They meet at the agency—and though he does not come up to the picture, Mrs. Acre accepts him and they are married. She then conducts home the expectant Fritz, who has visions of a fine little property awaiting him. He is introduced, instead, to the ten children, and after washing for them, helping feed them and administering variously to their tenfold little needs, he rebels. Jumping on a passing freight, he makes his getaway, leaving the widow and her ten Acres weeping beside the track.

Love and Business—KOMIC—JANUARY 10.—Fred Gates is an attorney for a patent derrick and windlass concern. One day while demonstrating the windlass the hook catches in the dress of a woman, lifting her several feet from the sidewalk. She is a spinster, president of the Anti-Cigarette League, and she files a claim against Fred's company. Fred and his wife have a misunderstanding. After reaching the office he becomes penitent and writes two letters—one a curt business note to the spinster, advising her that he will settle all claims against him for $500, and the other a tender missive, asking forgiveness, to his wife. The office boy gets the two letters exchanged in the envelopes, and on their arrival both ladies have hysterics. The spinster lady and Fred's wife arrive simultaneously at the office and finally he effects the exchange of the two letters.

An Inside Tip—Thanhouser—January 10.—Whitey's gang of crooks has flourished on waterfront robbery because Tom, the district attorney's secretary, has kept it tipped from the inside. Jack Morrison, police reporter for The Herald, gets next to the gang for the sake of a story later. He is suspected, and Nell, a girl of the underworld, overhears Whitey and his pals plotting to make way with the new member. She decides to "squeal," as Jack has formerly defended her from insult. The police, however, won't believe her story. Meanwhile, the gang has got Jack in its power. Nell again appeals to the authorities. She and the policemen give chase to the gang in a motor boat. They reach the craft containing the crooks just after Jack has been dropped overboard. Nell dives after him while a gun battle is on, and with the aid of one of the policemen she gets him unbound and into the motor boat. After the crooks have been rounded up, Jack's editor, who has been called to the police station, says that he will be responsible for Nell. But Jack relieves his chief of that responsibility.

Restitution—American—(Two Reels)—January 11.—A thrilling and dramatic production in which Ed Coxen and Winnifred Greenwood are featured. Lester Harrison is accused of murdering Carlton Fox, a friend, though the crime was really committed by Elsa Detrow, an actress with whom Fox quarreled. Months later, when Harrison has gone west after breaking jail, he is accused of the crime and about to be arrested as an escaped convict, when the actress who has herself gone west, confesses the deed. See review on page 81, this issue. N. G. C.

The Spirit of Giving—Beauty—January 12.—Peter Stearns, a successful business man is willing to squander his money on his wife, daughter and son, but cannot understand the spirit of giving. He refuses to help the hungry beggar; contribute towards a purse for one of his clerks; subscribe to a Belgian relief fund or do other charitable work. He falls asleep and dreams that he is refused admittance to Heaven until he has done some charitable deed, and upon awaking feels that he has learned a lesson. Joseph Harris and Virginia Kirtley featured. N. G. C.

Probation—Majestic—January 12.—Tom Miller's father, a judge, opposes a popular movement to win probation for first offenders. He reprimands his son, Tom, for lounging about a pool room. Ridiculed as "papa's boy," Tom breaks his promise to the judge and to his sweetheart, Helen Moore, and visits the pool resort in secret. A man is shot and Tom is accused of the crime. Under an alias he hopes to get through his trial and serve his time. But Judge Miller is transferred to the criminal department and Tom is recognized. He pleads probation but the judge sentences his son for five years. At the "pen," Tom overhears a plot against his father. He escapes and follows the crooks to his home, where they attack Mrs. Miller and Helen, who are alone. Tom is accidentally wounded by Mrs. Miller and his father, arriving, takes him for an accomplice of the crooks and orders him to a public hospital pending his return to the pen. Tom and the nurse overhear the confession of the man who committed the murder. The man's confession is accepted and Tom is vindicated.

The Black Ghost Bandit—American—January 13.—A mystery story of the west which concerns the identity of a hold-up man, known as the black ghost bandit. The bandit's daughter finally learns with surprise, after she has assisted her sweetheart, the sheriff, to round up the black ghost bandit, that the hold-up man is her own father. An explanation for his conduct discloses that his wife has long been a paralytic, and he held up the stage coach to secure money for an operation that might lead to her complete recovery. The sheriff offers to pay for the operation himself, if the bandit will return the money, and all ends happily. Jack Richardson and Vivian Rich featured. N. G. C.

In the Land of the Otter—Domino—(Two Reels)—January 14.—Anne, the stepdaughter of the factor of the trading station, is playing with the affections of Joe Eagle, a quarter-breed, and Henri Levesque, a French trapper. Her stepfather, Ben Anderson, insists that she pick out the man she intends to marry. Anne refuses and Ben promises to wed Anne to the trapper bringing back the most valuable catch of furs in the spring. Anne imagines herself in love with Henri. Joe Eagle returns with the biggest catch, but Anne says she will kill herself before she will be disgraced by marrying the French-Indian. Joe overhears and because of his love for her hides the greater part of his furs beneath his cabin floor. Anne and Henri are married. Henri becomes a heavy drinker and does not provide for her. He steals a bale of furs from the factor. Joe is set to catch the thief. Henri begs Joe not to tell on him and offers Joe his wife. Joe appears to accept, but follows Henri to his cabin, where he witnesses a heart-breaking scene between Henri and Ann. Joe tells Henri to go to the factor and tell him he will find many furs in his, Joe's, cabin and to search no more for the thief. Joe leaves for the Southland. Anne implores him to take her with him, but he refuses, promising to return for her when it is better that he should come.

The Terror of the Mountains—Reliance—January 13.—Dan Melton is in love with Daisy, who is infatuated with Soapy Smith, the gambler. The sheriff is worried over the robberies of Black Jack, the terror of the mountains. Daisy meets with a mishap while out riding and applies for assistance at a lonely shack in the mountains. Soapy Smith answers the door and invites her in. Soapy then shows his true character and attempts an insult. Daisy's scream is heard by Morristette, who enters. Soapy, angered at the Mexican's arrival, strikes him. The Mexican rushes to town and informs the sheriff, who goes to the rescue, when he finds that Soapy Smith and the much-wanted desperado are one and the same.

The Clubmen's Wager—American—January 15.—Several clubmen bet that a tramp who happens to pass cannot change a one thousand dollar bill, and his attempts to do so result in a comedy of an uproarious sort. On the same reel is a subject entitled:—

Preparing for the Firing Line—American—January 15.—Which shows the making of steel armor plate and cannon, together with vivid demonstrations of the use of these death dealing machines.

Universal Program

My Lady High and Mighty—Victor—(Two Reels)—January 11.—Lady Mary, daughter of the Earl of Dreadwood, has been reading modern novels, and when Sir Harvey, a rich and splendid man, proposes to her, declares she wants a man who will command her in cave-man fashion. Sir Harvey goes to an island near his estate where he camps out with his dogs, trying to forget his troubles. Meanwhile an old usurer proposes for Lady Mary's hand. The earl, hard pressed for money, gives his consent to the marriage but Mary flees from her father's home to Sir Harvey's island. He determines to play cave-man, so seizes her roughly, forces her to act as his servant. After her hard day's work, he takes her by the hair in true cave-man fashion, throws her in a corner of the cave, and goes to sleep himself in the opposite corner. When the old earl discovers where she is, he comes to murder Sir Harvey, but Lady Mary interposes and displays her mother's wedding ring. The earl consents to an immediate marriage; Sir Harvey frees the Dreadwood estates from debt, and Lady Mary realizes that she has found her lord and master.

The Useless One—BIG "U"—JANUARY 12.—John, a consumptive, and his brother, Tom, are in love with Nell, a clerk, who lives in the same tenement with them. John is at home preparing supper and Tom is waiting at the store for Nell. The floor-walker forces his attentions upon Nell who resents them. The next evening the floor-walker comes into Nell's room and tries to kiss her. Tom and John come to her rescue. Tom grapples with the floor-walker who draws a gun. John, who is outside the door, fires and kills the floor-walker. Tom is convicted of murder. John consults a doctor who tells him that he hasn't long to live. And when Nell tells him that she loves his brother, John tells Tom of the mistake and compels him to change clothes with him and escape. Tom does so. Shortly before the hanging John dies in his cell of a hemorrhage.

A Woman's Debt—GOLD SEAL—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 12.—Thelma Morrison, stenographer to Davenport, a bank president, is engaged to Bob Cameron, but to aid her family who are in want, she agrees to marry Davenport. Five years pass and Thelma has become a social butterfly, and a bridge fiend. She loses heavily to Muriel Hope, giving her an I. O. U. for $3,000. She refuses to leave the game to go to her sick child's bedside. Muriel calls in the evening with her fiance, who turns out to be Bob Cameron. While Muriel asks for her money, Cameron writes Thelma a note indicating that he holds Muriel's I.O.U.'s and can help Thelma if she will go to his office. Meanwhile, the little boy has died and the husband refuses to let the neglectful mother share his sorrow. Failing in an effort to gain money from her husband, Thelma goes to Cameron's office. He offers to return all the I. O. U.'s if she will accept his love. She promises to return the following day, but then declares that she must have the papers first. She determines to secure them and lock him in the vault where they had been placed. Frightened after she has done this, she calls up her husband who brings an expert to open the safe. She now confesses all to her husband and when Cameron is released he offers to return all the I. O. U.'s freely, but Davenport insists upon paying them. Cameron now appears to Thelma in his true colors, so she turns to her husband, realizing that his love only was really worth while.

A Maid by Proxy—NESTOR—JANUARY 12.—Perry Gordon the novelist and Irene Gray meet at an art showing and later Gordon asks her to marry him. She seeks advice from her aunt who is a man-hater and suggests Irene's playing maid to test Gordon's love. Irene does so, but Gordon's affection remains unchanged. After a series of other deceptions and complications, Irene reassumes her own position in life and she and Gordon marry.

Reunited—ECLAIR—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 13.—While visiting his sweetheart, Antoine de Vallence, a French lieutenant, is ordered to war. She places a miniature of him, one of herself and a bundle of old letters in his uniform. Later, hearing of his death she dies, broken-hearted. Two hundred years elapse. A young man named Vallery, who has quarrelled with his wife, goes to see his dying uncle. While being shown over the property he is to inherit, he enters a room the servant says is haunted. Here he finds the miniature of a young officer and of a lady whose spirit appears to him. After the uncle dies, he again goes to the haunted chamber. As the vision appears, he asks, "Who are you?" She bids him read the old love letters. He realizes that the portrait is one of himself as he was in another life. He then hastens to return to his wife who greets him with renewed warmth. He tells her the story of their former existence and separation by death, as shown in the miniatures and old letters.

Pawns of Fate—REX—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 14.—Marston and his daughter Helen start a game of chess while waiting for her fiance to come to take her to a party. After they leave, Marston looks at the chessmen and sees the black knight change into himself, the white queen and her knight into Anita, a Mexican girl, and her sweetheart, his chum Marc Bailey. Bailey has located a good prospect just as Marston receives a zona from the Mexican government, giving him a sixty day mining option on any large tract of land he might desire. Learning of Bailey's prospect, he files on that land, and also steals his sweetheart, Anita. After Bailey discovers his business treachery, Marston offers to pay him, but Bailey, deeming this an added insult, draws his gun. Anita endeavors to prevent a tragedy and is shot. Marston flees. The scene fades back into the library. The black knight has disappeared and the white queen lies prostrate on the chess board. At the window appears the face of Bailey, the failure who has drifted low enough to become a robber. He enters, and throwing away guns, they grapple with bare hands. Meanwhile, Helen at the gay party, leans against a weakened balustrade, and is hurled to her death. Just as Bailey is about to kill Marston, her body is brought home, and Bailey the failure, leaves Marston, the success, realizing that his vengeance is more complete than the man's death could make it.

Those German Bowlers—STERLING—JANUARY 14.—Grousmeyer reads bowling news while his wife visits a neighbor. The neighbor's husband, Schmaltz, visits Grousmeyer, and the fans argue the methods of bowling. A scrap results and the house is wrecked. The belligerents rush to the nearest bowling alleys. Schmaltz shows superiority over his rival. Grousmeyer resolves to get revenge and smears soft soap on the alleys. Schmaltz sees him and a fight ensues in which every one present takes part. Mrs. Grousmeyer returns and finding her house wrecked, starts a fight with Mrs. Schmaltz. The fight carries them to the bowling alleys where they are caught in the general battle.

A Gentleman of Art—IMP—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 15.—Fenno, a young detective in the government service, is told to watch for jewel smugglers. His sweetheart Rose, is a telegraphist, handling messages from incoming and outgoing ships. Young Hough, who poses as an artist, sends his father a wireless message which arouses Rose's suspicions. To get into the house, she goes to Hough and arranges to have her portrait painted. Hough is arrested on suspicion upon his arrival but nothing is found, for he has the diamonds hidden inside his tubes of oil paint. Another message to the Houghs announces the coming of a setting hen. Fenno acts as delivery man, and Rose, hiding inside the house, sees the Houghs break the eggs and remove the jewels. When Fenno and the chief arrive, the room is suddenly plunged into darkness and the Houghs disappear. The smugglers are pursued and caught and Rose employs a unique method to let the others know where she is. When she and Fenno are married, the chief sends them an egg, which contains a diamond ring.

When the Mummy Cried for Help—Nestor—January 15.—The professor believes he has found the elixir of life and buys a mummy from a curio shop to test it. Emissaries from the Pasha discover this mummy to be the long looked for remains of the Royal Rambastus, 2000 B. C. They offer the professor a big sum but he refuses to sell it. His daughter, Victoria, is in love with Eddie, but the professor says there will be no marriage unless the experiments with the elixir are successful. Eddie therefore calls in his chum, Lee, to pose as the mummy. The experiments are highly successful, but when Lee is left alone, the Pasha and his men run off with him, pursued by the professor. Eddie takes the real mummy, stabs it and throws it out of the window. After Lee escapes, the Pasha gets the mummy and Eddie gets the girl.

Father's Strategy — Victor—January 15.—Matthew Porter for years has gratified his only child's, Irene, every whim, until her extravagant taste in dress threatens to ruin him. He discusses, with his wife, a course to pursue. Irene in the meantime has met John Shields, a bachelor, and when she invites him to her home Porter plans to make things so pleasant for Shields that he will marry Irene. Irene and Shields become engaged and Irene plans an elaborate wedding. Again he resorts to strategy and tells Irene that she cannot marry Shields for three years. That night Shields and Irene elope much to the relief of Porter.

The Governor Maker—101 Bison—(Two Reels)—January 16.—Grace Parker and Mary French work in the Acme mills, which are closed down by the deciding vote of Wade, principal stockholder and candidate for governor. Mill hands, desperate, try vainly to induce him to reopen the mills. Jim Sawyer, leader of the workers, when half drunk persuades two others to set the place on fire. Grace and Mary meet them and discover the plan. Grace follows them and sends Mary to notify Wade. Grace threatens Jim with arrest and is seized and bound. A fight ensues; Jim fires the place and leaves the others to their fate. Wade, his nephew Meeks, and the butler arrive with Mary in time to save the mills. Grace obtains work in a bakery, through which she aids Wade to escape when Jim Savage and his followers mob him during a political speech. She holds the mob at bay by hurling bakery products at them. In gratitude, Wade then makes Grace his secretary. She discovers that Meeks, who tries to make advances to her, has abandoned Mary, who has gone to a nearby town. She advises Wade to win the labor vote by reopening the mills. When he is elected she resigns, only to accept his proposal of marriage.

Hubby's Cure—Joker—January 16.—Brown arrives home in a condition that makes his wife resolve to cure him of his bad habits. A school friend, newly married, moves into the next apartment. After a recital of Mrs. Brown's woes, Mrs. Newlywed suggests that they change the furniture in the apartments and scare Brown into a cure. When Brown arrives home that night he finds Mrs. Newlywed in his flat. She beats him for an intruder, and he is put out by Newlywed. He argues with the janitor who professes not to know him, and who in turn runs him out. He is scared again by the policeman and finally goes back to his club. The conspirators change the furniture back again, Mrs. Brown 'phones her husband to come home. He does, cautiously, and finds the policeman and janitor polite, Mrs. Brown affectionate and vows "never again."

An Outlaw's Honor—Powers—January 16.—In a saloon brawl an outlaw kills a man, and he is arrested. At a railroad station close by a girl misses her train and while walking near the tracks is bitten by a rattlesnake. The sheriff and his prisoner see her and help her into a freight car. Realizing that she must have medical aid at once, the sheriff rides for the doctor, leaving the bandit to care for the injured girl. The outlaw obtains whiskey which he gives to the girl as medicine, and she falls into a stupor. The bandit is tempted to escape, but refrains. The girl returns to consciousness and calls for water. He goes for it and the sheriff, returning with the doctor, finds the bandit gone and thinks he has escaped. But the bandit returns with water for the girl and gives himself up to the sheriff.

Romance in Bear Creek—Eclair—January 17.—The Whitmans and Morgans are enemies because the former have dammed up the stream running between the ranches, thus cutting off the irrigation supply from the Morgans. Old man Whitman is killed by the Morgans, to the horror of Lola Morgan who is in love with young Whitman. He vows revenge but is espied waiting by Lola, who goes to warn her father and brother. As she runs she stumbles and falls over the cliff. Whitman hastens to her rescue and carries her home where he meets his enemies, but at her request leaves at once, being unarmed. Later the Morgans discover them in loving embrace. Whitman, again unarmed, is allowed to depart, but Lola is locked in her room. She tries to escape and shoots off the lock of the door. Then she hastens to prevent the murder of her sweetheart. Finding Whitman at home, the Morgans open fire on him. Lola rushes up and threatens to shoot herself unless they cease hostilities, thus love brings about peace.

Caught With the Goods—L-Ko—January 17.—The under sheriff admires the sheriff's wife, who encourages him and starts gossips talking. The sheriff, finding the pair together, threatens to kill the under sheriff. Caught again the under sheriff escapes and hides in a bath house. Procuring a bathing suit he goes in bathing and a bear, escaping from a neighboring menagerie, joins the bathers. Clad only in a bathing suit, the under sheriff is forced to take to the street, pursued by the bear. He seeks protection in the sheriff's house. Climbing in through a window he finds himself in the bedroom of the sheriff's wife. He hides under the bed, but the wife discovers his presence and resents it with her fists, to the delight of the sheriff who forgives his assistant.

A Small Town Girl—Rex—(Three Reels)—January 17.—Pauline's uncle owns the only hotel in the sleepy little town of Maplehurst. The only fault of Dick, the young hotel clerk, in her eyes, is rusticity. A stylish young snob from the East arrives in Maplehurst. She disregards the honest love of Dick to stroll proudly down the village street with the city chap. The snob goes East inviting her to visit him at his home and she runs away from Maplehurst to do so. A year later, he casts Pauline aside. In a big city boarding house her child is born. She is penniless, his people will not recognize her, and the snob himself is sent away to the West where he begins life anew. She is variously advised by her lodgers to make an easy living or to commit suicide, but an elderly childless couple tell her that the greatest thing in the world is to be a mother. She takes heart and writes home. It is Dick, her uncle's clerk, who reads the letter and sends her money. Her uncle dies, and Dick's first act after he takes over the hotel is to go after Pauline. Meanwhile life in the West has made a man of the snob. He is big enough to love his child and to want it, but Pauline rejects his offer of marriage to go back to Maplehurst with the faithful Dick.

with Elsie's sister. She runs away with him. Elsie and her father learn that Duncan is already married and has a child. This news kills the father and Elsie sets out for the city and finds her sister, but she, feeling her disgrace, disappears. Elsie later finds her as she is dying, and plans to avenge the wrong. She becomes an entertainer at a cafe which Duncan frequents. Being masked, Duncan does not recognize her but becomes quite fascinated by her. One night when Duncan calls Elsie tells the story of her wronged sister. Then for the first time she tears off her mask and he recognizes her. She holds him off at the point of a revolver and telephones the police who come and arrest him. Elsie then returns to the ranch and its foreman whom she loves. M. C.

The Exploits of Elaine—(Episode Two)—Pathe—(Two Reels).—After a demonstration which thoroughly acquaints the spectators with the socalled "twilight sleep" and its effect, one sees the "Clutching Hand" visit Elaine Dodge in her boudoir and there apply the drug. He endeavors to secure a paper, which he missed at the time her father was murdered, but Miss Dodge is ignorant of its whereabouts and he fails in his purpose. Foiled, he induces Elaine to write a note to Kennedy, requesting the detective to give up the case, but next day, Kennedy on receiving the note goes to Elaine's home, applys the "twilight sleep" drug to her arm and when she is unconscious she relates to him the happenings of the night before. As the picture ends Craig Kennedy receives another warning threatening his life in case he does not cease his activities. See review on page 85, this issue.

General Special

When Love and Honor Called—Essanay—(Three Reels).—Elizabeth, the ranch owner's daughter, loves a half-breed, and when her father refuses to allow the marriage she plans to elope with him. Broncho Billy plans to capture the cattle rustlers, but falls into their trap and is accused of a murder which the leader of the band committed. He is about to be lynched by a mob when the sheriff, who has learned the truth, clears his name. The events which have taken place prove to Elizabeth that she loves Broncho rather than the half-breed, who was the leader of the outlaws. A review will be found on page 55 of the January 9 issue.

Paramount

Cinderella—Famous Players—(Four Reels).—Mary Pickford appears in the title role of this delightful production based on the fairy tale which has been told and retold in practically every household. The settings and costumes are gorgeous and all the wonderful incidents which served to make this story popular are included. Owen Moore appears as Prince Charming. A review will be found on page 54 of the January 9 issue.

Cameo Kirby—Lasky—(Five Reels).—Cameo Kirby, a gambler by necessity, wins a friend's money in a card game to save him from losing it to another gambler. Cameo intends to return it, but before he can do this the friend, discouraged, commits suicide. Later Cameo falls in love with the dead man's daughter, but the obstacle between them seems unsurmountable. A duel between Cameo and the gambler, which leads to the clearing of the former's name, however, permits all to end happily. A review of the subject will be found on page 86 of this issue.

The Eternal City—Famous Players—(Eight Reels).—Leone, a young officer of the Papal Guards, is sent on a mission by his father, and his young wife, thinking she has been deserted, places her son on the steps of a sister's home and throws herself in the Tiber. Leone returns, learns the fate of his loved ones, and abandoning all worldly possessions enters the monastery. Years pass and Leone has become Pope Pius XI. The abandoned infant, David Leone, has been tenderly raised by the sisters, but later has come under the influence of a London crook. He runs away and finds a home with Dr. Roselli, a political exile in Italy. David is raised as a brother to the doctor's daughter, Roma. Roselli instills in David's heart his own longing for freedom, and the boy hopes some day to liberate his own country. Death in time claims the doctor and Roma becomes the ward of Baron Bonelli, prime minister of Italy, who confiscates the estate of the exiled doctor. David, still longing for freedom, has become a socialist leader. For years David and Roma do not see each other. A number of distinguished guests are assembled in Baron Bonelli's home to witness the gorgeous procession of the Pope's jubilee. The baron has fallen in love with Roma, and it is commonly known that she is his mistress. A short distance from the house, David, now a member of the house of deputies, and known as David Rossi, is encouraging the multitude to revolt. As the Pope's procession nears, David is heard denouncing Baron Bonelli and Donna Roma, whom he claims to have had illicit relations. Roma resents Rossi's insinuations and plans to avenge herself by infatuating him and breaking his heart. He poses for a bust on which she is working on and a passionate love springs up between them. He tells her of his past and she learns that he is David, who was her childhood companion. Her determination to cause his downfall wavers and she falls in love with him. David addresses a great meeting of the people and Bonelli orders the police to charge the meeting, kill Rossi and rid Italy of him forever. Roma learns of the plan and warns David. They are hastily married and David escapes from Italy. Bonelli hears of the marriage and asks Roma whether she confessed her relations to David. He tries to persuade her to annul the marriage, but she refuses. On a promise of immunity from punishment rather than banishment from the country, Bonelli prevails upon Pope Pius XI. to induce Roma to cause the return and identification of Rossi. When David arrives in Italy he is arrested and brought before Bonelli. Roma, angered by the baron's deception and made desperate when David denounces her for betraying him, kills her ward. With a parting curse upon Roma, David escapes. To shield Rossi, Roma accepts the guilt of the crime and is arrested. David wanders aimlessly about and at last comes to the Pope's palace. The chain of circumstances which draw together the Pope and Rossi gradually reveal them to be father and son. Rossi tells his sad story to his father, and, in turn, learns of Roma's great love for him. Eventually the Pope secures Roma's pardon and the lovers are reunited.

The Mystery of the Lost Ships—(Seventh Episode of Zudora)—Thanhouser—(Two Reels).—A manaic-inventor has made a machine which will destroy anything within its scope. He wrecks several ships to prove its worth and after detectives fail to learn how the ships were destroyed, Zudora is called upon. Through the plotting of Hassam Ali she is trapped in a house, upon which the strength of the machine is turned. Just as the building bursts into flames James Baird, a mysterious young man, rushes in and rescues her, escaping before he is recognized. A review will be found on page 53 of the January 9 issue.

The Foiled Elopement—(Eighth Episode of Zudora—Thanhouser—(Two Reels).—Storm and Zudora plan to elope, but Hassam Ali has the girl hypnotized by a Chinaman. Later, when Jim Baird, Hassam Ali's substitute, learns of her danger he goes to the Chinaman's den, where a terrific fight takes place. The police arrive in time to save Jim and he escapes again without being seen. Later, when he is impersonating Zudora's uncle, the fact that he loves her is uncovered, but he dare not tell her, because of the part he is playing. A review will be found on page 53 of the January 9 issue.

Oxyacetylene Flame Used to Save Elaine

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

GOOD as have been the first two episodes of the Pathe serial, "The Exploits of Elaine," the third goes them both one better.

Action of both an exciting and interesting kind, suspense that fairly grips one until the developments that one is expecting have come to pass and application of a new scientific apparatus to the detection of crime, all serve to make up this third episode, which is entitled, "The Vanishing Jewels."

Craig Kennedy, already a favorite with the great reading public which has met him in the pages of the Cosmopolitan Magazine is winning thousands of new friends by his exploits on the screen. In this last installment of the release he becomes a real hero by rescuing Elaine, with whom, it was hinted in episode two, he is falling in love.

Nothing more gripping or attention compelling than the attack of the Clutching Hand upon the Broadway jeweler has been seen on the screen in many moons. The reproduction of the Clutching Hand's note to the jeweler which the jeweler's daughter shows to Elaine, her friend, informs one that the Clutching Hand is threatening to steal all the jewels in the main show case of a certain Broadway jeweler, exactly at noon that day. Accordingly, when Elaine communicates with her friend, Craig Kennedy, and asks his assistance in apprehending the Clutching Hand one is all keyed up for some interesting developments when noon arrives. At 11:45 one sees Kennedy speeding in an automobile to the aid of Elaine and her friends. At 11:50 one sees him arrive at the jewelry store, enter and meet the jeweler and his daughter. At 11:55 one sees the store closed to the public and Kennedy, Elaine, the jeweler, his daughter and a squad of detectives waiting for the appearance of the Clutching Hand. At 11:59 one's hair almost begins to rise as he tensely watches the screen and awaits the stroke of 12:00. A second later the big surprise occurs, when the entire show case, which stands in the foreground of the store, is seen to drop into the basement, there to be hauled over and robbed by the minions of the Clutching Hand.

The three well dressed strangers who have robbed the jeweler so successfully make their escape from the building and are whirled away in a taxicab, but a moment later Craig Kennedy takes up the trail, accompanied by Elaine, and a third auto holds the jeweler and his daughter, together with several of the detectives. Kennedy's car is stopped by another member of the Clutching Hand's band and in a moment when he is off guard the scientific detective is overpowered and left lifeless in the road, while Elaine is carried away by the criminals.

Fearful lest the girl give an alarm, they finally leave her bound and helpless in a huge boiler which stands on the river bank, and then go to report to the Clutching Hand himself.

That master criminal flies into a rage when he learns what has happened to Elaine, and declares that the rising tide will surely drown her in the boiler. He commands his men to rescue her and declares that if she dies through their act he will himself kill them.

Before they reach the scene, however, Kennedy has discovered the whereabouts of Elaine, and though the water is now up to her chin in the boiler, he bids her have hope as he will immediatey set about rescuing her. From a nearby factory where the apparatus is manufactured, Kennedy secures an oxyacetylene tank and quickly brings the flexible tubes out to the top of the boiler in which Elaine is a prisoner, and after marking out a circle on the top of her prison, begins to cut the metal with the oxyacetylene flame.

Within a few moments a large circle in the top of the boiler has been cut out and when this is lifted off one of Kennedy's companions drops through the opening and lifts Elaine to safety just at the time further delay would have resulted in her death.

The photography throughout is clear cut and sharp and certainly the interest already aroused in the serial will serve to bring picture goers to see the next episode.

Lubin Program Changes

Beginning January 21 the Lubin Manufacturing Company will release each week on its regular program a three reel photoplay—the same type and quality of picture that has heretofore been sent out as a special feature. This interesting announcement was made this week by Ira M. Lowry, general manager of the Lubin Company.

Another interesting announcement made by Mr. Lowry is that beginning the 1st of February the company will release each Tuesday and Saturday on the regular program a high class one reel comedy. On one of those days Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe will be featured in one of these comedies and on the other Joseph Kaufman and Ethel Clayton will be starred in a laughable play.

The popularity of the three reeler has been so great that Mr. Lowry determined to release one each week on the regular program. These pictures will be of the same high quality as the special releases and will be shown each week on alternate Wednesdays and Thursdays. A number of these three reelers, written by well known writers and enacted by specially selected companies of Lubin players, have been completed, and others are being made.

The new comedies will undoubtedly attract wide attention and interest. Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe have already completed a number of screamingly funny one reelers and the two Lubin stars have demonstrated that they are just as clever along comedy lines as in more serious parts. Joseph Kaufman, who is also to be featured in a comedy each week, has already achieved a wide reputation as a light comedian and Miss Ethel Clayton, one of the best known of the Lubin stars, has done some of the best work of her career in the comedies with him.

Theo. Wharton in "Elaine" Also

Sparing no pains or expense to insure the artistic excellence of "The Exploits of Elaine," Pathe Freres have prevailed upon Theodore Wharton to set aside his other business interests and co-operate with his brother Leopold in the direction of the picture. Two such high class directors from the same family on the same picture make an unusual combination.

Hobart Bosworth is directing "Nearly a Lady," in which Elsie Janis is a western girl.

Vitagraph's New Serial

By arrangement with Roy S. McCardell, the Vitagraph Company is producing his celebrated and extremely humorous story of "The Jarr Family," which first appeared in the New York Evening World and was read by millions. This story will appear in serial form. Each release has a separate incident and each one is a complete picture and story in itself.

The Jarr family are all natural, everyday members of a family very much like everybody else's family; therefore they are universally appreciated and naturally understood. They do things that most families do with a strong emphasis on the humorous consequences of the many jars which result in numerous funny mix-ups and laughable complications. The Jarrs have their everyday associates and component parts of their everyday life that make up the family world and are necessary in carrying out most family affairs. They are all familiar with us because we have met them all before and are well acquainted with them through the captivating Jarr Family series which Roy S. McCardell has made world-wide famous.

The first of the series will be "The Jarrs Discover Harlem," the second, "Mr. Jarr Meets a Suffragette" and the third, "Jarr Goes to a Freak Ball and Meets a Coterie of Professional Freaks."

The Jarr Family serial will enable the public to enjoy a series of short, single reel, weekly releases. The films will be released in the regular service beginning Monday, March 8. Every Monday thereafter will be a "Jarr Monday."

Selig's Cameraman Writes Home Office

When a letter, bearing the German postmark, was received at the executive offices of the Selig Polyscope Company, in Chicago, Ill., recently, it caused comment because the missive had not been opened by a military censor. It was from E. A. Wallace, cameraman for the "Hearst-Selig Twice-a-Week News Pictorial," who has been at the very forefront of battle taking unusual pictures for the entertainment and instruction of the American public.

Since Wallace was assigned to the dangerous task of a war photographer he has won the friendship and admiration of the German general staff and, through them, the friendship of Kaiser Wilhelm. It was the Kaiser's chief minister's official o. k. that made it possible to send the letter from Germany unopened. In the letter Mr. Wallace tells of a series of unusual and startling motion pictures he has taken on and near the firing lines. The pictures arrived almost simultaneously with the letter and prove Mr. Wallace's assertions to be correct in every detail.

Universal Secures Submarine Pictures

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company has arranged with the Wiliamson Brothers to exploit their present submarine pictures, and is negotiating for control of all new films which they may turn out. As both the Williamson collapsible submarine tube and the submerged photographic chamber are thoroughly protected by patent, this will mean that the Universal will have absolute control of all the submarine motion pictures ever made. Already plans are under way for a new expedition for pictures which it is confidently expected will surpass the astounding uniqueness and thrill of the present film.

Many Changes Add Interest to "Zudora"

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

THRILLS, mystery and new developments keep the interest alive throughout the two reels which form episode nine of "Zudora." Probably the most prominent development of the plot occurs when Hassam Ali meets his death, but almost as important is the introduction of "the woman of mystery," a character which is portrayed by Elizabeth Forbes.

Jim Baird is more in evidence in this episode than he has been heretofore and again James Cruze becomes the reporter-hero, which made him famous in "The Million Dollar Mystery," when he saves Zudora and a little heiress-baby from death. The title of this installment is "Kidnaped" and the plot revolves around the attempt of some conspirators, headed by the mysterious woman, to steal a little girl upon whom a large fortune has been bestowed. When Zudora is put on the case her life is also endangered by the coupling of a caboose, in which she is held prisoner with the little girl, onto a powder car, which has been set on fire by the plotters. The rescue by Jim follows and a moment after the caboose has been released from the train the car blows up, this incident supplying a real "punch" to the film.

Another spectacular incident is the burning of the home of Hassam Ali. The servant, who has been prominent in the picture since the first episode, becomes curious to know what the revolving fans in the mysterious room are. When he investigates he finds that he cannot stop them, once they are started. In his excitement he upsets the stand upon which they are arranged and the house takes fire. About the same time Jim Baird has confronted Hassam Ali and asked for the truth concerning Zudora, Mr. Cruze playing opposite himself at this point by means of double exposure. The girl's uncle sinks back apparently dead after this interview and when the fire breaks out all flee from the house, leaving his body within it.

A trailer, which follows the last scene, announces that starting with the next episode the serial will be under the direction of Howell Hansel, the man who had charge of "The Million Dollar Mystery," and that Sidney Bracy and Frank Farrington, both of whom were very popular in the previous serial, will be added to the cast. The title, after this episode, will be "Zudora in the Twenty Million Dollar Mystery."

Zudora returns the visit of "the woman of mystery"

tices the change in Jim and tells him that he must have found some new interest in life, a fact which the young reporter admits. Zudora, about the same time, meets Madame Duval, "the woman of mystery." She is charmed by her personality, though she knows nothing of her past. Madame Duval and her conspirators plan the abduction of the little girl, upon whom a fortune has been bestowed, and a short time later the child is kidnaped. Zudora learns of the case and hurries to work upon it. She writes John Storm that she has found a clue which directs her to a box car on a deserted siding and then leaves for that place.

Jim Baird, in the meantime, learns of the abduction. He goes to Madame Duval's apartment after confronting Hassam Ali and asking for the truth about Zudora. The mystic's apparent death and the burning of the house also take place at this time. The conspirators find Zudora as she is about to rescue the child and make her a prisoner in the caboose. They then hurry to Madame Duval for instructions, arriving there just as Jim does. From his hiding place he learns what their plans are. Storm, fearing for the safety of his sweetheart, also hurries toward the siding in his automobile.

The conspirators return to the place and, acting under instructions, place an infernal machine in a powder car which is near the caboose. Jim follows them. The powder car is coupled onto the caboose and the train starts away. By a thrilling jump, Jim manages to get aboard and detaches the car in which the girl detective and the little heiress are riding just as the powder car blows up. Storm is attacked by the conspirators, but, after a struggle which is very realistic, manages to reach Zudora's side. As he clasps her in his arms Jim turns away and again leaves before they can ascertain from whence he came or who he is.

Pictures Building a Church

By W. F. Kerr

Out of the proceeds of a motion picture show are being obtained a considerable part of the funds necessary to the completion of a $20,000 church edifice being erected in Bowie, Texas, by the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. The show is being operated by a Sunday school class called The

New M. E. Church, Bowie, Texas.

Alerts and under immediate supervision of a few young men of the class. It has become so popular, because of the novel purpose behind it and the character of pictures exhibited, that the town has been rid to some extent of the church "isms" and creed discussions so characteristic of towns of this size in this part of the country. Everybody attends the Alerts' picture show.

This scheme probably is the most novel of several interesting schemes adopted by members of the congregation for erecting a modern church. The trustees at the outset considered plans whereby the church should be completed without a dollar of indebtedness. This meant that within four or five months $20,000, or its equivalent in material or labor, must be contributed by the members and friends of the church.

There are twelve classes in the Sunday school and toward the end of the year a financial accounting showed that the leader among them had made $250, and the smallest amount reported by any class was $100.

President Fred Paire of the Alerts proposed that his class go into the motion picture show business, but not until after he had sought to arrange with the proprietor of such a show for a percentage of the proceeds in return for advertising the class agreed to give the institution. The proprietor did not take to the idea and Paire announced that the class then would enter business in competition with him. The class rented a building near the heart of the business center of the town, provided it with an improvised stage and curtain and borrowed chairs. Their first difficulty was in arranging for a character of pictures that would not be inimical to the cause of the church and yet worldly enough to attract attention of the entire show-going public. Their second difficulty was the opposition of the established show proprietor, which extended as an influence against them to the offices of some of the leading film concerns.

At length, however, they succeeded in arranging for a series of pictures and they invested in the necessary paraphernalia and set the show to going. They began patronizing the local newspapers and really started a new era in Bowie in the advertising world. Their ads were cleverly prepared and attractively displayed. So effective were they that the show had a good patronage from the start and from people not members of the Methodist church as well as from members.

So popular did the Alert show become that clubs and other organizations, anxious to assist in the good cause, set aside evenings for motion picture parties. On one of these evenings the class netted $35, which was a considerable amount in a town of 3,500 people and with competition to boot.

When the church is completed next month the Rev. W. L. Tittle, its pastor, will have the satisfaction of knowing that his people have accomplished what seldom is accomplished in a town of the population of Bowie in the State of Texas, that of having his people worship for the first time in a handsome brick church of modern architecture, built at a cost of $20,000 and not a dollar of indebtedness against it.

Two Cosmofotofilm Offerings

The Cosmofotofilm Company of New York City is announcing for release two splendid special features, entitled "The Black Spot," and "The Victoria Cross," these productions being from the best foreign makers, and of particular interest to the exhibitor at this time.

The next issue of Motography will contain a full review of each of these subjects, and we feel sure the exhibitor will find them worth-while bookings. The reviews should have appeared in this issue, but delay in the mail prevented their reaching Chicago in time to be placed in this issue of this publication.

New Alliance Exchange

The latest addition to the growing list of Alliance exchanges is located at Cincinnati. The office is situated at 224½ Fourth street, in the center of the city, and is convenient to both local and suburban exhibitors. It will be under the general direction of A. A. Weilland, and will be one of the finest equipped exchanges in that section of the country.

George Cooper of the Vitagraph stock company made his first air flight recently and is so enthusiastic over it that he is thinking seriously of becoming a professional aviator.

Millionaire's Estate Used in American Film

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

DIRECTORS of the American Film Manufacturing Company have been extremely fortunate in being able to secure the wonderful estates of various Californian millionaires for use as backgrounds for their pictures and in the two reel picture entitled, "Refining Fires," which is to be released January 18, this possibility of making use of wealthy homes as backgrounds for a motion picture is taken full advantage of.

Seldom, indeed, does one obtain prettier views than those shown in this feature, particularly in that portion of the story laid in the home of Judge Stone. The tinting and photography is fully up to the standard set by the American years ago, and such players as Harry Von Meter, Jack Richardson, Vivian Rich and Charlotte Burton are seen to splendid advantage in such surroundings.

As the story runs, John Alstrom, who is expecting to fall into a small fortune at the death of his uncle, falls in love with Mary, a pretty girl somewhat beneath him in station, and he persuades her to live with him until his uncle dies, when they will marry. Some months later Mary discovers that John's attitude toward her has changed. When she asks him if he is tired of his bargain and he hesitates in answering, she packs her grip and leaves him forever, determined to make her way alone.

Judge Stone anl his daughter, Nina.

Mary is unable to find employment readily and one day, tired and ill, she rests in front of Judge Stone's beautiful home. There she is found by Nina Stone, the judge's daughter and employed as a companion. Mary insists, however, on telling Judge Stone that she has not always been a "good girl," but that she intends to be faithful in every way to her new employer. With this understanding the judge permits Mary to become a companion to his daughter.

Years later, Nina, who is besieged by many admirers but who prefers to stay at home with her old father, meets John Alstrom, who has now come into his fortune, and is attracted by the refined, handsome and rich man.

After being his companion at many social functions, the two declare their love for each other and John secures Judge Stone's consent to the marriage. Mary, meanwhile, has watched their growing affection with horror, as she, of course, recognizes John as the man who was the cause of her downfall. At last she determines to keep her secret no longer, but to tell Nina in detail of her past relations with John.

One night, as she enters the parlor to act upon this determination, she arrives just in time to hear

Nina is John's companion at many social functions.

John is welcomed at Judge Stone's home.

John declaring to Nina, "I am sometimes sad to remember my past sins and vileness and my unworthiness of your love. But, with God's help, I am and will remain a reformed man." Mary, after hearing this, decides to keep her secret and, leaving a note for Nina, she departs and is later discovered in a convent, whither she has gone to devote her future life to service for the church. The cast is as follows:

John Alstrom.....Harry Von Meter
Judge Stone.....Jack Richardson
Mary, girl of sorrow.....Vivian Rich
Nina, Judge's daughter.....Charlotte Burton
Sister Superior.....Louise Lester
Florence, the other girl.....Josephine Ditt

Lasky Secures Edith Wynne Mathison

The Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, through Samuel Goldfish, has announced that it has concluded a contract with Miss Edith Wynne Mathison, the distinguished English dramatic artist, by the terms of which she will make her debut as a photodramatic star in the Lasky-Belasco picturization of "The Governor's Lady." Miss Mathison's career on the stage is so widely known that it needs little comment. She is equally distinguished in England and in this country, and enjoys not only the admiration of the public, but also the respect of critics throughout the world. Miss Mathison first came to America under the management of Ben Greet, playing the title role in "Everyman," an ancient English morality play, in which she achieved an overwhelming success. More recently she has been seen in "The Spy," under the management of Charles Frohman, and at the Fine Arts Theater, Chicago. Miss Mathison states that she is especially gratified that she should make her screen debut in a Belasco play of current American life. She considers that the title role is especially suited to her and says that she looks forward with great interest not only to the work of posing for the production, but also to the possibility of seeing herself on the screen exactly as she will be seen by others.

Edith Wynne Mathison.

Submarine Film Breaking Records

At the close of the second week of its run at the Fine Arts theater of the Williamson Submarine Pictures, Saturday, January 9, the figures showed that 53,951 persons had witnessed the pictures. This breaks all picture records for Chicago, and also the record for the Fine Arts theater.

Ten performances were given New Year's Day and nine of these were to actual capacity, while the tenth brought the day's total of patrons up to 5,350. The day following New Year's saw 500 more persons than on the previous day visit these novel and interesting pictures.

Lubinites Off for the South

George W. Terwilliger, the well known writer and director of the Lubin Company, left this week with a specially selected company of Lubin players for an extended tour through the South and Cuba. They will be gone several months. This is the second Lubin Company that has left Philadelphia since the New Year to travel afar and make photoplays.

Mr. Terwilliger will devote his energies to the making of a number of feature productions that he wrote himself. The company will spend several weeks in St. Augustine, Florida, and will then tour the east and west coasts of Florida. Later, the Lubinites will go to Cuba, where arrangements have been made to film a number of thrilling and novel photoplays.

Mr. Terwilliger's company includes Miss Ormi Hawley, Earl Metcalfe, Kempton Greene, Herbert Fortier, Peter Volkman, Torleiv Corneliussen, William Cooper, Miss Mae De Mertz, Miss Hazel Hubbard and Mrs. Frances Fortier.

Charles Dupuis Now a Pathe Director

Charles Dupuis, who for years has been connected with the French house of Pathe and has been Charles Pathe's right hand confidential man, has been appointed a director on the board of both the Pathe American Corporation of Pathe Freres in Jersey City, N. J., and also the Pathe Exchange, Inc.

Mr. Dupuis' entire business experience has been spent with the house of Pathe with the exception of a few years during which he was engaged in exploiting certain inventions of his own in connection with the motion picture business. Mr. Dupuis was sent by Mr. Pathe to this country to assume charge of the technical end of the business which was formerly directed by Mr. Roussel. Mr. Dupuis' long and successful experience as a technician is a guarantee that the well known Pathe standard of excellence will be maintained and even improved under his direction.

Election of Universal's Officers

The annual stockholders' meeting of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company was held on Thursday, December 31. The following directors were elected: Carl Laemmle, R. H. Cochrane, P. A. Powers, J. A. McKinney and John B. Stanchfield. The new directors immediately met and elected the following officers for the ensuing year: Carl Laemmle, president; R. H. Cochrane, vice-president; P. A. Powers, treasurer; G. E. Kann, assistant secretary; Joe Brandt, manager of the home office. Complete harmony prevailed in both meetings. All litigation which has been hampering the company's affairs was disposed of and all indications pointed to the greatest year the Universal's big organization ever has enjoyed.

Useful Gifts From Lloyd Inc.

Films Lloyd Inc. remembered its trade and friends this year with a solid silver pencil, a gift which is both ornamental and useful. Two of the gifts arrived at the office of Motography this week, Ed. J. Mock and Allen L. Haase being the ones whose initials were engraved upon them. The gifts recall the gold plated knives which were sent out as remembrances last year by Charles (Feature) Abrams and Joseph E. Miles, the men who are now at the helm of Films Lloyd, Inc.

National Board Fighting Legal Censorship

MAY REPEAL OHIO LAW

THE National Board of Censorship has thrown down the gauntlet, donned its armor and is now engaged in a fight to abolish legalized censorship wherever found. Its fight is being made by appealing direct to business men, members of legislatures, city councils and tax payers in general and already it is receiving the strongest sort of support from the various bodies to which it has appealed.

In a pamphlet now being mailed out by the hundreds of thousands the national board gives a few facts about the censorship of pictures in the state of Ohio. Briefly its summary of the Ohio board's activities reads as follows:

The State Board of Censors works under the Industrial Commission of the State. The Act under which it was authorized was approved on May 13, 1913. See 103, Ohio Laws, 399 to 401.

The Act provides that the Industrial Commission shall appoint, with the approval of the Governor, three persons, one for one year, one for two years and one for three years, who shall constitute such board. Section 4 of the Act states that "Only such films as are, in the judgment and discretion of the Board of Censors, of a moral, educational or amusing and harmless character, shall be passed and approved by such board."

The United States census for 1910 fixes the population for Ohio at 4,767,121. This population is highly diversified in both city and country.

The three censors composing the State Board give part time to their work. They are each paid a salary of $1,500. There are two men and one woman.

The average number of films censored during the past year, including those already in circulation, appears to be 1,500 for a month. This means that an average of seven 1,000 foot films was viewed per hour during each eight hour day.

The charge for censoring all films is one dollar per reel of film which does not exceed one thousand feet. For any reel exceeding one thousand feet, the sum of two dollars shall be charged. There is also a charge for the serial film bearing the seal of passage.

The income of the Board of Censors from September 1, 1913, to August 31, 1914, was $21,755. The expenditures amounted to $13,957.05. The balance was $7,797.95.

This Act was drawn and put in operation with no proper appreciation by the public or the motion picture interests of its effects, both general and particular.

It is proposed to repeal the present bill and offer a substitute plan for the regulation of motion pictures by unpaid commissions appointed by the mayors of the cities of Ohio. These commissions will work with entire independence but in co-operation with the National Board of Censorship of Motion Pictures located in New York and passing judgment upon films for the entire country.

In advancing arguments for the repeal of the law "providing for a board of censors of motion picture films" in Ohio, the National Board says in its pamphlet:

The State of Ohio, with approximately 5,500,000 persons of different nationalities, is too large a unit for fair and effective regulation of motion pictures. The cities of the State have well-established ethical standards which are in part peculiar to themselves. Experience has proven the unit for the regulation of motion pictures should be the city rather than the state. This is in accordance with the well-recognized principle of home rule.

The amount of film condemned by the State Board of Censors is very small, less than 1/5 of 1 per cent. The entire output in the State of Ohio is held under suspicion by these officials until a decision has been reached. The effect of such criticism on the minds of the people is to regard the whole product of the motion picture industry, which is the fifth largest in the United States, as bad, until it is adjudged to be good. The small results do not justify the maintenance of the board.

The Act establishing the Board of Censors in Ohio gives power to three persons to pass on the morals of this form of amusement for 5,500,000. The board has announced no definite standards under which it works. There is no guarantee that personal whims and judgments do not govern decisions. It is impossible for such a small number to pass finally upon the wholesomeness of so great an industry. There is, moreover, the continual danger that any small board is open to sinister influences and governed somewhat by favoritism.

For the protection of the morals of the state in the last analysis, public opinion should decide. This is best accomplished through unpaid representatives who are able to diagnose and enforce the judgments of the people. Questions of practical ethics, such as those involved in motion pictures, are not settled finally and satisfactorily by the political unit. The enforcement of moral standards should be placed squarely on the shoulders of public-minded citizens.

During the past year, the Board of Censors has collected from the people of the State, through the exchanges and motion picture exhibitors, $21,755. The tax of one dollar for every thousand feet of motion picture film reviewed has been a burden upon these business men which they should not have to bear; especially when it is understood that the vast majority of pictures are passed without criticism.

The fundamental interest of all parties concerned is the protection of the morals of Society. The work which has been done by the Ohio Board of Censors is unnecessarily expensive. It can be done better by the unpaid commissions in the cities. The National Board now performs the work of criticism. When it is supplemented by such city commissions, the combination is entirely effective.

The system of circulation of films is such that the smaller cities and towns are protected under the substitute City Plan as effectively as they are under the State Board of Censors. Freedom, moreover, is allowed to the citizens of the State to decide what they shall or shall not see.

All over the country, children and young people under 18 find the picture show attractive. Investigations which have been conducted in Providence, Rhode Island; South Bend, Indiana; San Francisco and Cleveland, reveal the fact that youngsters want action, thrill, excitement, emotion and fun as well as education. The National Board takes into consideration the numbers of young people attending theaters and their desires in the criticism of motion pictures. It is quick to note ideas and incidents harmful to adolescent young people. The Censoring Committee of the National Board contains many settlement and church workers, mothers and representatives of children's societies. These persons, cooperating with the skilled commissions, selected in the cities of the country because of their interest in youth, effectually safeguard the morals of boys and girls.

In justice to the manufacturers and exhibitors, it must be stated that the plan of criticism under the Ohio State Board of Censors is a source of constant irritation. It is difficult to know in advance what action will be taken. It is impossible to keep to schedule releases. This results in disorganization and dissatisfaction, both on the part of the exhibitor and the public.

And finally the National Board offers the following city plan for the regulation of motion pictures:

The City Plan, offered by the National Board of Censorship, involves co-operation between the cities of the country and that body. It links the skilled volunteer opinions of the members of the National Board with those of the representatives of public opinion, also working voluntarily in each city. The plan presupposes the definite and general demand in the city for the regulation of pictures. It recognizes the independence of city commissions to decide on moral questions. Such democratic combination of the National Board and the city commission results in complete efficiency and solves the problem as no Federal or State censorship can.

An efficient number for a motion picture commission is 5 or 7. They are selected by the Mayor from diversified groups representing public opinion and from those interested in people. It is important that they should be judicial in temperament and possess maturity of judgment. The function of the commission is to discover and voice public opinion on the character of motion pictures to be exhibited in the city. It represents the city executive. The members concentrate their attention primarily on fugitive and uncensored films which theater owners ar lessees desire to circulate. They also inspect films in which there are cuts or eliminations made by the National Board. The members of the commission review, also with power to reject, those films about which they have received written complaints by citizens. The commission allows properly censored pictures to be publicly shown with a minimum of delay and friction. In considering controversial subjects like those dealing with the White Slave Traffic and the use of drugs, labor conditions and religious themes, they are advised to seek the counsel of skilled citizens before condemnation or approval. They have independence, at the same time they co-operate.

The City Plan involves the submission to the commission of a list of pictures it is proposed to show before the date of the first exhibition. A reasonable amount of time is necessary so that any necessary action can be taken by the commission. It is also understood that proper arrangements shall be made for the review of pictures without charge to the city.

The Bulletin of the National Board, issued every Saturday and containing the complete action taken by that body on films for the current week, is sent to the representatives of the city commission. The complete list for the year will include 95 per cent of all the motion picture films in circulation throughout the country. The National Board agrees to furnish these and other advices freely to the City Commissions.

The Standards of Judgment, which have been the outgrowth of years of experience, with thousands of film subjects, have been printed by the National Board and will be furnished as a guide. The pamphlet is authoritative and aims to define a minimum of morals below which the manufacturers and exhibtors of pictures shall not go. These standards define public opinion on definite ideas and scenes shown in motion pictures. It is understood that no pictures, which are obscene, indecent, improper, licentious, immoral or sacrilegious, shall be shown. It is to be noted that no official body has jurisdiction over other pictures, which, though commonplace, thrilling or sensational do not overstep these lines indicated by law.

This city plan is not theoretical. It has been working satisfactorily in a number of the cities of the country, among which are New York City, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Omaha, Portland, Oregon, Pasadena, Los Angeles, Jackson, Mississippi, Dallas and Joplin, Missouri. In Boston, the authorities have gone one step further. They permit no pictures to be shown which have not passed the National Board.

Under the plan, by authority of the mayors, pictures have been suppressed in the above mentioned cities.

A model ordinance for the regulation of pictures, embodying tested details, has been printed by the National Board of Censorship for use in the larger cities. Copies may be obtained upon application at 70 Fifth avenue, New York City.

Favorite Players Film in Cuba

The Favorite Players Film Company has arranged with Ludwig Diller of the Atlas Film Trading Company to take Favorite Players films to Cuba and other South American countries. Mr. Diller left for Havana, Cuba on Wednesday, January 6, taking with him the four part photoplay, "The Key to Yesterday," from the book by Charles Nevil Buck, featuring Carlyle Blackwell.

Mr. Diller is thoroughly familiar with film conditions in Latin-American countries, having devoted much time to that particular trade. He said when seen at the office of the Favorite Players, "When you realize that these pepole are paying 20 cents gold for inferior shows, you must admit that there is an excellent market for high grade American film right at our door step. I am convinced that superior features such as 'The Key to Yesterday' must prove highly profitable and I am already laying my plans to take 'The Man Who Could Not Lose' and 'The Last Chapter' to Cuba, Porto Rico, and South American countries.

Lubin Engages Gladys Hanson

Miss Gladys Hanson, widely known as a Broadway star and one of the most versatile leading women on the stage to-day, has joined the Lubin players and will be featured in Henry Arthur Jones' "The Evangelist," which the Lubin Company is now making. The play was arranged for the camera by Clay M. Greene and is being directed by Barry O'Neil. Miss Hanson will play the role of "Christabel."

Miss Hanson's career on the stage has been a most interesting one. Following her social debut in Atlanta, Georgia, Miss Hanson returned to New York and was given an important part in "The Spoilers," under the direction of Daniel Frohman. Her next engagement was with E. H. Sothern. Florence Reed was his leading woman and Miss Hanson played a heavy part. Shortly after joining the Sothern Company Miss Reed was taken ill and Miss Hanson was made the leading woman. For two years Miss Hanson was with Kyrle Bellew as his leading woman playing in "The Builder of Bridges," "The Scandal," and the revival of "Raffles." She also played with Mrs. Fiske in "The Modern Marriage." Following this she played the leading female roles, under David Belasco, in "The Woman" and "The Governor's Lady." After a season with the All Star Stock Company in California Miss Hanson played opposite Henry Miller in "The Dragon's Claw."

Miss Hanson is a woman of charming tastes and refinement and is an artist in every sense of the word. She is enthusiastic over the role she is to play in "The Evangelist" and the results she obtains in her work before the camera will be looked forward to eagerly by her many admirers.

Got Any Hydrokinone?

MOTOGRAPHY is in receipt of the letter reproduced below from W. Heuermann, importer of photographic papers and gelatine, of 97 Liberty street, New York City. His letter reads as follows:

New York City, Jan. 7, 1915.

EDITOR MOTOGRAPHY:

You doubtless will be interested in an item of news for your publication. As stated below, and which we are in a position to verify to your entire satisfaction, the facts are as follows:

We received information from Germany dated December 4, that the German government has placed an embargo on all shipment of hydrokinone from that country.

"The Ambition of the Baron"

REVIEWED BY NEIL G. CAWARD

LOVE, intrigue, war and sword play run riot in Essanay's two reel release for January 29, entitled "The Ambition of the Baron," which was adapted from a story in the Smart Set Magazine. The scenes are laid in London and an European principality, and the elaborate stage settings and costuming are of a regal nature. The leading roles are in the hands of such players as Francis X. Bushman, Beverly Bayne, Thomas Commerford and Lester Cuneo, and the story is so constructed as to grip and hold one's attention from start to finish.

One learns at the start of the film that Baron von Tollen, a master hand at politics and intrigue, is seeking to control Leutala, a small continental country. After weeks of planning, the baron decides to make Count Jean de Lugnan the king of Leutala and in order to interest him in the plan has his beautiful daughter, Annetta, flee past the count one night in a cab. As she passes she looks out of the window and drops a note reading, "Follow and save me."

Scene from "The Ambition of a Baron."

The count, always ready to assist beauty in distress, promptly secures another cab and sets out to follow the mysterious beauty who has appealed to him. After a long chase, the count arrives at a country estate some distance outside London and, after scaling the wall and making his way through some dense shrubbery, he finds and rescues the girl, climbs back over the wall and escorts her home.

Count de Lugnan calls at Baron von Tollen's.

Baron von Tollen pretends to be overjoyed at the return of his daughter and invites Count de Lugnan to dinner. As foreseen by the baron, the count promptly falls in love with the beautiful Annetta and eventually asks her father for her hand. The baron then discloses his plan and consents to the marriage on condition that the count enter the plot to start a revolution in Leutala and become the king of the country.

After some time the count consents and they all journey to Leutala, where Captain Tanner, a former military man, has preceded them to start the revolution. Captain Tanner is much amazed upon the arrival of the party to learn that Annetta is engaged to Count de Lugnan, as he himself loves the girl and had expected to win her hand in marriage as a reward for his services in starting the revolution.

He threatens to expose the entire plot unless the count gives up Annetta, and the count promptly draws his sword and the two fight a fierce battle in a darkened room. Tanner is worsted and escapes. The captain rushes at once to inform the authorities of the revolution and after being arrested is executed as a plotter.

The baron's party has, in the meanwhile, been informed of what has occurred and flees aboard the baron's private yacht. Once aboard the boat and out of the harbor, Annetta confesses her part in the plot to Count de Lugnan, but tells him that she really has fallen in love with him. He readily forgives her and, though the baron's ambition to control the country of Leutala through Count de Lugnan is blasted, he is reconciled by the fact that the count and his daughter are really in love.

The Captain draws his sword against Count de Lugnan.

Fundamental Principles

THE PHOTOGRAPHIC NEGATIVE.

WE have seen how the "moving" pictures on the screen are simply the much enlarged "projections" of thousands of tiny images on the film which runs through the projecting machine. We will now examine the film itself and then go to the factory and see how it is made. There are two kinds, "positive" and "negative," and it is the positive films which are run through the projectors in the theaters, a piece of such positive film being shown in Figure 6, enlarged to nearly twice actual size, the standard width being 1⅜ inches, and the usual length of a reel 1,000 feet, having 16,000 separate and complete images, or positive photographs.

The body of the film is composed of celluloid, which is almost perfectly transparent, and is prepared for the film manufacturer by coating its surface with what is known as a "sensitive emulsion." This simply means that there are chemicals in the coating which turn black wherever the light strikes, but remain unchanged where the light does not strike. Now suppose we should put such a chemically coated film in a camera, and point the lens toward any object having light and dark parts. The lens would bring all parts to a focus on the film, and if we looked in the camera we should see a small reproduction of the object, projected by its own light upon the film.

But since light turns the chemicals dark, we should find upon "developing" the film that wherever the object was light the image on the film is dark, while the shadows are represented in the image as clear or transparent. Now if such an image were projected upon a screen, the enlarged picture would look very strange, as the sky would be black, and black clothes would be white, and the shadows of each object would be brighter than the "high-lights."

POSITIVES FROM NEGATIVES.

Such a film is illustrated in Figure 5, and is known in photography as a "negative," the reason for its name being, of course, that its light values are reversed, or, exactly opposite to those of the object which was photographed. How then do we get a film which is suitable to use in the projecting machine? Nothing could be simpler. Just put another piece of sensitive film face to face with the one that has the developed images upon it, and let some plain, even light shine through the images onto the sensitive chemicals in the "emulsion," and the white shadows become dark, and the black high-lights come back into their own. This is exactly how the positive film shown

Fig. 10. Negative of "normally exposed" outdoor scene. Note that all bright objects (sky, water, shirt-fronts, collars and dresses) are black. Faces and arms are nearly black, while black suits are white and dark trees and shrubbery nearly so. Exposure approximately according to Fig. 8.

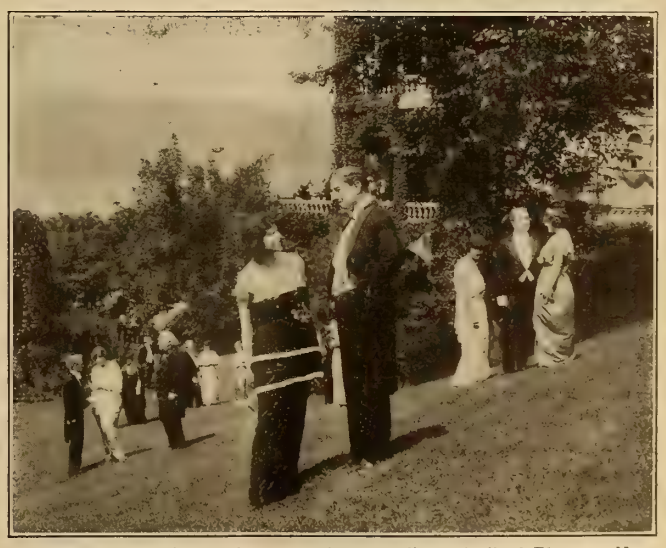

Fig. 11. Positive print, made from the "negative" of Fig. 10. Note that the degrees of light and shadow are exactly opposite to those of the negative. If you fold the page so that the positive and negative come face to face and look through, toward a strong light, you will see nothing but black.

by projection in all picture theaters is made every day.

In the film factories this is known as printing, and the printing machines comprise the principal part of the equipment, for while only one negative is usually required for each subject or production, often from 50 to 100 "prints" are made. These printing machines, or "printers," are of two varieties, known as "step-printers," which work intermittently, stopping the films for each picture, and "continuous printers" through which the two films (positive sensitive film-stock face to face with finished negative), run continuously.

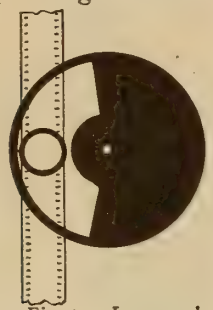

Fig 7 — Lens and shutter as set for interiors and faint light —both nearly "wide open" — Lens F/4 Time 1/36 second.

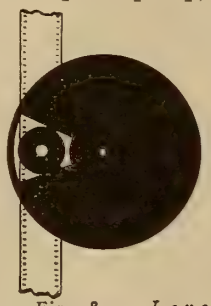

Fig 8 — Lens "stopped down" to F/16 and shutter adjusted to expose 1/180 second for each picture.

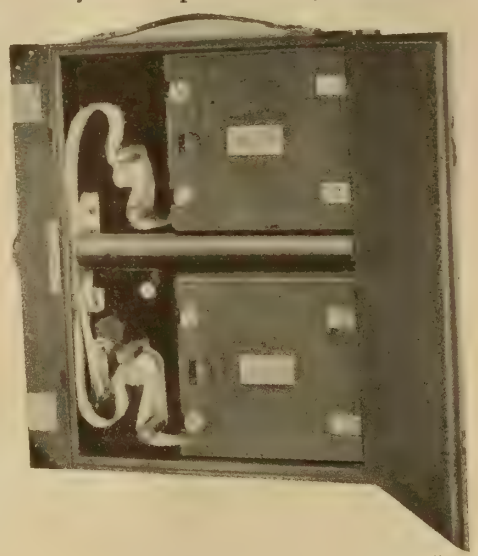

Fig. 9. Typical motion picture camera with "inside magazines" and "two sprocket feed."

A photographic negative is one of the most wonderful things in the world, and just as much so to the scientist as to the layman or the amateur. Some things about it are well understood but there is enough mystery left to baffle the greatest chemists and physicists, some of whom have spent most of their lives investigating the strange action of light as it strikes the plate or film.

DIAPHRAGMS AND SHUTTERS.

To the layman the most startling character of the negative film-stock is its extreme sensitiveness. For instance, who would believe it possible that enough light, coming from an ordinary street scene or landscape, could get through a hole 1/16 of an inch in diameter, in 1/200 part of a second, to make an impression on anything, much less make a picture full of the finest detail, so that it could be projected in practically life size proportions? And yet negatives often are taken with a 2-inch focus lens with an aperture of F/32, which means that the adjustable opening in the "iris diaphragm" between the two combinations of the lens was set to a size equal to the focus divided by 32. In other words 2 inches divided by 32 equals 1/16 of an inch.

The time of exposure is determined by adjusting the opening in the "shutter," which is a black disc which turns around between the lens and the film. The opening in it is just like a piece cut out of a pie. When the light is poor, as in the studio or on dark days, they cut out about half of it, and since it turns around sixteen times per second (or once for each exposure) the lens would be "open" about one-half of 1/16 of a second as in Fig. 7. Now when the light is very bright the shutter would be adjusted somewhat as shown in Figure 8, so that the light coming through the lens would reach the film during only 1/12 part of 1/16 of a second, or 1/192 of a second.

This leads us to another character of the sensitive emulsion, and that is its great range of adaptability to different times of exposure. The same subject can be photographed successfully by exposures ranging from 1/36 to 1/150 of a second, provided the photographer is sufficiently skillful in developing the negative. This means that if the light striking the emulsion had been twice as strong, as for a so-called "normal" exposure, or only one-half as strong, still it would be possible to make a picture, although it is always best to "time" the exposure correctly.

DEVELOPMENT.

The most wonderful thing about a negative is its "development," or rather the qualities which make development possible. When the picture has been "taken" and the exposed film is sent to the developing room, if you should chance to get a look at it (using a red light for the purpose as that is the only color which does not affect ordinary emulsions), you would expect to see something resembling a picture. Not a trace would you see, however, and what is more you could not see anything even with a miscroscope or any other instrument known to science. There must be something there, however, for in a few minutes after immersing the film in the "developer" the pictures will be revealed in all their beauty of detail. Where then does the picture come from? First let us consider the chemicals in the emulsion.

One of the important ingredients is bromide of silver, which, together with other substances, is intimately mixed or "emulsified" with a thick solution of photographic gelatin, or refined fish glue. Silver compounds are peculiarly sensitive to light, particularly the bromide, which is composed of bromine and silver. When light strikes it, there is a chemical change, and the silver tends to separate from the bromine. Now bromide of silver is almost colorless, while silver, as formed from it by light, is black and very finely divided.

EVOLUTION OF PHOTOGRAPHY.

However, it takes a lot of light to separate the silver and during the early days of photography our grandparents had to sit for an hour or two to have a real good "daguerrotype" made. This was because we had not yet learned that certain chemicals could be made to help the light in its action on the silver compounds. After the daguerrotype came the "wet-plate," which turned hours to minutes, and then the "dry-plate," which turned minutes to seconds. Finally the dry plate was perfected about the time celluloid was ready to take the place of glass as a support for emulsion, and the emulsion itself has been so refined that its sensitiveness makes a whole second spent on one picture seem like a waste of time.

It was a long story of patient research, and the motion picture is the reward. Now to return to the chemicals which help the light in its action on the emulsion. So far as the eye can tell, and even so far as the most delicate chemical tests are concerned, the light makes no change in the emulsion, and yet it must have done something at least to prepare for the action of the chemicals of the developer. The most we can say is that the light starts something that the developer finishes. What that something is remains one of those mysteries which probably will not be solved until we know more about the atoms and molecules and electrons of which all substances are composed.

CHEMICAL MYSTERIES.

Some chemists are of the opinion that when light waves strike a molecule of bromide of silver, the molecule is given a sort of a twist so that it is not quite such a healthy, able-bodied molecule as it was before, rather bent but not broke. The combination or partnership of the bromine and the silver, never any too strong, is on the verge of being broken up, and it only takes a few minutes' soaking in the chimicals of the developer to separate them entirely.

After development there still remains that part of the bromide of silver, etc., which the light did not strike, and this must be removed before other light is allowed to reach the half-finished negative. Hence after development it is washed, and then immersed in another chemical bath, known as the "fixing solution" which consists principally of "hyposulphite of soda" or "hypo." This removes the unaltered silver "salts" as the bromide and other compounds are known, and makes the deep shadows as clear as glass. Then after thorough washing the negative is ready for drying and inspection, preparatory to running off a sample print.

"O Where Is My Wandering Boy Tonight?"

EDISON REISSUES FORMER SUCCESS

THE Edison Company has, on several occasions, found it profitable to reissue a former success in multiple reel form and it seems safe to prophesy that in this same form its former one-reel subject "O, Where Is My Wandering Boy Tonight," will score a similar success, now that it is to appear as a two-reel subject.

The story is suggested, of course, by the famous old song of that title and a splendid cast, among whom are such artists as Marc McDermott, Mariam Nesbitt, Herbert Prior and Bliss Milford, tends to make its success an assured one.

The photography, settings, action and direction are all beyond comment and the story is so put together that it holds one's interest to the satisfactory ending, found at the close of the second reel.

As the story runs, Warren Dean is a musical composer and his father, disliking the idea of his son's vocation, drives the boy from home. Ere departing Warren leaves a melody which he has just completed and after his departure his mother finds some comfort in putting the words of "O Where Is My Wandering Boy Tonight" to Warren's music.

Thrown on the world and compelled to shift for himself, Warren forms a partnership with Zelda Wade, a singer, and eventually marries her. Later, his health fails and, although both are without funds and work, Zelda manages to secure money enough with which to send him to the country for a year, where he regains his health. Upon returning to the city, however, he discovers that his wife has accepted the money with which to send him to the country from an admirer of hers, and in a rage he leaves her and endeavors to forget the fact that his wife has been untrue to him. Unfortunately, however, he chooses as his companion John Barleycorn and soon becomes a habitual drunkard and a worthless wreck, going down and down the ladder until he eventually winds up in the penitentiary.

Meanwhile, the father having died, Warren's mother is forced to earn her own livelihood playing an accordion in the street and there it is that Zelda, now a famous vaudeville star, finds the old lady and takes her home. By chance Zelda learns of her aged guest's relationship and from that time she takes care of the old lady as if she were her own mother. Zelda is much taken with the song composed by Warren's mother and even goes so far as to put it in her own repertoire.

Later, Warren, now an ex-convict, hears Zelda singing the song and vows revenge, since he still believes her the cause of his downfall. He learns her home address and after the theater one day follows her there determined to kill her. Ere he can commit a crime, however, he learns of Zelda's kindness to his mother and all thoughts of revenge instantly depart. Ere the picture ends, Zelda is again considering living with him and the two are arranging to properly care for his mother.

Kalem Director Still Working

The interesting picture below shows J. P. McGowan, the Kalem director who recently fractured his pelvis bone, in bed in a Los Angeles hospital where he is incased in plaster as far as his lower limbs are concerned. Helen Holmes, his leading lady, is just back of him and Leo Maloney, who takes the male leads is behind her. The nurse is at the back in white. J. P. McGowan has worked almost from the day he entered the Sisters' Hospital and has a telephone over his bed and is in connection with his company at all times during the day, actually directing from his bed. He has his typewriter so fixed that he can write easily and puts all his scenarios into shape. The nurses say he is the pluckiest patient they have ever had and he is always cheerful and his brain is working double time to make up for the temporary loss of use of his limbs. Notice the Christmas tree in the corner, for the picture was taken in the hospital on Christmas day when he received numerous calls and presents.

Forthcoming Bosworth Features

Bosworth, Inc., distributing through Paramount, announced last week the securing of Fritzi Scheff's signature to a contract by which the temperamental actress agrees to appear in a motion picture production of her most recent success, "Pretty Mrs. Smith." With the signing of Miss Scheff, the Bosworth Company completes its arrangements for the forthcoming three months.

During the forthcoming quarter, Bosworth, Inc., will release "It's No Laughing Matter" with the inimitable comedian Maclyn Arbuckle in the role of Hi Judd; Hobart Bosworth in "Buckshot John," a virile dramatic concoction, full of red blooded action and thrilling climaxes; Elsie Janis in "Caprices of Kitty" on Monday, March 8. This is the first of the Bosworth-Janis series.

Lois Weber and Phillips Smalley in "Sunshine Molly" will be sent forth March 15. About March 27, Fritzi Scheff in "Pretty Mrs. Smith" will be the Bosworth unit on the Paramount program, with Dustin Farnum following in a huge production of "Captain Courtesy." This first Farnum picture, according to all reports, is to be a massive enterprise.

The first of the Bosworth-Morosco features, "Help Wanted," which played one full season on Broadway and is yet a powerful road attraction, will be seen April 10 with Lois Meredith as the original star, in the role she created.

Gordon Griffith in "Little Sunset" will be released during the beginning of the baseball season. As this is a Van Loan story and directly of interest to the base ball loving public, the release date was set back accordingly.

Elsie Janis in "Betty in Search of a Thrill" comes next, with Adele Farrington in a comedy, "This Is the Life" following a week later.

Other great Bosworth productions are "Wild Olive" with Peggy O'Neil, "Nearly a Ladv" with Elsie Janis, Myrtle Stedman, Joseph Ray and Jack Conway in Jack London's "Smoke Bellew" and Leonore Ulrich in "Society Pilot," termed a sentimental romance.

An Ambitious Little Person

She has been a star in her own right, although she comes far from being of age. And now she is a very important member of the company with which the Kinetophote has surrounded Edwin August, who is making a mystery film for that company. The little person who is referred to in the foregoing remarks is little Clare Hillier, probably the youngest of the little folk who are playing principal parts in any film dramas. Little Miss Hillier is about five years old, but she has enough of the older and more sophisticated feminine mind about her not to tell the exact day and date of her birth. Previous to being engaged by the Kinetophote, she played in many films and was starred in "Puss in the Well," a picture in which all of the actors were children. But Clare has some very great ambitions, about which she likes to talk. She is going to be a great, big screen artist when she grows up. She isn't sure but what she will be another Mary Pickford. In the picture which Mr. August is producing, Clare has the part of daughter of the man whom Mr. August portrays.

Claire Hillier.

Prize Coupons and Trading Stamps

IN Syracuse, New York, a question has arisen that is interesting only because it may, and probably has, come up in other communities. The local police chief has prohibited the system of giving coupons to motion picture patrons, among whom the holders of lucky number coupons draw valuable prizes each week. The exhibitors who have been using the system want to retaliate by forcing the local merchants to cut out the trading stamp scheme, claiming the two systems are similar.

Without passing upon the legality of the prize coupon scheme, we must observe that it is not the same as the trading stamp scheme. In the latter system every customer gets stamps of a certain definite value, which are exchangeable at any time for merchandise of equivalent value. There is no chance or gamble about it. In principle it is merely a discount allowed on the purchase, which discount is taken in merchandise instead of money. In the prize coupon scheme the majority of customers get nothing but their admission to the show; but all admission fees are taxed a certain percentage to pay for the prize which goes only to one. Since all join in paying for the prize it is obvious that they pay for what they do not get.

Taking a gambling chance is the greatest of human weaknesses, and so the prize coupon and other similar schemes are always rather attractive to the public, at least for a time. But where only one-tenth of one per cent, or perhaps one-hundredth of one per cent, get a prize, the losing vast majority soon get tired of the game. The prize coupon scheme has never been continuously successful in attracting motion picture audiences.

On the other hand, the souvenir scheme is perfectly legal, because everybody gets a prize. On "souvenir nights" the exhibitors charging ten cents can afford to give away a souvenir costing two or three cents, and it is really surprising what that small sum will buy in thousand lots. Silver-plated spoons, hand mirrors, pocket combs, tea-cups, all sorts of merchandise has been used for this purpose; the scheme is not beneath the legitimate theater, many of which have used it. There is no reason why even the regular trading stamps could not be adapted to picture theater ticket sales.

As a general principle, however, we do not believe in any sort of prize offer as a means of gaining attendance. The excellence of the program should be prize enough. If an exhibitor cannot attract the people without giving them silver spoons, then he is really selling spoons for ten cents and throwing in a show for good measure. The show becomes auxiliary to the souvenir. No good show will ever become auxiliary to anything. If the people don't come, put the three cents a head you had appropriated for spoons into a better program or better projection or better ventilation or better seats or more courteous treatment of those who do come. With these things installed you will not need souvenirs.

DURING a luncheon given by the National Board of Censorship the other day a representative of large film manufacturing interests made an interesting suggestion, "Get the directors of our companies together," he said to the board, "and tell them what you have told us. Tell them the things you will have to cut if they insist upon putting them into their pictures. Go to see them in the studios once a month and impress upon them the importance of toning their pictures to meet the requirements. Appoint a committee to keep in touch with the publicity men and let them know what you are doing."

It is true, of course, that upon the director rests the responsibility for producing such scenes as the censor board finds it necessary to eliminate from the finished picture. The economically correct system would avoid their production in the first place. So doing would not only prevent a considerable waste of labor and capital, but augment the dignity and respectability of the picture in the eyes of the public by eliminating the necessity for any censorship.

In this country the press is free to say what it will, so long as it infracts no law. Considering the vast amount of reading matter turned out by newspapers and magazine offices, remarkably little offensive stuff is published. This does not mean that no such matter is submitted for publication; it means that the responsible editor in all cases applies the censorship before the printer gets the "copy."

The cases are quite parallel. Producing a film is in all respects similar to publishing a paper, a magazine or a book. Yet it must be obvious to every thinking man that if every issue of a paper were to be censored, or edited, after its publication, and the balance of the edition had to be held on the presses until its type could be altered or released at the dictate of such post-publication editors, the expense and delay of the procedure would put them all out of business. Yet that is the system employed in censoring films.

It is quite plain, therefore, that such censoring as is necessary—and none will deny that some is necessary at some time, on films or newspapers—must properly be done in the production and not after completion. The problem is just how to do it.

To inspect a thousand feet of film takes fifteen minutes. The actual production time of that same thousand feet, the time when the work of the director could be censored, is more apt to be fifteen hours. The project of censoring the direction of the production, instead of the completed work, by an impartial outside agency is therefore seen to be impracticable.

The only apparent alternative is for the manufacturer of films to do his own censoring. For this purpose he might hire a critic, whole sole function would be to restrain the doubtful impulses of the director. But in this the critic would be of little more value than the director himself, provided the latter was familiar with all the primary causes of censorship.

It is evident that almost all the work of the censor board goes for naught, because almost all of the film inspected by it needs no censoring. The same, of course, would be true of any censoring done in the studio during production. The vast majority of the director's work is unquestionably uncensorable. Therefore it would be a great economic waste to keep observation on all of it. Furthermore, the director himself has a very clear idea as to the passability of nearly all his work. The trouble is that when he is in doubt as to the propriety of a scene, he does not stop to make sure of it but goes ahead anyway.

It seems that a series of carefully planned conferences between the National Board of Censorship and the directors in the employ of film manufacturers, plus a standing committee prepared to take up at any moment the problems encountered by directors in their work and solve them on the spot, would relieve a good many of the present difficulties of censorships. The directors would become familiar with the principles of censorship through the conferences, until they were efficient censors themselves. They could have the services and advice of the standing committee at their own studios whenever an extra difficult question arose. It is reasonable to suppose that the films so produced would need no censoring.

Such a system might be neither instantaneously successful nor one hundred per cent complete; but we cannot question that it would be a marked improvement over present methods. What is perhaps the best feature of all, it would give the public a product to which the hateful word "censored" need not be applied. The editing of the film would become a part of its internal economy, instead of an external and more or less presumptuous appurtenance.

Selig's "The Spirit of the Violin"

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

BY putting together several pleasing human interest incidents and adding a considerable virile action to them, as well as a little intrigue, James Oliver Curwood has written a scenario dealing with a man's vindication in a most convincing manner in "The Spirit of the Violin," a two-part production which will be released by the Selig Polyscope Company on January 25.

There are places in this film where its entire merit depends upon its acting and in the hands of incapable players this would tend to kill the interest, but Stella Razeto, Guy Oliver, Baby Lillian Wade and Jack McDonald are equal to every such occasion. Miss Razeto and little Lillian Wade especially are deserving of praise for their portrayals of a lonely mother and her little daughter. Mr. Oliver is a convincing hero and Mr. McDonald an "unpopular" villain.

The photography is clear throughout. Some very pretty exterior scenes are shown, especially those along the banks of a river. The cabin is well planned, both interior and exterior and while there is nothing exceptional about it, the impression that it is a "prison" in which the wife is confined is strongly suggested. The only large interior set which appears during the production is a court room, which is very spacious.

The story opens by depicting the happiness of the Graham family—John, Mary, his wife, and their little girl. John is an excellent violin player and entertains his loved ones with the instrument whenever he is at home. When John is away at work, however, Mary is overcome by the loneliness of her life and longs for friends and company. Instead there is merely the solemn swaying pines, which surround the cabin on all sides, excluding her from the world beyond.

One day two men quarrel near John's home and one of them, in a fit of rage, kills the other by striking him over the head with a club. John is passing near the scene of the murder at the time and when he discovers the body of the fallen man the murderer sees a chance to shoulder the blame of his crime on the innocent man. He hurriedly secures the sheriff and several lumbermen and they find John bending over the body, with the club, which he had picked up, in his hand. He is placed under arrest and, after a tender farewell to his wife, led off to jail.

At his trial the testimony of the real murderer, who who says he saw John commit the deed, sends the latter to prison for life. Mary is heart-broken but returns to her cabin to bravely face the ordeal of the loneliness which she knows will follow. She feels that in time John will be freed, as she is certain that he did not commit the crime for which he was convicted.

Two years pass and there is nothing but sorrow in Mary's life. Even the presence of her little girl does not seem to lighten her burden. One day a gambler named Rann happens upon her cabin and is at once attracted by her beauty. Prompted by her misery Mary tells him her story. He sees a way to win her confidence and poses as a lawyer, saying that he will try to secure her husband's pardon.

Day after day he visits her and she trusts him. One day when she receives a letter from John, who sends her the money he earns in prison regularly, a blank sheet of paper drops out. Mary discards it.

John is arrested for the murder

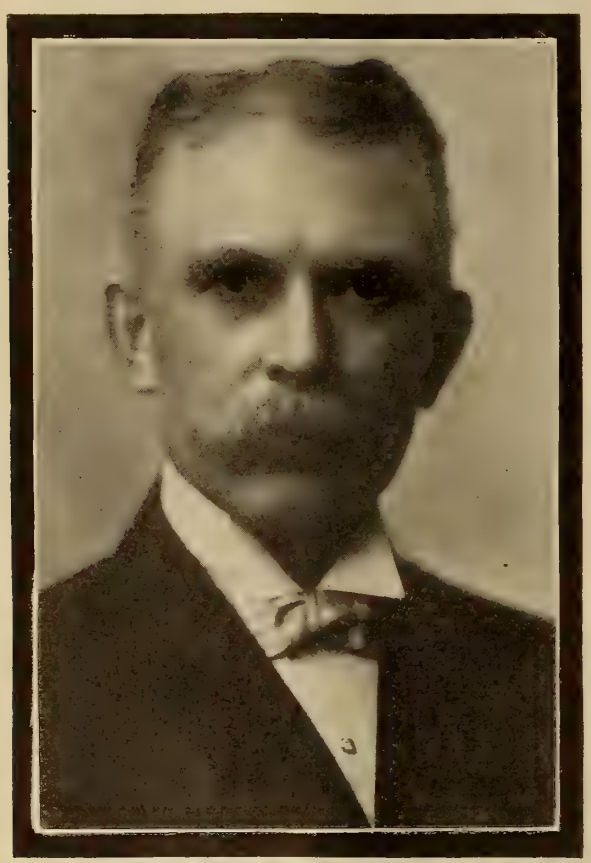
The violin prevents the false marriage

This gives Rann the opportunity he sought and he at once fakes a letter to Mary saying that her husband has died and that he will be buried in the prison cemetery if they are not notified within three days. To this he signs the warden's name. He also sees that Mary gets the letter four or five days after John is supposed to have been buried.

She is heart-broken and now that all hope of John's return is gone she is more lonely than ever. Rann proposes marriage to her and she agrees. He then plans a fake marriage, but just as the "ceremony" is about to be performed John's violin falls from its hook. Mary, feeling this to be a warning, sends Rann away forever. She rushes into the forest to regain control of herself, and when she returns is greeted by John, who has been pardoned by the governor, as the real murderer has confessed on his death bed.

Death of Walter A. Daniels

Walter Allan Daniels, known to the motion picture industry as president and general manager of the National Waterproof Film Company, Chicago, was born in Milford, Mass., June 28, 1852 and died at his residence in Chicago, Friday afternoon, January 7, 1915.



The late Walter Allan Daniels.

To those of us who have known Mr. Daniels intimately and who have been concerned with the condition of his health for the past several weeks, this knowledge is not surprising, but to the vast number of his friends and acquaintances in the film world, the news of his rather sudden death will come as a shock.

It was truly a great privilege to know W. A. Daniels. His dominant passions were his home and his friends. His love of both was ever apparent. From early boyhood he engaged in business on his own account and prospered because of his abundant faith in mankind. He loved men.

Mr. Daniels in his youth showed a strong tendency for the arts and sciences. He came with his parents to Milwaukee in 1866 and two years later entered the Chicago Academy of Art where he applied himself. Before reaching the age of twenty-one he was in business for himself, making satisfactory progress. The great Chicago fire in 1871 wiped him out and during the seven years which followed he was active in St. Louis and California. In 1878 he married and established his home in Chicago. Up to within a comparatively few years ago he was manager of sales and a director of the United States Printing Company.

By the strict application of modern business rules, he amassed a considerable fortune and remained active in business, for the pure love of the game, until about Thanksgiving of last year.

The funeral service was held at the residence, 4022 Sheridan Road, Chicago, Sunday, January 9, where floral offerings and the hosts of attendants emphasized the great esteem of those friendships which endure. The body was cremated at Graceland cemetery and interred at Milwaukee. A widow and a niece survive.

New Gollos Offices

The Photoplay Productions Releasing Company of which Aaron M. Gollos is president and general manager, is now at home in its new offices on the fourth floor of the Mallers building, the new quarters being costly, elaborate and up to date in every respect. The suite contains besides the private offices of the president and his associates, a large and beautifully furnished reception room, a commodious booking office and a paper and film stock room, conveniently located and handily arranged. The suite is furnished throughout in mahogany and the rugs are both costly and beautiful. Mr. Gollos declares that when the room is fully equipped no gaudy posters or cumbersome lobby displays will offend the eyes of the visitor, he having made arrangements to display his wares by means of tasty albums, containing still pictures of the various productions he is prepared to offer, and the reception room will then present the appearance of a library and lounging room more than that of a film exchange. MOTOGRAPHY hopes to present to its readers in the near future an illustration of the new quarters of the Photoplay Productions Releasing Company and in the meanwhile extends heartiest congratulations to the officials upon the new quarters they occupy and to the exhibitors upon the comfort and convenience provided for them as customers of the concern.

Pathe Exchange in Montreal

All Pathe films, with the exception of "The Exploits of Elaine," may now be obtained in Canada through the Pathe Famous Feature Film Syndicate of Quebec, with offices at 33 Bleury street, Montreal, P. Q. This branch covers the territory of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, and is under the management of Leon E. Ouimet.

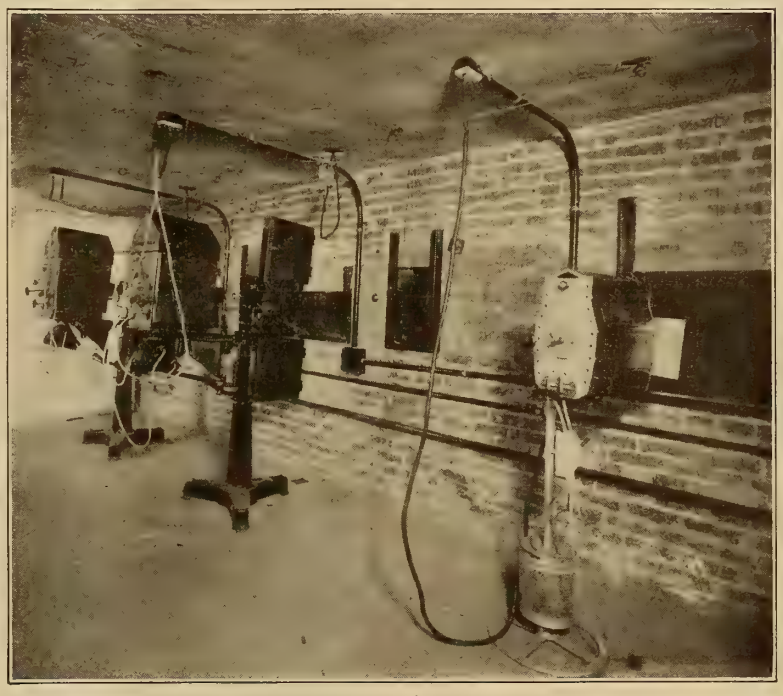
Other Canadian branches are contemplated within the near future.

A Small But Model Operating Room

FIRE DANGER MINIMUM

THE extraordinary popularity of moving-picture displays has in the past few years directed close attention to safeguarding such theaters and particularly the operating room, which is the chief source of the fire hazard in such establishments and therefore, also, of the resulting danger to life. Nearly all communities of even moderate size have special ordinances regulating the installation and equipment of moving-picture machines, and the National Board of Fire Underwriters has drawn up regulations for the installation, operation and maintenance of such machines which are intended to reduce the hazards to a minimum.

In a theater of this kind of considerable size the outlay for the equipment can, of course, be more generous than in a theater erected in a very small town or in the outlying district of a city. Nevertheless, even in the latter case, equipment of high character and a thoroughly satisfactory installation can be made at moderate cost, as is shown by the illustrations herewith.



Model operating room.

These illustrations are from photographs taken at the Windsor Park theater, Chicago. This establishment is of moderate size and is located at Seventy-fifth street and Railroad avenue, which is in one of the outlying districts in the southeastern portion of the city. Although the theater is of medium size and has all its seats on the ground floor, it is a new establishment and thoroughly up to date. The operating room is the center one of a series of three rooms located directly above the foyer. To the north of it, that is to the left of the room as shown in this illustration, is a separate room for a powerful motor-driven ventilating fan. To the right of the operating room is a separate room. This contains the rotary converter for supplying direct current from the three-phase, 60-cycle, 220-volt alternating current distributing system of the Commonwealth Edison Company; it also contains a control board for this machine and a switch and cut-out cabinet.

The brick wall shown in the picture is the rear wall of the theater auditorium. The brick wall on the opposite side of the room has a convenient tool rack. The floor in the operating room is of concrete, the partitions between this room and the two adjoining rooms referred to are of tile, and the entire surroundings are made as fireproof as possible. The display equipment consists of two hand-driven Simplex motion-picture machines shown at the left in the illustration: there is also a spotlight shown at the right. The openings in the brick wall between the operating room and the auditorium are closed by gravity-operated steel sliding doors. These and the damper in the ventilating flue running up from the ceiling of the operating room can be held open by means of light fishline, in the manner prescribed, so that in case a fire breaks out in one of the film machines these cords will be destroyed and the openings immediately close. The bottom one of the three conduits shown along the brick wall carries the 220-volt supply circuit and runs to the steel cabinet. The upper conduit supplies the spotlight and also the first picture machine. The middle conduit supplies the further picture machine. The conduits are run to a point overhead each of the projecting arc lamps so as to make the flexible connection between the conduit outlet and its corresponding lamp as short as possible.

It had been intended originally to use a mercury-arc rectifier for obtaining direct current for the projecting lamps from the alternating-current supply. It was finally decided, however, to install a Martin five-kilowatt rotary converter instead of a mercury-arc rectifier. This machine develops direct current at 70 volts and runs at a speed of 1,800 revolutions per minute; it was supplied by the Northwestern Electrical Company, Chicago. The control panel directly above the machine contains a three-pole switch; it also contains a direct-current voltmeter. Mounted back of the panel is a transformer for reducing the 220-volt alternating current to an appropriate voltage so as to give 70 volts direct current after passing through the rotary. Above this are two grid resistances; one for each of the moving-picture machines.

In the steel cabinet shown in Fig. 2 there is a double-pole, double-throw switch at the top, by means of which the circuit for the projecting lamps can be thrown from the direct current supplied from the rotary to the alternating-current supply, the current in the latter case passing through the Compensarc transformer mounted on pipe standards. This reduces the alternating current to a suitable voltage for the lamps and makes it possible to run the lamps if something should happen to the rotary converter and thus make direct current unavailable. There is a switch for each lamp and also a main supply switch at the bottom. The switches ordinarily would be fused switches but there had already been obtained an equipment suitable for a mercury-arc rectifier, as mentioned above. Consequently the fuses for these switches were mounted on separate gear blocks without wasting any of the material already at hand. A circuit is also run from the alternating-current supply through a conduit.

Pathe Star's Humble Start

On a certain broiling hot day in July, 1894, a travel-soiled, perspiring and weary traveler on horseback in the Ozark Mountains of Missouri, halted his stumbling nag in front of a lonely log cabin, some fifteen or twenty miles from the nearest railroad station. It was the first habitation he had seen in six miles. The cabin door opened and a tow-headed little girl dashed out to the traveler, dug into the turf with one bare foot and then looking up at him in a perfectly self-possessed manner invited him to "light for a while, stranger, an' rest yo'-self." The traveler complied and informed his hosts that he was connected with a traveling company of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" players. The eyes of the tow-headed child snapped when she heard that the guest of the family was connected with a theatrical company. "Mister," she piped, "I can act," and then the astonished traveller saw the midget assume an oratorical posture and heard her repeat a scene from "Hamlet" word for word. It was crude, of course, very crude, but it made a deep impression upon the theatrical man. He turned to the child's parents and at once offered to give the budding genius a chance with his company at the fabulous salary of "5 a week and grub." The next day as the traveler ambled away behind him perched a little girl with a blonde top. Pearl White had embarked upon a theatrical career.

Pearl White.

For a year she played "Little Eva" with the wandering company. Then she heard from her parents that they had moved to the metropolis of Greenridge (population 287) and wanted her with them. So she left the stage for a while and put in six years in school. Apparently her desire for the footlights had died a natural death, but one day a circus came to the county seat and the White family took it in. She slipped away from her parents and at the end of half an hour came back with the news that she had asked for and received "a job with the show" That some night when the circus men "folded their tents like the Arabs and silently stole away," Pearl was with them to put in several years as a bareback rider. Then came an opportunity to go back on the stage where she had been ever since, playing, as she expresses it, with some of the best and some of the worst companies in existence.

Several years ago she received a tempting offer from the Pathe Freres American stock company to appear in pictures. That determined her profession and with Pathe she has been ever since, with the exception of short intervals.

When the "Perils of Pauline" was started Miss White was selected for the role of Pauline, and certainly no better selection could have been made. When the big new serial the "Exploits of Elaine" was first talked of it was early decided that she was entitled to the part of "Elaine" Miss White jumped at the chance. "Now I can show people that I can really act" she said.

Florence Reed in "The Dancing Girl"

"The Dancing Girl," the four-reel Famous Players' picture which has showed all week at the Strand theater, is one of interest. Florence Reed plays the title role and is best supported by Eugene Ormond as the Duke and William F. Russell as John Christison, a Quaker sweetheart, whose devotion is long-lived. Lorraine Huling fits well into the role of Faith Ives, sister to Drusilla, the "dancing girl." Fuller Mellish is rather too violent as David, the father of the two girls. The greater part of the film is satisfying, but there are moments in which too particular attention is given to minor scenes—for instance, the scene of Drusilla's playing with her pet dog. Miss Reed has a big smile, likeable personality, beautiful clothes and self-confidence, and by these qualities is her work marked. The photography, settings and choice of scenery deserve especial mention. The famed stair-case scene is well done and one wishes that more footage might be given to this particular scene.

Selig Player Enjoys Character Work

Lyllian Brown Leighton.

THE editor is absolutely without a heart. A sputtered "Why—uh—go on! I never wrote an interview,'' only brought the reply, ''Don't keep her waiting any longer. It was an hour ago that I made the first appointment for you, and I've made three others since. Besides, it's press day and there isn't anyone else to go."

Going back home on a vacation makes one feel as though he doesn't care whether or not he ever works again, and so I replied: "All right, Caward. I'll be glad to meet her anyway, but as for writing it up—remember (tensely dramatic and independent), you'll have to take what you get."

Then I left to interview Lyllian Brown Leighton.

After a few preliminary remarks had retired the weather and elevator service beyond resurrection, Miss Leighton confessed: "I'm an awful person to interview. All I ever say is 'Yes' or 'No,' and I never can think of anything to tell a person."

With the two-fold intention of keeping my interview out of the course of a straight-jacket cross-examination and gratifying an inward curiosity as to why Lyllian was spelled with a 'y,' I asked and was told: "Oh, I don't spell my first name with a 'y'—others do it for me. But the reason for that digression is a long story in itself, and began with an incident hardly worth repeating—a mere nothing." And Miss Leighton dismissed the subject with a smile which, while it did not squelch my inward curiosity as to the presence of a "y" in "Lyllian," was cheerful and contagious, as any follower of Selig comedies will agree.

"Do I like Chicago? Yes"—positive and unqualified—"it's my home town, but that is not the only reason. It has a large variety of weather. Of course, I just love the Selig western studio with its wonderful climate, nice people, roomy, comfortable dressing rooms, and then we are always working out of doors. But it was my one wish when I left Los Angeles that I get nipped by the cold just for the novelty of it, and the Chicago breezes have gratified my wish more than once since my arrival December 16.

"One of the best compliments I ever received on my work was given me by the manager of the hotel in which I lived when I joined the western forces about a year and a half ago. One day, after I had been his guest for nine months, he said: 'Say, I've never seen any of your pictures. Don't they show them around here?'—and he had been seeing our comedies at one of the local theaters right along. Playing character leads, I considered this quite complimentary, but had I been playing in straight make-up I would probably have moved out of his hotel immediately.

"My animal experiences have been few and lucky so far, and then only with leopards, though they have some beautiful trained Bengal tigers at the studio. The first animal picture I worked in, 'The Tonsorial Tiger Tamer,' was a comedy in name only. I was nearly scared to death, notwithstanding the animal-trainer's assurances that the leopards which ran about the caged-in set were shamefully tame. While I was standing behind the piano waiting for my cue to enter the set, one of the leopards leaped upon a pedestal beside me and sat there staring me in the face. The perspiration froze and melted alternately on my forehead, but I couldn't budge. It seemed ages before the animal ended our face-to-face pantomime by jumping down off of the pedestal and trotting back into the camera's scope.

"Speaking of queer experiences reminds me of my meeting with John Bunny on State street the other day. We had never seen each other before, except on the screen, but our recognition was mutual as he stepped out of a taxi just as I was passing. He smiled, raised his hat, and after shaking hands and exchanging Christmas and New Year greetings, we talked for a few minutes, feeling as though we had been acquainted for years. Isn't it queer, the feeling of intimate acquaintanceship that the screen conveys to a spectator?"

"You bet," I replied, surmising that Miss Leighton had received her share of "fan" letters, which, with all respect to their writers, could not be more intimate were they communications between a brother and sister.

"Character parts," resumed Miss Leighton, "afford variety and offer a large and interesting field in which to work. In one of our late two-reel comedies I had eighteen changes of costume in one week. Lately we have been doing an average of two reels a week. Yes, it is strenuous, but I like it. We often go out to the sea shore in the morning, a seventeen-mile auto ride through a beautiful section of the country, take a few scenes, and get back to the studio by noon.

"One of the nicest things about working at the western studio," confided Miss Leighton as we waited for an elevator, "is that you can get such a cute little bungalow or apartment in Los Angeles, and it is no trouble at all to take care of it. Just now I am living at a hotel, but my mother is going to return with me New Year's, and we are going to keep house."

Hearts-Selig Pictorial Secures Reporter

The clever and versatile woman known to the literary world as Grace Darling has become the Hearst-Selig reporter and her visualized interviews will appear in the Thursday releases of the Hearst-Selig Twice-a-Week News Pictorial. One of the first assignments of Grace Darling was to attend the distribution of baskets at the Salvation Army headquarters in New York City, in company with Miss Eva Booth. The young lady has also interviewed William Jennings Bryan, secretary of state; Secretary Daniels, Representative Gardner, and many other notables who are in the public eye.

David Griffith Visits Chicago

Chicago was honored on Tuesday morning, January 12, by a visit from the distinguished Mutual director, David W. Griffith. He spent several hours in the "Windy City" at the Mutual offices ere proceeding to New York with H. E. Aitken, president of the Mutual Film Corporation.

Mr. Griffith arrived in Chicago early Tuesday morning straight from the West coast, and when seen by a representative of Motography declared that no special significance was attached to his visit to the East at this time, but since he hinted that he has been steadily at work since becoming the chief director of the Mutual forces and during that time has produced several of the big multiple reel subjects for which he is now famous, it is easy to surmise that his trip East is more or less in the nature of a little vacation, though possibly new contracts may have something to do with it. As to his plans for the future, Mr. Griffith merely smiled and hinted that his future activities would have to speak for themselves, though he hinted at a continuation of such big productions as, "The Escape," "The Avenging Conscience" and "The Clansman," the twelve-reel picture which is not yet completed.

While in Chicago, Mr. Griffith met and talked with Aaron Jones, head of the Jones, Linick and Schaefer enterprises, and was also introduced by Mr. Aitken to a number of other people who had visited the Mutual offices that morning for the special purpose of seeing him.

To any inquiry as to which one of his many productions he himself considered the best, Mr. Griffith declined to answer, but later declared that he had spent more time and care on the production of "The Clansman" than on any previous single production, though others, acquainted with his work, were not backward in asserting that by all means "The Clansman" would prove the supreme triumph of Mr. Griffith's career, since it is claimed to be the most costly, massive and spectacular picture ever taken in America. It is alleged to have more action and spectacular battle and scenic effects than did "Judith of Bethulia" the last big Biograph production made under Mr. Griffith's direction. Announcement of the release of "The Clansman" and the method by which it will be placed before the American public will be made from New York City, that having not been thoroughly worked out, as yet. Mr. Griffith and Mr. Aitken left shortly after noon on Tuesday going direct to New York City.

Box Office Feature a Hit

It is masterly, the Box Office Attraction Company's presentation of the Kipling poem, "The Vampire," as scenarioized by Emerson Browne and produced by Frank Powell, as "A Fool There Was." Edward Jose as "The Fool," gives a performance so fine and so finished that none but the highest of praise can be accorded him. Equally fine and equally finished is Theda Bara's characterization of "The Woman." Add to the splendid interpretation of both these parts, that of the wife, the friend, the child and the other characters which round out the story and the six reels of the production make it one of the best the film market can offer. Plainly, there can be no disappointment attendant upon this William Fox feature, which had its first showing, an invitation one, at the Strand theater on the morning of January 12. A full orchestra, directed by S. L. Rothapfel, was an enjoyable feature of the occasion which was one of especial and general satisfaction. Mr. Powell's direction of the picture is to be commended and the richness of sets and fineness of scenery, commended. The story of the production appears in the section devoted to synopses of films. Mary Pickford in "Mistress Nell"

For the first time since her connection with the Famous Players Film Company, which dates back to more than two years ago, Mary Pickford will be seen in the costume of the romantic period of English history, in a five-part film adaptation of the celebrated historic drama, "Mistress Nell," the former starring vehicle of Henrietta Crosman, by George C. Hazelton, Jr., to be released on the Paramount Program February 1.

"Little Mary" invests the role with a dynamic force and a tender charm unequaled in any previous stage portrayals of the piquant and daring "Nell," of whom it has been said, "England would not be as great without her." Throughout the production, Miss Pickford wears several changes of costume, first as the actress, then as the sweetheart of the king, and finally as the cavalier, in which disguise she circumvents the plots of the king's enemies, and which provides the first opportunity in many years for Miss Pickford to appear on the screen as a boy, and the creation is as artistic as it is novel.

Pursuing its original policy of producing five part photoplays, adaptations from legitimate stage successes with legitimate stage stars, the Life Photo Film Corporation has completed the cast for its forthcoming five-part feature release, "A Modern Magdalen," by C. Haddon Chambers.

Lionel Barrymore, who made his debut in motion pictures in the leading role of "The Seats of the Mighty" has been engaged by the Life Photo Film

Corporation to appear in its "A Modern Magdalen."

Miss Cathrine Clunties, also a recruit from the legitimate stage, together with William H. Tooker, who has appeared under the direction of such well known managers as David Belasco, Klaw and Erlanger and the Frohmans, constitute the trinity of stars.

Mr. Barrymore is under contract with the Colonial Motion Pictures Company and it was through the courtesy of that corporation that his services were loaned to the Life Photo Film Corporation.

Pending the completion of the repairs to the studio of the Life Photo Film Corporation at Grantwood, N. J., "A Modern Magdalen" will be staged at the studio of the Colonial Motion Picture Company.

Itala Moves to Larger Quarters

Plans for extending operations of the Itala Film Company of America, of which Harry R. Raver is the active head, necessitated larger and more desirable executive quarters. These were secured in the World's Tower Building at 110 West Fortieth street, New York City, and a large force of carpenters, painters and electricians have just completed the installation of the various departments necessary for the work of Mr. Raver's staff.

The new offices embrace the majority of the Twenty-fourth floor of the building. Here the exploitation of "Cabiria" and other excellent Itala productions goes on without interruption. New subjects are arriving from the Torino studios and will soon be circulated in America.

The excellence of Itala films has been proven by six years' continuous showing throughout the world and in spite of the apparent decline in state right sales generally, Harry R. Raver claims his product has been able to hold its own without loss of prestige or volume of sales.

Cinema Club's Dance

A merry party was that of the Cinema Camera Club's second annual dancing event which had its holding January 8 at the Palm Garden. Lillian Russell and Robert Edeson with Clara Kimball Young and William Farnum assisting, led the grand march and, had the flash not been set off prematurely, a photograph of the marchers and the prettily decorated hall would have been a valued souvenir of the occasion. As it was, this little incident in no way spoiled the fun and to the screeners and others of the industry, the evening was one of especial pleasure. Miss Russell in a white satin gown and ermine coat, took a two o'clock departure, though that by no means meant dispersing-time for the other guests. Clara Kimball Young wore a becoming frock of blue embroidered in silver and Irene Tams, Clare Whitney Norma Talmadge, Cissy Fitzgerald, Bessie Learn, Viola Dana, Miss LeManna, and Ethel Lawrence were but a few of the other screen ladies who went to make a charming many. The various producing companies were respectively represented by the acting force, though none of the official heads were present. It was a happy and a merry party though, and Frank G. Kluger, the club's president, headed the committee which had to do with its arranging. Following are the officers and the committee members:—

Frank G. Kluger, president; Edward Wynard, first vice-president; John C. Arnold, second vice-president; Philip E. Rosen, financial secretary; William C. Marshall, recording secretary; Alfred H. Moses, treasurer and Eugene Gaudio, sergeant-at-arms.

Harry H. Keepers was floor manager and P. J. McCaffray assistant floor manager.

The Arrangement Committee consisted of Arthur A. Edeson, John Arnold, Philip Rosen, Al Armsbaker, Edward Horn and the Reception Committee, Henry Bredeson, William S. Forsyth, Irving Willat, Ollie Leach, Edward Wynard, John Van de Broek, Otto Brautigan, Hall Young, Eugene Cugnet, Carl Gregory, A. Lloyd Lewis, William C. Marshall, M. M. Robinson and William C. Thompson.

"Heart of Maryland" Shown by Tiffany Co.

Herbert Brenon is responsible for the competent direction of the many-reeled subject "The Heart of Maryland" which has Mrs. Leslie Carter in the leading role of Maryland Calvert, and William Shay and others of screen standing, providing able support. There were eight parts to the picture, as shown to a Sunday afternoon invitation attendance, January 10 at the Longacre theater, but six reels, it is said, is to be the release-length. There are many big and spectacular scenes which were splendidly handled and Mrs. Carter had legitimate opportunity for the display of her wonderful dramatic ability. "The Heart of Maryland" is a good picture, if for no other reason than the director's human treatment of human people.

M. C.

Expert at Liberty

C. V. Henkel writes to say that he is open for an engagement and desires the trade to know that though he has been identified with the executive end of film producing and distributing companies in the past, he is competent and has experience in the actual direction of motion picture productions.

An opportunity to make use of Mr. Henkel's photographic, chemical, dramatic and inventive talent is thus presented.

Mr. Henkel did most of the laboratory and studio direction in one of the early independent companies.

Famous Players Visit Chicago

Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players Film Company, Mary Pickford, that company's star, James Kirkwood, director, and Mrs. Pickford, "Little Mary's" mother, spent a day in Chicago last week while on their way to Los Angeles. Mr. Zukor was the guest of Messrs. Jones, Linick & Schaefer, who control an important circuit of western theaters. The players continued to the Los Angeles studio of the Famous Players, where they will remain for the winter and spring, and where Miss Pickford will be presented in a series of important feature productions.

The Great Northern Film Company announces that it has for release an elaborate new production featuring the distinguished star, Betty Nansen. The photoplay is entitled, "A Woman of Impulse." It is in four parts and is said to suit superbly the requirements of this unusually gifted actress. In fact it is claimed that in her latest vehicle she is seen to better advantage than ever before.

Miss Nansen is far too well-known and admired by American moving picture fans to necessitate lengthy comment or praise in these columns. Suffice to say that she is one of the world's greatest tragediennes and is known as the Bernhart of Scandinavia, her native country. Her powerful acting in former Great Northern productions is well remembered by the American public and it is safe to say that all will welcome her return to the screen in "A Woman of Impulse."

Allison & Hadaway Lights

One of the really interesting developments in transportable illumination for motion picture use is the new Allison & Hadaway twin arc lamp recently installed in leading eastern studios. The features of the lamp combine high efficiency with compactness and portability. The lamp weighs 19 pounds and is transported in a light case. Each unit furnishes 8,000 c. p. of white actinic light. Outdoor scenes at night, the subway, store interiors, automobile races at night, industrial scenes of many descriptions—all have been successfully made with the lamps. "In fact," said Mr. J. W. Allison, "the uses to which this new illuminant may be put open up 25% additional range to the director looking for new and novel effects."

In the December 5 issue of Motography a description of the use of this light by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company in taking some night scenes is described.

The lamp is economical to operate and, weighing so little, is capable of being transported to any point. It works on either D. C. or A. C. current. It is very simple in construction, has collapsible reflector and resistance units, and can be attached to any stand or tripod.

The illumination from these lights is such the makers claim that a picture is able to register the difference between the color of a man's clothing and his face, giving a greater range of colors and shadows than any other light heretofore on the market.

An advertisement of this apparatus appears on another page of Motography, and the manufacturers will be very glad to give any further information wanted if communicated with.

Demonstrations may be had at the offices of the company, 235 Fifth avenue, New York City.

Life Photo's Annual Meeting

At the first annual meeting of the stockholders of the Life Photo Film Corporation, held January 7, 1915, at the offices of the company, 220 West Forty-second street, New York, these officers were elected for the ensuing year: Edward M. Roskam, president; Bernard Loewenthal, treasurer; Jesse J. Goldburg, secretary; Francis H. Tobias, first vice-president, and L. Abrahams, second vice-president. A financial statement of the affairs of the company was presented to the stockholders, made by the auditors of the company. Although the company had been unfortunate in the past year, having encountered such difficulties as its eviction from the One Hundred and First street plant, by the fire department, and the opposition on the part of the various boards of censors throughout the country to the releasing of "The Ordeal" at the present time, the financial affairs of the company are more than sound, showing a substantial net profit on the business of the year, in addition to which the assets of the company at present exceed the total capital stock of the corporation by more than 75 per cent.

The policy of the corporation for the ensuing year was definitely planned and laid out. It will continue the manufacture of adaptations from stage successes, featuring in each production a Broadway star, and increase the output to two productions a month. This is to commence as soon as the repairs are completed to the new and model studio being erected adjacent to the laboratory at Grantwood, N. J. It was further determined that no stock of the corporation was to be sold to outsiders, and to continue the policy of running a close corporation.

If appropriate arrangements cannot be made with a releasing or program concern to take over the entire output of the Life Photo Film Corporation, the releases of the company will be sold on a state right basis, the officers of the company believing that the time has again arrived when the demand for the purchase of productions on a state right basis justifies the company going back to that policy.

Sparrows Get Directors Goat

Two sparrows this week broke up the climax in the big scene of Charles Klein's "The District Attorney," which the Lubin Company is making into a photoplay at the studio in Philadelphia. And not only did they break it up, but they kept it broken up quite successfully despite every effort to capture them.

"The District Attorney" had been practically completed under the direction of Barry O'Neil. All that was needed to finish the play was the big climax and a few minor scenes. O'Neil had the set ready for the big scene. The players, who included Dorothy Bernard, A. H. Van Buren, Peter Lang, George Soule Spencer, Rosetta Brice, Ruth Bryan and Charles C. Brandt, had rehearsed the scene three times. The two camera men were waiting the signal to crank. Everything was in readiness.

"Lights," shouted O'Neil. The powerful lights dazzled the room. "Camera," yelled the director. Both camera men started to grind and the acting began. Then down swooped two sparrows, just grazing Miss Bernard's head. All the players did a small stampede, thinking the sparrows were bats. O'Neil had to stop the scene. A few minutes later the players began again and once again into the scene swooped the sparrows. It was indeed a test for tempers, but not nearly as great a one as when the thing happened a third time. O'Neil was forced to wait fully three-quarters of an hour, while every one in the studio, armed with various domestic weapons, helped drive out the winged interrupters.

Seery Denies Rumor

Roie C. Seery, district manager of the Mutual Film Corporation, with headquarters in Chicago, also Chicago manager of the Serial Publication Corporation and the Thanhouser Syndicate Corporation, on Tuesday morning, January 12, emphatically denied in the presence of Harry E. Aitken, president of the Mutual Film Corporation, the story which has been in circulation the last few days in Chicago, to the effect that he was about to sever his relations with the above concerns to accept a position of importance with another film company. Mr. Seery asked Motography to absolutely deny the rumor which has gained circulation and declare that there was not a word of truth to it.

Brevities of the Business

Harold Lockwood, the versatile and popular juvenile lead of the Famous Players Film Company, left this week for their Pacific Coast studios where he will join Mary Pickford, who preceded him to the Western organization. Mr. Lockwood will support Miss Pickford in the series of subjects selected for Western production, the first of which will be the celebrated play, "Audrey," by Mary Johnston.

Carlyle Blackwell, who was expected in New York at this time, has found it necessary to postpone his trip until some time in the future. The press of business at the studio in Los Angeles, Calif., has been so great that he finds he is unable to leave. Such of his friends as had expected to see him in New York will be glad to know that his trip is only postponed for the present and not abandoned.

Tom Terriss, who is making pictures for the Kinetophote, came near to getting himself and several others arrested for attempting to commit suicide on a fire escape near the Kinetophote studios at Coney Island, a day or two ago while making a scene. Incidentally, he got a fine mob scene of an impromptu character by taking advantage of the situation and using about three hundred citizens, etc., who gathered in the street to watch proceedings.

William Moore, he of the auburn hair known as "Willie," who began his film career in 1908 as office boy for Harry R. Raver, and who has been found in every one of Mr. Raver's enterprises since that time, is now installed in the new Itala offices in the World's Tower Building as "executive custodian," his new duties being to "look after everything" in sight.

Douglas R. Jacobs, ex-representative of the U. S. Feature Film Co. Inc. of Oroville, Cal. is in New York for a stay of indefinite length and is stopping at the Hotel Flanders.

George D. Proctor is again one of the trade-press boys, having returned from a several months' stay in Boston and become a staff member of the News.

Elsie Janis of Bosworth, Inc., had a narrow escape from drowning recently while taking a scene for "Betty in Search of a Thrill" picture.

The Bosworth company is again on the move. This time a company of thirty men, with horses and a general outfit for typical "western stuff" is being taken to Banning, Calif., to take some of the opening scenes in Charles E. Van Loan's "The Message to Buckshot John."

Announcement is made of another installment of the famous American "light" series, under the title of "In the Twilight," from the "Flying A" studios under direction of Thos. Ricketts.

Grace Cunnard can always be relied upon in an emergency. It happened recently that the rain interfered with the preparation of some very big sets and ruined others so that it was advisable to defer making some scenes in the big production "The Campbell's are Coming" and Miss Grace clipped in with a capital one-reel story based on the lost "Peg Leg" mine.

H. M. Horkheimer, president of the Balboa Company, Long Beach, Calif., states that he will not stop adding to the number and strength of his stars with the engagement of Henry B. Walthall and Ruth Roland. On the contrary he will announce the engagement of a number of others just as soon as he can do so without embarrassing them in their present positions.

When the door of Lois Weber's dressing room at the Bosworth studio is closed, and buzzing little groups gathered there, edge to the fartherest corner of the stage—it portends just one thing—the ghost of another photoplay is abroad and the authoress must not be disturbed until it has been placed on paper.

Henry Walthall's last communication to the Balboa Company was to the effect that he was marooned on the New England coast waiting for the weather to clear so he could finish a number of marine scenes that are essential to the production in which he is now appearing for Pathe-Freres. His first work will be recorded upon Balboa films in Beulah, the six-reel dramatization of Augusta J. Evans' famous novel.

On Sunday evening, January 10, George Kleine gave a special performance to the members of the theatrical profession, at his Candler Theater, West 42nd street, of Mrs. Leslie Carter in "Du Barry." For the first time in the history of private exhibitions a second performance was necessary. An exhibition to the motion picture exhibitors was given on Monday morning, January 11 and 1,100 exhibitors and their friends enjoyed the projection.

Vivian Martin has been selected to appear opposite Robert Warwick in the World Film Corporation's filmitization of the great Liebler success, "Alias Jimmy Valentine," which was written by Paul Armstrong from the O. Henry story, "A Retrieved Reformation."

The Regent Film Manufacturing Company, of which Irene Tams is the star and S. L. Warner the producer, is making one reel comedies in the Centaur studio at Bayonne, N. J. The Tams-Warner pictures are scheduled for release on the United Program.

Mr. and Mrs. Hobart C. Chatfield-Taylor recently entertained a party of Chicago society leaders at a private exhibition of the Essanay six-reel photoplay, "The Crimson Wing," taken from the novel of that name written by Mr. Chatfield-Taylor. George Ade was among those present.

"A Million Bid," "Wild Beasts at Large" and "Love, Luck and Gasoline," were witnessed at West Point by seven hundred cadets and officers with their families. Among those present was Colonel George W. Goethals, builder of the Panama Canal.

Vera Lewis has joined Bosworth, Inc., and is playing with Elsie Janis in "Caprices of Kitty," the first release by Bosworth starring Elsie Janis. Mrs. Lewis is the "Miss Smythe of Miss Smythe's select seminary."

American Film—This company expects to start on the serial, for which a $10,000 prize was offered by the Thanhouser Syndicate Corporation, some time in February. It is reported this serial will probably run to thirty episodes.

Mutual Film Corporation—The preferred stock sold as high as 57, reacted to 54 and 55 is now bid.

New York Motion—There is a lack of transactions as almost all of the stockholders are awaiting the directors' meeting this week, which will probably disclose the dividend policy for the year. Stock sold at 77.

Thanhouser Syndicate—The Sunday papers announced the trend of the reconstructed story. All of the episodes now connected, Hassam Ali disposed of, and practically the entire Thanhouser cast now working on what that studio claims to be the most exciting screen productions they have ever been responsible for. New bookings have proven the exhibitors' responses to the recent changes that have been effected.

Syndicate Film—Income is reported to be in excess of $8,000 per week in what might be termed the fourth phase of this remarkable production. Stock is reported to have a book value of over $200 per share, but is offered today at 150.

World Film—Shares have eased off every decidedly in the past week. As against a high point of 6½, stock can now be had at 5 and 5⅛. Any price above par would seem to represent an unwarranted speculative enthusiasm, as the company is only a few months old and shows no better earnings than Mutual or General, whose preferred issues can be had at approximately one-half of par.

Bertha M. Sinclair, better known as "B. M. Bower," author of the famous "Happy Family" series of fiction stories, was an interested visitor at the Selig studios at Los Angeles last week, where she met Wheeler Oakman, Kathlyn Williams, Tom Mix and other stars who played title roles for the film adaptation of these western tales.

Miss Mary Alden of Mutual is too busy to think of work. She received a new Cadillac for a Christmas present and ever since she has been riding around learning to drive.

The Masterpiece Film Corporation has moved into its new home at 1339 Gordon street, Hollywood, Cal. The new plant covers half a block and all the buildings are to be of solid concrete painted white, to provide as much light as possible.

On January 17 Colonel Jasper Ewing Brady of the Vitagraph will leave for San Antonio, Texas, as advance agent of the Vitagraph Company, which will spend the next three months in that part of the country producing some military pictures of unusual interest.

The third World Film feature, in which Clara Kimball Young is to be starred, will be made from the famous novel "Hearts in Exile." This noted story deals with Russian life, and Miss Young will be perfectly at home, for she has demonstrated that she is especially adapted to parts in photoplays of the Russian type.

Still another innovation in Selig comedy will be announced officially within a short time. W. N. Selig has made all arrangements for a series of fun-makers which will interest exhibitors everywhere. Noted authors are collaborating upon the photoplays.

A six-reel picture featuring Joe Welch has just been completed by the Photo Drama Company. The production was made in the new studio of the Centaur Film Company at Bayonne, N. J.

The Vitagraph theater will offer as its principal feature picture for the week commencing Sunday, January 10, "The Silent Plea," a three-part dramatic appeal for the widowed mother's allowance. It was taken in co-operation with Sophie Irene Loeb, member New York state commission for the relief of widowed mothers.

The World Film Corporation feature, "The Wishing Ring," was shown at the Indiana prison located at Michigan City, on Christmas day and was enjoyed by the 1,100 inmates. It was secured for them by Mrs. George Ohming, of the Starland theater, Michigan City, Ind.

A contract was signed this week between the Life Photo Film Corporation and C. Haddon Chambers whereby the Life Photo purchased the motion picture rights to Mr. Chambers' foremost drama, "A Modern Magdalen," in which Amelia Bingham, Wilton Lackaye and Henry E. Dixey starred for many seasons.

G. M. Anderson, who spent the holidays in Chicago, and Charles Chaplin, the Essanay comedian, danced the "Broncho Billy" waltz at a consolation party in the Windy City, appearing in their motion picture makeup. The dance was originated by Mr. Anderson and is one of the weirdest and funniest stunts on or off the stage.

Had it not been for the new East Indian operation for cataracts, invented by Major Black of the British Army and used successfully by Dr. William Fisher of Chicago, Andrew Robson, noted eastern actor and one of the stars of the California Motion Picture Corporation, would have gone blind. Mr. Robson made the trip from California to Chicago for the treatment which saved his sight.

A little studio mystery which has puzzled picture "fans" throughout the country during the past few months in connection with a new but familiar face upon the screen, under the Selig brand, has been explained. The lady is Miss Edith Johnson. Many inquiries have been received regarding this actress; most writers have confessed the features were perfectly familiar, but none could "remember" which company she formerly was with. Miss Johnson was the posing beauty for the Eastman Kodak Company previous to her advent into pictures. Her beautiful face was seen everywhere in various poses, on the pages of leading magazines, upon beautiful booklet covers and etched upon folders of artistic design.

If it is true that the European war is causing great depression in the American film market, there is certainly no evidence of the fact in the spacious studios of the Centaur Film Company in Bayonne, N. J. In addition to the eastern section of David Horsley's own forces, three outside producing concerns are busy there night and day. The latest part occupant of the Horsley plant is the All Comedy Company.

Western Manager Harry C. Drum of the World Film Corporation has been at it again. This time he has secured the contract for one of the finest theaters in San Diego, Cal., the first of the exposition cities. The theater is Clune's Isis.

A vast ranch, presenting one of the most beautiful locations in the mountains back of Los Angeles and overlooking a valley with a snowcapped range in the vista beyond, has been leased by Bosworth, Inc., where work is now well under way on the forthcoming release, "Captain Courtesy." Dustin Farnum, the prominent legitimate star, who recently allied himself with the Bosworth forces, will appear in the title role of the production.

A sturdy and independent little organization which was formed the past summer is that of the Eclair junior baseball club, named after the well known film company. The club, which is composed of New York youngsters, who are all ardent "movie" fans, decided to pay a signal honor to their favorite moving pictures and call themselves the Eclair Juniors.

George Broadhurst's famous comedy, "What Happened to Jones," is to be made into a World Film Corporation feature, and it will be released shortly on its program.

Bosworth's special representative, Carl H. Pierce, left for Richmond, Va., last week to attend the opening of the new Strand theater there. The Strand is backed by the Norfolk capitalists, J. C. and H. C. Hofheimer, who are opening this house with the Paramount program.

The skin-clothes aggregation is creating something of a sensation at the Selig Jungle-Zoo, where Director MacGregor is putting on "The Clam-Shell Suffragette." Believing the cave-period drama to be "hogging" the screen to an undue extent, William E. Wing has written a comedy, with settings worthy of the most realistic, as relating to the prehistoric age.

During the run of the feature, "The Sins of the Mother," and the playlet, "What the Moon Saw," at the Vitagraph theater, a number of compliments were received regarding the work of Paul Scardon, who appeared in both the sketch and the picture play. For an actor to "look" different, as well as act different in each new characterization and do it so well that his identity can only be learned by referring to the cast of characters, is a mark of distinction that stamps him a consummate artist deserving of mention.

Seventy-five of the two hundred and fifty scenes in the World Film Corporation production of "Wildfire," in which Lillian Russell stars, were taken at Charleston, S. C. These scenes included a race in the morning in which five or six of the thoroughbred horses took part. In the afternoon pictures of the crowds, the paddock and other scenes were taken.

Benjamin Cohen, until recently a member of the staff of Lewis J. Selznick is the latest recruit to the force at the headquarters of the Alliance Films Corporation. Mr. Cohen will assume charge of the auditing department when alterations now under way are completed.

Florence Crawford of Mutual

Perhaps no film favorite has made greater strides with motion picture audiences during the past year than Florence Crawford, the attractive Griffith-Mutual star. Miss Crawford is strictly an outdoor girl. She is a horsewoman, a crack shot, a swimmer and a tennis player. She was born in Franklin, Crawford county, Pa. Her ancestors settled there more than 200 years ago, and the county took its name from her family's. She is also a descendant of a grandfather who went through the civil war, a great-grandfather who was a veteran of the Mexican war, and a great-great-grandfather who fought in the revolution, and this may account for her fearless daring. Miss Crawford received her education in Pittsburgh and New York. Three years ago she called on one of her girl friends at the Mutual New York studios. The visit decided her future, for she received an offer that day to go into pictures and the offer she accepted. For several months she played small parts and then went to the Hollywood studios in Los Angeles to portray important roles.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

Pathe Daily News No. 2—PATHE—JANUARY 6.—This issue contains views of the wrecked Dorothy Palmer, the five masted schooner, almost destroyed near Cape Cod, Massachusetts; the horses on the speedway at Brighton, Massachusetts; a New Year's Day parade of the mummers of Philadelphia; the inaugurtion of Governor Whitman at Albany, N. Y.; and, in the war section, views taken near Courtrai, Vedrin and Iseghem Belgium, at Boulogne, Arris, Desvres and Compiegne, France.

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 2—SELIG—JANUARY 7.—In this issue views are shown of the first Hindu temple erected in the western hemisphere, wrecked by a bomb; a $300,000 fire at the terminal and ferry building in Camden, N. J.; the sailing of the Thirtieth Infantry from San Francisco, by way of the Panama Canal, for Plattsburg, N. Y.; and in the war section views are taken of the Belgian troops who fled across the border into Holland, also some close-up and exceedingly interesting views of the damaged cities along the English coast, which were recently bombarded by the German fleet.

Pathe Daily News No. 3—PATHE—JANUARY 11.—This issue of the weekly contains views of the injured in the recent New York subway fire being cared for; the fifty-mile race between Bob Burman and Barney Oldfield at Los Angeles, Cal.; the new pastime of baseball on skates as played in Washington, D. C.; at Brooklyn the Secretary of the Navy is seen presenting medals to the heroes of the U. S. navy for valiant service at Vera Cruz; the ice yacht race at Medford, Mass., and, in the war section, scenes taken at Hartiepool, England, near Charny, Vermelles, Denain, France, and also in the vicinity of Cortemark, Belgium.

The Undying Fire—BIOGRAPH—JANUARY 18.—Marion's fiance comes to visit her under the influence of liquor, and she breaks the engagement and marries the governor of the state. Her former lover endeavors to forget her by taking up with another woman, but eventually his longing for her leads him to visit Marion and he seizes her in his arms. She flings him off and when her husband enters and denounces him as a thief, he is sentenced to prison for house-breaking, but with the aid of other women makes a sensational escape, and late at night, he visits the governor's house. When the convict enters, Marie realizes her desperate case and snatches a pistol from a drawer. The governor, returning from a banquet, finds her reeling against the mantelpiece, and the convict's lifeless body on the floor.

To Make the Nation Prosper—EDISON—JANUARY 18.—The picture is produced to aid the movement for promoting the purchasing of goods made in America. The photoplay depicts not only the origination of the "Buy a Bale of Cotton" movement, but also the results, and endeavors to promote the principle at stake insofar as possible. The leading roles are enacted by such Edison stars as Bessie Learn, Mrs. William Bechtel, Marie La Manna and Patrick O'Malley.

It is our aim to make this department as complete as possible, although to do this, we must have the co-operation of all the manufacturers of film in the United States. If brief stories of the films you are releasing this week are not contained in this department, it must be due to the fact that you have not supplied us with synopsis sheets. In that case please see that we are advised of your film titles and release dates, and furnished with a brief synopsis of the story. This department is intended for every film manufacturer, whether he uses our advertising pages or not.

It shows the condition in the South before the movement started, weaves in a strong drama that brings it right to our door and finally shows the result of the "Buy a Bale of Cotton" plan.

Sweedie and Her Dog—ESSANAY—JANUARY 18.—Sweedie, her dog, a band of dog catchers and a timid employer form the elements around which the comedy incidents in this production are built. Mr. Dingby engages Sweedie as cook and she insists on taking her dog, "Skinny" with her. The dog catchers capture "Skinny" and Sweedie forces her new employer to help her recover him. When they arrive at home her antics cause a great deal of trouble, some of the incidents at this point proving real laugh getters. Her best friend calls and takes her for a ride in his cab and the incidents during this affair are also humorous. Upon her return, Sweedie finds that her dog has ben abused and the film ends with a general riot in the household. Wallace Beery, Betty Brown, Leo White and Ben Turpin do excellent work in the four laugh-getting roles.

The Leech—KALEM—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 18.—Carl Linden, a society parasite, contrives to meet Mrs. Tully, who is endeavoring to break into society and represents himself to her as a nobleman. Mrs. Tully's son, George, falls in love with Grace, a Salvation Army girl, but the mother is horrified to learn of her son's love for such an humble person. Linden becomes engaged to Helen Tully, George's sister, visits the house one day when Grace is calling upon Mrs. Tully and there the Salvation Army girl denounces Linden, declaring he deserted her three months after their marriage, while Helen falls into her mother's arms and Linden flees from the house. Later, in endeavoring to steal some engagement gifts from Helen's room, Linden is surprised by Grace's and Helen's entrance, and leaps from a window, falling to his death on the pavement below. Alice Joyce appears in the role of Grace.

Patsy's Vacation—(FOURTH EPISODE OF THE PATSY BOLIVAR SERIES)—LUBIN—JANUARY 18.—At examination time, Patsy and Sykesy are both fearful lest they fail to pass. Sykesy steals a boy's examination paper from an adjoining desk, and attempts to copy down the correct answers on his own paper, but when a member of the faculty appears, he gets rid of the paper by throwing it over on Patsy's desk. There it is found, and Patsy expelled for "cribbing." At home Patsy is put to work on the farm, while Sykesy, who has successfully passed the examination, is hailed as a hero. Patsy lets a herd of cows escape from the pasture he was sent to guard, and his father is about to thrash him. Patsy, however, leaves a note saying that he has decided to shift for himself, and then departs from his home. The bill he offers as railroad fare is a bad one, and as the film closes he is being put off the train at night in an unknown town. Clarence Elmer featured.

His Fighting Blood—SELIG—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 18.—Jim loves Hope McTrigger, but allows himself to be bullied by Sam Buck, who also loves her. She rejects Jim because of his cowardice, but later his fighting blood is aroused, and in an encounter he conquers Buck. The leader of a rival clan gathers his followers and kidnaps Hope. Jim and Buck forget their differences and bravely fight to rescue the girl. When the battle is over she goes to Jim and Buck realizing that she loves the other man, steps aside. A review will be found on page 83 of the January 16 issue.

A Race For Life—(THIRD EPISODE OF "THE FATES AND FLORA FOURFLUSH")—VITAGRAPH—JANUARY 18.—By prodigies of valor, honest Frank Goodheart escapes from the alligator pit in which he and the beautiful heroine, Flora Fourflush, were hurled by order of Sir Simon Blackheart at the end of the second episode. Sir Simon "gets in bad" with the Rajah by stealing a giant ruby from the treasure house elephant and is tracked by human blood hounds. Blackheart manages with his thugs to capture Frank whom he ties upon the railroad track. Flora hastens to the rescue of her lover and when Sir Simon steals a locomotive and sends it speeding towards helpless Frank, the poor street cleaner, though struck and run over, springs into the engine cabin and heaves Sir Simon down the bank. The villain then disguises himself as a child and tells Frank that Flora awaits him in a deserted cottage, and manages to there overpower the hero and tie him to several cases of dynamite. Flora, bravely goes to the rescue of her lover and the villain himself is placed in Frank's position and blown to atoms when the dynamite explodes. The Rajah presents the happy couple with a huge ruby as a wedding present. Clara Kimball Young featured.

The Lady of Dreams—Biograph—(Two Reels)—January 19.—The Wallace children are so unruly that their governess leaves. Bobby Lane, another unruly boy is also unkind to his governess, May West. Walking in the park with May, Bobby finds an invitation to a masquerade ball, and when May takes it from him, he behaves badly, until a gentleman, passing, rebukes him. May keeps the invitation, and attends the ball as Little Red Riding Hood, and in the conservatory meets the handsome stranger who chided Bobby in the park. Later it is announced that a valuable brooch has been stolen and a command is given that everybody present unmask. May realizes that being uninvited she will be suspected, and at the suggestion of the handsome stranger hides in the conservatory, and later escapes. Trying to find her again, the stranger discovers a slipper which she had dropped in her flight and keeps it as a memento. Later May is discharged from her position and secures the post of governess in the Wallace household. Playing with the children one night, the little folks discover in a drawer of their father's desk a pretty slipper and later beg for a bed-time story. With the slipper as a suggestion, May begins the story of Cinderella, and Mr. Wallace, coming up to the nursery to bid them good-night, arrives in the middle of the story, and at its finish comes forward as Prince Charming and claims his Cinderella.

Olive's Manufactured Mother—Edison—January 19.—The ninth of the Olive series in which Mabel Trunnelle is playing the title role. It is well produced and the individual roles well taken. The story follows: So that Mme. Forresti will not adopt Olive, Drew concocts a scheme by which Olive is led to believe that her unknown mother has been discovered. He and Laura hire a woman, who leads a double life, and Olive, believing that this creature is her mother, goes to live with her, and leaves Mme. Forresti's palatial home. The police trace stolen goods to this woman's home just as Olive has found some of the concealed loot. Olive is arrested and almost fainting, happens to lean against the wall, which in some unknown manner gives way, and precipitates her into a passageway. The police go outside to search for her. Meanwhile, Olive returns, through the secret panel, and is confronted by the old woman, who thinks Olive has betrayed her. She attempts to kill Olive, but a heart attack prevents her executing the deed. She dies, telling Olive of her deception. Olive, hearing the police returning, escapes, finds Vance, and tells him that the woman was not her mother. M.C.

The Misjudged Mr. Hartley—Essanay—January 19.—Another one of the delightful single reel society comedy dramas for which Essanay is becoming noted. In this case the situation about which the film is built deals with a young society man, who, through an accident, appears to be a burglar in the eyes of the girl he has just met, and whom he has fallen in love with at sight. Bryant Washburn and Ruth Stoneshouse have the leading roles and do excellent work. Brian Hartley, as the story begins, is invited to dinner by a friend. As the friend has moved from her old address he gets into the wrong house and there meets Celia Thayer. She is visiting some friends in the house and has been left alone. When Hartley says that he has been invited by his friends to spend the evening, she undertakes to entertain him. After he has left she finds that the house has been robbed and believes Mr.

Hartley a society burglar. When the young people are again brought face to face at a summer resort, she is about to turn him over to the police when her heart softens. She gives him some money and tells him to go straight. He gives her the laugh and she becomes indignant and is about to expose him, but the arrival of friends of both clears up the situation. The atmosphere, settings and photography add delight to the film. C.J.C.

Cornelius and the Wild Man—Kalem—January 19.—When Bosco, a wild man, escapes from a circus side show, a reward of 100 is offered for his capture. Cornelius, a farmer, on the way to town with a load of eggs is captured by Bosco, but manages to escape and relates his adventures to the people in town. Returning home, Cornelius tells the story to Mandy, his wife, but, smelling his breath, she is suspicious and beats him up with a buggy whip. He flees, only to be captured by Bosco. Mandy, pursuing him, overtakes Bosco and leads him to town as her captive. On the same reel is a cartoon comedy featuring a battle between Hesanut, Kalem's cartoon comedian, and one of the bloodthirsty New Jersey mosquitoes, which is entitled "A Night in New Jersey."

Gus and the Anarchists—Lubin—January 19.—Gus Goober, a waiter at a sloppy cafe, of which Tom Dreck is the proprietor, is in love with Rosy Heintz, the new cashier. So busy is Gus watching Rosy that he spills soup down a customer's neck, and is fired. Rosy induces Dreck to hire Gus back again by promising to cure him of his love, and then arranges with Dreck and other waiters in the place to make use of some costumes left behind by a stranded theatrical troupe, to make Gus believe that she is queen of a band of anarchists, and that he must join the band before he can hope to receive her love. Aided by her friends, Rosy scares the life out of Gus, who promptly ceases to love her. On the same reel is:

Cupid's Target—Lubin—January 19.—Bob takes Lucy to a ball game, but the girl has eyes only for Marty, the pitcher of the village nine, and keeps constantly telling Bob of the flowers which Marty sends her daily. Bob, to earn money with which to buy flowers, gets a job with a carnival company in which he has to black up and stick his head through a sheet, for people to throw base balls at. Bob has no sooner gone to work than Marty appears and proceeds to bounce a half dozen base balls off his dome. Later, Bob is bumped by a speeding auto, and the driver hands Bob some money and makes his escape. Bob buys a bunch of flowers, but upon arriving at Lucy's is told that she and Marty have been married. In despair, Bob goes to his room, arranges the flowers about himself, folds his arms across his breast and goes to rest.

Cactus Jim's Shop Girl—Selig—January 19.—While many of the situations in this picture are rather doubtful as to their plausibility, the action moves swiftly swiftly enough to cover this discrepency. Tom Mix and Goldie Colwell have the roles of Cactus Jim and Nell the shop girl. Jim advertises for a wife and Nell answers, stating that she will be glad to marry him. When he visits Nell, she rejects him for a floor-walker in the store where she is employed. He determines he will not return to the ranch without a bride, so he buys a dummy, which fools the boys until Nell, who has discovered that she likes Jim better than the floor-walker, comes to the ranch. While not a side-splitting comedy, this is one which can honestly be recommended as being worthy of a place on any program, for it is very entertaining. C.J.C.

The Evil Men Do—(Broadway Star Feature)—Vitagraph—(Three Reels)—January 19.—David Horton and Beatrice Elton are childhood sweethearts, but later Beatrice is amazed to learn that David has married Margaret Forsythe. The wife entertains on a lavish scale and David speculates, loses everything, including his wife, who elopes with Captain Clifford. Beatrice meets David, urges him to go west and start life over again, and at her suggestion, he locates at Ranchville. Clifford meanwhile tires of Margaret, deserts her, later meets Beatrice, marries her and goes west. Beatrice knows nothing of Clifford's past and finding Margaret by chance, induces David to take back his faithless wife. Margaret accidentally meets Clifford next day, he threatens her, they struggle and she is accidentally killed. Horton finds the body and accuses Clifford, who breaks down and confesses the whole truth, which is heard by Beatrice, who tells Clifford all is over between them and he kills himself. After the funeral David and Beatrice leave for the east, determined to start life anew. Maurice Costello and Marie Weirman featured.

The Wonders of Magnetism—EDISON—JANUARY 20.—An educational film which depicts the wonders of magnetism in a most vivid fashion, showing the two kinds of magnets now in common use, the electro-magnet and the steel magnet. The Edison magnetic ore separator is shown in operation and one learns what a wonderful aid the magnet is to science and industry. Likewise, one is taught in a few minutes more of the principles of magnetism than the ancient philosophers discovered about the bewitched metals, as they called their magnets, in a millennium.

A Weighty Matter for a Detective—EDISON—JANUARY 20.—Jesse Stevens is seen here as Skinny, the detective, and Andy Clarke takes the part of a bewhiskered old individual named Mr. Shorts. Skinny, a blushing schoolgirl, assumes a disguise, and takes up the trail of Messrs. Splits, Pilkin, and Shorts who are daily seen to enter the woods accompanied by an important looking and tenderly handled brown jug. The truth of the matter is that the three men whose daily travels are causing their wives so much worry are only afflicted with a craze for playing mumble-ty-peg, and take themselves off to the woods to indulge in the sport in order to escape the hum and rush of the village. In her sleuthing Skinny accidentally stirs up a nest of criminals, and causes the arrest of the whole gang. The three married men are well taken care of by their wives, and are compelled to swear off on their mumble-ty-peg pastime.

The Fable of Hifaluting Tillie and Her Plain Parents—ESSANAY—JANUARY 20.—Peggy Sweeney, as hifaluting Tillie, Rapley Holmes and Clara Smith, as her plain parents, present three well-drawn and pleasing characters in this George Ade fable. The plot is exceedingly simple, as it deals with a country girl who has "airy" ideas injected into her head at a seminary and who goes to the city thinking country life is too slow for her. When she visits her parents, after returning from the seminary, amusing incidents follow in rapid succession, as she criticises them for every move they make. Later, when she finds herself alone and without funds in the city, she realizes that she does not belong there and returns home. Her plain parents find many things to criticise her for, but lovingly receive her and overlook her faults. The rural atmosphere is well preserved, but the city part of the story is not made quite so convincing, probably because of the lack of footage. It is, nevertheless, a worthwhile offering. C.J.C.

The Cabaret Singer — KALEM — (TWO REELS)—JANUARY 20.—George Randall, a millionaire, after a visit to his friends the Dentons, is impressed with his own loneliness in life, and shortly afterwards meeting Pearl Eltinge, a cabaret singer, makes her his wife, unaware that her beauty is but a mask for her shallow mind. Her utter selfishness becomes apparent as the months pass and Dorothy, her maid, secretly pities the husband. As time passes Randall sees the difference between the characters of his wife and the maid, and after a short while the wife longs for the bright lights of her former career, and despite her husband's pleas, departs. The following morning Randall picks up a newspaper to read of a frightful railroad wreck and there discovers at the head of the list of the dead, the name of his wife. In the months which follow Randall perceives in Dorothy all the qualities which Pearl had lacked. The girl wins his heart and the millionaire makes her his wife. Tom Moore and Marguerite Courtot featured.

Her Weakling Brother—LUBIN—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 20.—Kitty Morgan and Jack Burrows are employed by Robert

Hedden, an architect. Jack is offered a partnership opportunity that necessitates an investment of $500. He is only able to raise $250 and Kitty sells some jewelry left by her mother and gives another $250 to Jack. Lloyd, Kitty's weakling brother, becomes involved with questionable associates, and is pressed for money. Remembering his mother's jewelry he plans to steal it, but finds that it is gone. He goes to Kitty's office and there acquires several blank checks of Hedden's, and one which Hedden has signed, but not filled out. Kitty finds Hedden's open check book on Jack's desk and returns it to her boss and Hedden seizes the opportunity to make love to her. Next day Hedden is informed that some one has cashed what appears to be a forged check, and at once he suspects Jack. Kitty is led to believe her lover guilty, but Hedden promises to spare him if she will marry him. Kitty consents, to save Jack, but later the truth becomes known and Kitty scorns Hedden. Lloyd is convicted of the crime, he being really guilty, and Jack marries Kitty. John Ince and Flora Lea featured.

Between Matinee and Night—SELIG—JANUARY 20.—The plot of this production deals with the events which occur between the afternoon and evening performances of Richard Stanhope, a theatrical star and in which he plays a prominent part, though none of them directly bear upon his career. While visiting a criminal court in search of types, he sees a man sentenced for forgery, who blames a vampire for his downfall. The indifferent look on the vampire's face impreses Stanhope, and five years later when Tom Daly, a boyhood friend from the West, falls into her net, he determines to save her. Daly angrily refuses to listen to his advice and after a matinee performance, Stanhope disguises as the forger and comes to the vampire's apartments, where he denounces her in his friend's presence. She believes it is the man whom she has wronged, and is forced to confess her true character. The forger is released from prison on the same day and comes to the vampire's apartments, determined to kill her. Daly and Stanhope are just leaving and persuade the man to come with them, while the actor returns to the theater and prepares for his evening performances. The Westerner starts back to the ranch, where a little girl awaits him, taking the forger with him, so that he may begin life anew. C.J.C.

The Right Girl—VITAGRAPH—JANUARY 20.—Earle New-Wed and wife, Anita, return from their honeymoon and Earle meets Jack Bachelor, an old friend, who expresses his regret that he has not yet met the "right girl." Earle suggests that Jack hunt until he finds her and then follow her. Next day, Mrs. New-Wed, shopping, accidentally meets Jack, whom she has never seen and he, being struck with her beauty, follows her. She has him arrested, and when Jack appeals to Earle, later, he goes to jail and bails out his friend. To square things, Earle takes Jack home to dinner, but while Earle is out of the room Anita enters, sees Jack sitting in her husband's chair and, believing him her husband, coyly makes love to him. When she discovers him to be a total stranger, she flees to the kitchen in a panic, and prepares rolling-pins and other weapons for the siege. Earle, attracted by the cries of his wife, rushes towards the kitchen just as the women open the door and attack him. Jack hastily departs crying "none of this married life for me."

The Gang's New Member—Biograph—January 21.—The murder of a Chinaman on New York's east side gives the cub reporter his opportunity. Slouching about a saloon frequented by the gang, he rescues a girl from the attentions of a gangster, and through her influence is made a member of the gang. Later the gang become suspicious of a story in the newspapers and one of them shoots the reporter, calling him the "squealer." The girl nurses him back to health, but learns that he is really the "squealer." She declares her love for him, but the reporter has only gratitude for her. Spurned, she denounces him to the gang, and he is hurled into a basement while the gang debates what to do with him. The girl's love triumphs and she sends for help, the police arriving in time to save the reporter and arrest the gangsters.

Sentimental Sophie — Essanay — January 21.—In the many house where "Snakeville" comedies have "gone big" this film will be warmly received. As usual Victor Potel, Harry Todd and Margaret Joslin have the leads. Slim and Mustang are rivals for the hand of Sophie, the cook at the hotel. Mustang arranges to go riding with Sophie, but Slim "beats him to it" by writing a fake note. When Mustang learns of the deception, he sets out in pursuit and Slim, in a hurry to get started, leaves Sophie's horse tied to the fence, with her on it. The loiterers about the hotel assist Mustang in the pursuit of his rival and the film ends when Slim takes refuge in a muddy river and Sophie falls into Mustang's arms, after learning that he is her worthy lover. The Shanghaied Baby—Lubin—(Three Reels)—January 21.—Jackie, the little son of Gordon and Leila Lambert, is neglected by both his parents. One evening during a party the little fellow wanders down the stairs and out onto the porch, where he falls asleep. John Manning, who has paid much attention to Leila, is rebuked that evening by the woman he loves and to teach her a lesson, he picks up the child on the porch and carries it to his own home. Later, Joe, "the Eel," entering the apartment to burglarize, recognizes Jackie and abducts him, expecting a ransom. He dresses him as a Chinese child and hides him in a cellar of the Chinese quarter. Captain Brent, of a tramp steamer, rescues the boy and puts to sea with him. Fifteen years later, Jackie, who has been adopted by Brent, is living on a tropical island where Brent dies, leaving the young man a ring which was found on his finger as a child. Jack goes to San Francisco and joins the navy. He meets and falls in love with Isobel Greig, a wealthy girl, whose mother refuses to permit her marriage to a sailor, so Isobel meets him at the home of her friend Leila, Jack's mother. One day the mother accidentally discovers the little ring in Jack's posession and he is proven to be her child. Ormi Hawley, Kimpton Greene and Louise Huff featured.

Daredevil Harry—Mina—January 21.—Daredevil Harry is in love with Flossie, though Mr. Dynamite, Flossie's father, objects, and bundles the girl off to boarding school. Flossie gets word to Harry of her departure and he goes to rescue her. In the meanwhile Cyclonic Pete with his two assistants hold up the stage coach, and is at once smitten with Flossie's charms. He lets the assistants have the mail bag, and himself rides off with the girl. Harry comes along, and when he learns what has happened, he engages first in a long chase and then in a hand-to-hand battle with the outlaws. Flossie comes to Harry's aid, and the two, now re-united, ride out to Harry's ranch, but Cyclonic Pete appears there and another fight follows. Flossie escapes and goes for help while Pete places a lighted bomb at Harry's feet. Help arrives in time to save Harry, and the lovers are finally re-united again.

The Navajo Ring—Vitagraph—January 21.—Jim Dace, the town drunk and bad man, so abuses his wife and family that Mrs. Dace leaves him, taking with her their child, Jess. Jim, amazed at his wife's leaving, turns over a new leaf, reforms, and finally becomes prosperous. For years he travels, hoping in that way to learn the whereabouts of his wife. Meanwhile the mother finds herself unable longer to support herself, and Jess, the girl, who is now eighteen, is faced with the double care of providing medicine for her mother and caring for them both. One night, desperate, she enters a cafe and is insulted by a loafer, to whom she endeavors to sell a Navajo ring which her father had given her when a baby. At that moment Jim happens to enter the place and the sight of the ring assures him that the girl standing before him is his own daughter, Jess. He introduces himself and is taken to the humble lodging of Jess and her mother, where a joyful re-union occurs. William Duncan and Margaret Gibson featured.

Hearts Hunger—Biograph—January 22.—The writer adores his wife. The publisher is indifferent towards his wife. The writer sacrifices his last carfare to buy a flower for his wife. The publisher is so cool towards his wife that she finally becomes a nervous invalid and takes to bed. The doctor's visits do her no good, and at last the physician, who is acquainted with the writer, lets the publisher know that no medicine will cure his wife, that what is needed is the food of love. He conducts the publisher to the writer's humble home, and there the publisher's eyes are opened to the value of sweetness in life. The publisher's attitude changes and his wife quickly recovers her gaiety, while the publisher, grateful to the writer, buys and publishes his masterpiece, a story previously rejected by the publisher because it lacked "the punch."

Tracked by the Hounds—Edison—(Two Reels)—January 22.—A melodrama in which several police dogs are strongly featured. Katherine, the daughter of Robert Stuart, a millionaire, loves Frank Johnson the owner of an adjoining farm, but her father wishes her to marry Count La Francisco because of his blue blood. The count eventually abducts Katherine, but his scheme is broken up by the wonderful ability possessed by the police dogs, which lead the searchers to a hut in which Katherine is confined and at the finish of the picture the count is exposed and Katherine is free to wed the man she loves. The picture was reviewed on page 57, issue of January 9.

The Lieutenant Governor—Essanay—(Two Reels)—January 22.—Russ Cook, on the eve of his execution tells his attorney of his crime. Sometime before he was in love with the daughter of a mill owner and when he learned that she was engaged to the lieutenant governor, a man whom he admired, he stepped aside. A political boss also loved the girl and when she refused to marry him, caused the men at her father's mill to strike. The governor refused to take a hand in protecting the father and when an attempt was made to blame the entire affair on the lieutenant governor and to take his life, Cook foiled the boss' plans and then shot the governor, in order to place the lover of the girl in the executive chair. A review of this subject will be found on page 91 of last week's issue. C.J.C.

Cooky's Adventure—Kalem—January 22.—John Rogers is compelled by an election result to not only pay a bet of $50, but also clip his hair close to his head. In an ugly mood on this account he refuses his wife's request for a new hat, but when she visits him at his office, he gives her the money with which to buy it. Mrs. Randall buys the hat and sends it home with Katy, a cook she hires after leaving the millinery store. Katy wears the hat, and Randall, also returning home, happens to sit just behind her. In lighting a cigar he accidentally sets fire to the hat and is attacked by Katy. Katy informs Mrs. Randall what has happened and in the midst of the story, Randall comes home. The cook again attacks him and it requires the combined efforts of Mrs. Randall and all the servants in the house to separate the two. Katy is finally paid and sent on her way.

The Question of Conscience—Lubin—January 22.—George Gray and Frank Wright, are clerks in the office of the latter's father, Silas Wright. Gray's wife is an invalid and he finds himself under a heavy debt, and borrows from the office safe, at the same time altering Frank Wright's books so that the deficit will, for the time being, be concealed. About this time Silas offers Gray the management of a mine in a locality the doctor has recommended for Mrs. Gray, and

Gray accepts the postion, though he broods over the shortage, which he knows must be discovered soon. At the discovery of the shortage young Wright is blamed and ordered from the house by his father. Later, Gray, conscience stricken, decides to confess all, but before he can do so, Frank Wright has become a cowboy who falls in with a couple of yeggmen and one night arrives at the railroad station near the mining town at the same time as his father. The yeggs plan to rob the mine office, and though Frank protests, he is overruled. He deserts the gang and starts to the mine to warn the others, but the yeggs pursue and finally kill him. The father, believing the boy had intended to commit a crime, begs Gray to take his son's place in his affections, and the latter with troubled conscience decides to do so. L. C. Shumway and Webster Campbell featured.

Who Wants to Be a Hero?—SELIG—JANUARY 22.—Without fully developing the farce comedy idea embodied in the script, this offering is more than acceptable. The incidents follow in rapid succession and each one secures a laugh. The story tells of the troubles of Count De Swigg, who is called upon by both the Umgulla and Bamboozlum armies to join them in battle against each other. He is at a loss to know how to dodge the embarrassing predicament, and when he makes a mess of it, is ordered to fight a duel with himself. When he not only does this, but also chases both armies from the field of battle, the action becomes fast and furious. John Lancaster has the part of the count. C.J.C.

Wanted, A Nurse—VITAGRAPH—JANUARY 22.—J. Robert Orr, a wealthy clubman meets Helen Worth, a nurse at the Mercy Hospital, through the medium of a street accident. With him it is love at first sight, though the girl does not give him her name. Determined to seek her out, he pretends to be sick and orders that he be removed to Mercy Hospital. Miss Worth is called away to attend a private patient and Orr finds himself attended by nurses who are far from beautiful. In desperation, he escapes from the hospital clad in a nurse's uniform, and upon returning to the club is considered crazy. Dr. Worth, Helen's brother, is called to attend him and thus Helen eventually assumes his care. Orr, finding his affinity has returned, writes a note declaring. "I love you. Won't you promise to marry me—if I am normal." Helen, pretending to be annoyed, reads the note, and then shyly whispers, "You are normal" consenting to become his nurse for life. Sidney Drew and Jane Morrow featured.

His Night Out—BIOGRAPH—JANUARY 23.—His old chum decides to give him a night out, and introduces him into bad company. Assisted by Claude Coke, a discouraged dope artist, hubby, after many adventures and much scandalous behavior, is piloted home after an evening of high jinks. On the same reel is:

In the Boarding House—BIOGRAPH—JANUARY 23.—A fat shipping clerk on the third floor is a budding Henry Irving, and the little slavey thinks him "grand." The boarding house mistress is also captivated by him and smuggles many goodies into his room. The dramatic sketch team on the ground floor hear his ranting and investigate. The slavey entertains the policeman surreptitiously in the kitchen and a funny negro waiter gets in everybody's way. Many laughable complications occur before the curiosity of the boarders is finally relieved as to what is happening.

Mr. Daly's Wedding Day—EDISON—JANUARY 23.—An exciting melodrama dealing with the capture of a smuggler and a counterfeiter named Daley. Connors, a chauffeur, drives Daly to a hotel, Daly explaining that he has to be married within an hour and has forgotten his marriage license. A traffic cop halts them, but a five-spot lets them proceed. Later Connors is handed a five-spot for the trip and learns shortly afterwards that it is a counterfeit. The traffic cop has also discovered his to be a counterfeit and Captain Kane of the secret service, together with Meservy, one of his agents, is soon on the case. The picture ends with the capture of Mr. Daly and others of the gang. Herbert Prior featured.

Broncho Billy and the Baby—ESSANAY—JANUARY 23.—The acting of a little child, Bernice Sawyer, and the building up of an exciting climax, together with a realistic portrayal of an outlaw by G. M. Anderson, makes this an acceptable film. An unusual feature is the expressing in action of the entire subject, this being a real artistic effort, for the majority of producers would revert to a leader as being the easiest way to "get over" a few situations. The plot is slight, as it deals with the protecting of an outlaw from arrest by the parents of a child whom he saved. A strong crisis is worked up where the father of the child is tempted to tell the posse of the outlaw's hiding place and thus secure the reward. He, however, conquers his desire because of what the man has done for his child and follows his wife's suggestion that they protect him from the law. C.J.C.

The Fast Mail's Danger—KALEM—JANUARY 23.—Another episode in the "Hazards of Helen" series, in which Helen secures a job for Bob, a down and out engineer. Rankin, Dalmore and Dougherty escape from prison and attempt to enter a telegraph office, but Helen baffles them with a revolver. Rankin climbs a telegraph pole and swings hand-over-hand along the lines until he is directly opposite the window. Catapulting himself forward, he crashes through the window landing in the room. Helen is captured and when her relief appears, they threaten her with death if she warns him of their presence. Helen, however, succeeds in notifying her relief what has happing, by tapping a message on the table with her finger. Leaving Dougherty to guard Helen, Rankin and Dalmore set forth to hold up the fast mail. How the girl frustrates the convicts and brings about their capture is thrillingly shown in the climax of the episode.

Shoddy, the Tailor—LUBIN—JANUARY 23.—Henry Bugg is the only tailor in Riverside. He thinks himself a regular lady killer, and flirts with all the girls who are in love with the police. When the police line up for inspection, the girls all gather to admire them, but fate is kind and one day the chief orders the cops to get their suits pressed. Bugg sees an opportunity for revenge, hides the suits and leaves town. The girls go down to the shop to wait for the police, and a rather embarrassing situation results, but the police finally secure various articles of clothing from a maiden lady in the neighborhood and so make their way back to the station. Bugg finally sends a telegram telling where the suits are, but though he gets his revenge, he is too far away to enjoy it.

The Primitive Way—SELIG—JANUARY 23.—In the latter part of this polite comedy, Bessie Eyton gives an exceedingl delightful portrayal of a spunky society girl. Thomas Santschi, who appears in the leading male role, is a convincing hero who assumes primitive ways in order to win the lady of his heart. Numerous situations which show the manner in which Billy Vaughan learns of the desire of Mildred Manning to marry a primitive man, and the plan he lays to become one and win her occupies the first few hundred feet of the film. As he has formerly worked with a railroad construction gang, he knows the habits of the men of the lower class, and when she meets him on an island, she is finally convinced that he is the kind of a man that she could love. Later he tells her that he is going to marry her and comes to her home, this time, however, being dressed in evening clothes. Angry at his deception, she says she will have nothing more to do with him, but he proves that a man may be primitive, even though he is a gentleman, and forces her to consent to their marriage willingly, despite herself. The interior sets and exterior locations used in the majority of the scenes are praiseworthy. C.J.C.

War—VITAGRAPH—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 23.—The Schultz and Du Bois families keep delicatessen and bakery shops and live in the same apartment house. They are the best of friends until the European war breaks out, when little Johnny Du Bois and Heinie Schultz start a miniature war with their "Hoch the Kaiser" and "Vive la France." The parents are about to enter the conflict, when Fritz Schultz returns from medical college and Marie Du Bois from a hospital where she is a trained nurse. The two meet and fall in love. The youngsters, though, engage in a finish fight in a vacant lot and both of their families are dragged into the contest and after a terrific struggle are separated by their loving son and daughter. The Red Cross knowledge of Fritz and Marie comes in handy, and after all realize their ridiculous patriotism, Marie waves an American flag, and shouts, "First and foremost, we are all good Americans." Hughie Mack and Ethel Corcoran featured.

Three Brothers — Majestic — (Two Reels)—January 10.—Three brothers, Bob, Will and Charlie, are all in love with Mae. Bob, the eldest, is sullen and revengeful, and Mae is afraid of him. Will, the middle brother, is a carefree sort of a youth and Mae falls in love with him. Charlie, the youngest, is deeply in love with the girl, but sacrifices his chances for Will. Shortly after becoming engaged to Mae, Will leaves for the city to establish himself in business. During his absence Charlie saves Mae from Bob's rather violent advances, and Will, hearing of it, sends word home that he is dead—and Mae marries Charlie. Some time later Will returns home to visit Charlie and his mother, intending that Mae shall not learn of his presence, but she meets him. The situation in the last scene suggests a long and hard mental struggle for Mae.

Mother Hulda — Broncho — (Two Reels)—January 13.—Widow Bolden has a step-daughter, Mary, whom she abuses at every opportunity, while she lavishes every kindness on her own daughter, Martha. The widow attempts to sell Mary to a robber chieftain for a bag of gold, but the girl disappears. The fact is, she has been transported to fairyland by way of the old well. Mother Hulda decides that she is just the girl for Prince Charming, as does he when he sees Mary. The girl has a longing to return to her step-mother to let her know that she is all right, but the old woman is as heartless as ever, and, after beating her cruelly, again attempts to sell the girl to the robber. Martha, meanwhile, puts on Mary's clothes and visits fairyland, but the deception is discovered. Mother Hulda comes to Mary's rescue, turns the old widow and Martha into stone, and Mary and the prince become married.

The Cross of Fire—Kay-Bee—(Two Reels)—January 15.—Dupree's faith in prayers fails when his wife dies, and he becomes a blasphemer, renouncing God and even forbidding his little daughter, Fanchette, to attend the May Day festival of the Virgin. That night Fanchette beholds the Holy Mother in a dream, and the next day steals away to the church. During a heavy storm Dupree's cottage is struck by lightning and the father, hurrying home, finds the house in flames. The little girl is not in her room, but on the bed lies a blackened cross. Rushing half-mad through the streets Dupree is attracted to the church by the sound of children singing within. He enters, finds Fanchette among the singers, and falls on his knees, glorifying God.

Pleasing Uncle — Princess — January 15.—Jack's wealthy uncle threatens to cut off the boy's allowance unless he marry and settle down. Jack arranges with his friend George to have the latter's wife, Muriel, pose as his new bride during his uncle's visit. George agrees, and all goes fine until Uncle remarks that if his nephew only had a son he would give him $50,000. The butler is rushed out to find a baby. George tires of parading around as a boarder and decides to play a joke on Jack and Muriel. When Uncle enters the nursery to view the young heir he is greeted by a roomful of infants. This, of course, unravels the whole scheme before Uncle's eyes.

One Flight Up—Reliance—(Two Reels)—January 16.—Alice Reed, a reporter on the Herald, arrives at Dr. Trine's office just in time to see him abducted by a masked man. Alice follows the man and his masked prisoner to a tenement house in which lies a wounded man. The doctor is unmasked and ordered to prescribe for the man. Alice is discovered and captured. She manages to scribble a message to the drug clerk on the prescription and also changes it so that the victim shall be drugged into insensibility. The drug clerk rushes help to Alice. The crooks are captured and the girl lands a big story for her paper.

The Unwilling Bride—Royal—January 16.—A broker, hard pressed for money, makes arrangements for a marriage between his son, Bob, and a wealthy woman, but his proposal is answered by a letter from Bob stating that he is already married. The truth of the matter is that Bob is in love with a banker's daughter, and fears that if his father knew that they were only betrothed he might break the engagement. Bob's room-mate agrees to play the part of his wife and dons woman's clothes. The broker, his son and "wife," and the banker and his daughter all meet at a famous resort. After the first flurry of consternation matters are straightened out to the satisfaction of all.

A Flyer in Spring Water—Komic—January 17.—This is chapter 15 of the "Bill" series. Bill any Izzy hit upon the scheme of filling bottles with water and selling them for spring water. The odor of the water is not exactly springlike, and Bill changes it with the help of Ethel's gift bottle of perfume. One of their customers spills some of the water on his coat, and his wife, becoming suspicious, traces the perfume back to Ethel. She does a little sleuthing and catches the two office boys in the act. Bill loses his job through this venture.

What Might Have Been—Majestic—(Two Reels)—January 17.—At the death of his parents Charlie Jackson is adopted by his Aunt Sarah, a drug fiend and crook, and ten years later is her accomplice in all sorts of raids and robberies. One night Charlie protects Constance Grey, a mission teacher, from a gang of toughs. They become intimately acquainted, and later, sweethearts. Mr. Grey determines to know more about Charlie, and takes a room in Sarah's lodging house. Knowing that he has money, Sarah induces Charlie to rob him. The roomer wakes up and a struggle ensues in which he is killed by Aunt Sarah. Charlie thinks he committed the crime, pleads guilty and is sentenced to be hung. Aunt Sarah is given life imprisonment. A vision of "what might have been" appears to her in her cell and moves her to confess her crime.

A Yellowstone Honeymoon—Thanhouser—January 17.—Jack and May spend their honeymoon in Yellowstone Park, where May is frightened nearly to death by the bears. Jack, however, loves them and spends his spare time in feeding them from his hand. This, of course, keeps them separated, and May, nearly heartbroken at Jack's apparent indifference, hides in a nook near the edge of the canyon and cries. A guide who sees her tells Jack and he loses no time in comforting his little wife and promising never to look at a bear again.

Refining Fires — American — (Two Reels)—January 18.—Mary, a pretty girl, yields to the entreaties of John Alstrom, who loves her, and consents to live with him for a time without a marriage ceremony, since the young man fears that if it is known that he is married he will lose a fortune he has inherited. Later when John tires of her, Mary leaves him and secures employment in Judge Stone's home as a companion to the judge's daughter, Nina. Years later when Nina is loved and wooed by John Alstrom, who has now come into his fortune, Mary decides to warn her benefactor from falling in such a trap as she herself did. As she is about to disclose all her own past and that of Alstrom, she enters the parlor in time to hear John tell Nina, "I am sometimes sad to remember my past sins and vileness and my unworthiness of your love. But, with God's help, I am and will remain a reformed man." Mary, after hearing this, decides to keep her secret and leaves a note for Nina explaining the reason for her departnue and then enters a convent to devote her future life to the services of the church. See review on page 117, this issue.

With Julian Street and Wallace Morgan—(MUTUAL MONOGRAPH No. 1)—RELIANCE — JANUARY 18. — When Julian Street and Wallace Morgan made their trip across the country to write up the various cities and towns, they had experiences without number which are not included in their book, "Abroad at Home." They were recently presented to Our Mutual Girl at a reception, and, as is her custom on meeting famous folks, she asked them to tell her a story which is not in print. The story which they tell, concerning a certain place called Squeedville for convenience, is one which will interest all.

A Girl and Two Boys—BEAUTY—JANUARY 19.—Billy and Jim are friends and rivals, both being in love with Marion. Billy makes a date with Marion for the theater and a dinner afterwards, but at the cafe discovers that Marion has ordered so much that he is unable to pay the bill. Jim entering at that moment, he appeals to him for a loan. Jim declares "I'll not loan you a cent, but I am willing to pay for the supper if you will let me eat it and take Marion home. You fake a 'phone call, pretend you have to leave, and then call me over." The plan works, and Jim takes Billy's place with Marion and after supper takes Marion home in a taxi. The driver then takes Jim to his apartments, where he discovers that he hasn't enough money to pay the driver. He is arrested and taken to the police headquarters from where he appeals to Billy to bail him out. Billy, in fun, 'phones Marion, telling her he is the police judge and that her friend Jim wants her to come down and pay his fine. Marion visits the police station, bails out Jim, takes him home with her and they become engaged much to Billy's despair. Joseph Harris, Webster Campbell and Virginia Kirtley featured. N.G.C.

On the Table Top—MAJESTIC—JANUARY 19.—Jane Delafield is the stenographer for a pair of swindlers, Jason and Hicks. Jack Dean, her sweetheart, tries for a long time, but without success, to find a loophole in the pair's operations and write them up in the paper of which he is a reporter. The swindlers decide to leave town with their ill-gotten gains, and, knowing that Jane is aware of their crooked deals, make her a prisoner. Jason tires of waiting for the second-hand furniture man, Jane's father, who has purchased their office furniture, and writes a note in which he speaks of the girl prisoner. Jack drops into the place to see Jane, and sees on the table the impression of Jason's note. Dean rescues Jane, is the means of capturing the crooks, and secures a beat for his paper.

The Crucifixion of Al Brady—AMERICAN—JANUARY 20.—Mr. Lee, a farmer, quarrels with a neighbor, Sam Jones, in public, and Jones threatens to get even. Later Al Brady, a rather shiftless boy, in love with Stella Dean, is hunting in the woods, and after firing at something he saw move in the brush-wood discovers Mr. Lee dead on the other side of the brush and decides that he has killed him. Al rushes home, confesses to his mother and later to Stella, and in the meantime Mr. Lee is discovered by others and Sam Jones arrested for the murder. When Al finds another man is suffering for the crime, he believes he committed, he is manly enough to give himself up to the sheriff. There he learns that Mr. Lee was killed by a bullet from a revolver instead of a rifle bullet, and that Sam Jones had really confessed the crime. Ed Coxen and Winifred Greenwood featured. N.G.C.

The Still on Sunset Mountain—DOMINO—(TWO REELS) — JANUARY 21. — Jack Baker, a revenue officer posing as a moonshiner, wins Rachel Harper's confidence and then betrays her. Later Baker notifies headquarters of the location of Harper's still, and the revenue officers raid it, capturing Bill, Rachel's brother. Old man Harper and Dave Moore, Rachel's former lover, plan revenge and send Rachel to visit Bill in prison with an outline of their scheme. Baker falls into the trap and is killed by Dave. The final scene shows Harper and Dave pledging each other to keep the secret from Rachel.

A Flurry in Art—KOMIC—JANUARY 24.—While painting a picture of Maisie Gillespie, Harry Gregg, a penniless young painter, falls in love with her and bravely asks her father, a multi-millionaire, for permission to marry her. He flies into a rage and orders Harry from the house. That night two thieves visit the Gillespie home and secure a valuable necklace. Hearing some one moving about the house they slip the jewels between the frame and canvas of Maisie's portrait, and make their escape. Harry decides to auction off his paintings and leave town. Through error Maisie's picture, which has been returned by Gillespie, is put up, and the thieves bid highly against each other for it. When Harry learns that it has been sold he asks the thief to return it, and, on his refusal, tries to wrest it from him. As Maisie and her father arrive at the studio a shot is heard and Harry is found unconscious with the picture enfolded in his arms. A reconciliation takes place and Gillespie gives Maisie and Harry his blessing.

On Dangerous Ground—IMP—JANUARY 18.—Assisted by Harkins, Ned takes money from his father's bank, and speculates with it, losing each time. Williams, the bank's cashier, is in love with his employer's daughter. Ned and his father try to induce the girl to forget him, but she refuses. Fearing that their inroads on the bank's funds will be discovered Ned and Harkins plan to lay the blame of the theft on Williams. One night they attack him. He wrests a pistol from one of the masked men and fires. Ned falls. Harkins then tells Williams that he has murdered his sweetheart's brother, and advises him to leave the country. Williams almost falls into the trap, but at the last moment allows himself to be guided by his conscience, and goes to the banker's home and confesses his "crime." Just then Ned enters, and Williams sees through the trick. Harkins and Ned are arrested, and the cashier is rewarded by receiving the girl's promise of marriage.

The Hicktown Rivals — JOKER—JANUARY 18.—Cud McGiven and Kid Cannot are rivals for the hand of Maggie Ryan. Cud wins her, but the preparations for the marriage are interrupted by Kid and his gang who kidnap the intended bride. Cud attempts to overtake the kidnappers but without success. Kid proposes to fickle Maggie. She accepts him, and they stop at a church and become married.

Father's Three—VICTOR—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 18.—Three bachelors live together in loneliness. Reading of a woman who is unable to support her little daughter, they adopt the child and raise it. Just before Rosemary's eighteenth birthday each of the bachelors propose to her, but she cannot make a choice. She promises, however, that she will accept the one who brings her the most appropriate gift on her birthday. Robert and Henry both buy expensive presents and, of course, Rosemary goes into ecstacies over the beautiful gifts. The trio then look expectantly at Vincent. In answer to their silent question he opens the door and ushers in an old, white-haired woman—Rosemary's mother. The other two bachelors congratulate him on his thoughtfulness, and the whole party celebrates the coming marriage between Vincent and Rosemary.

The Dear Old Hypocrite—Big U—January 19.—Wealthy Uncle George decides to test his only niece, Alice Wilson, and writes a letter stating that he is deaf, homeless, and with only sufficient funds to bring him to her home. Alice and her husband welcome the old man, and take care of him in spite of the hard times. At last they receive notice to move. Alice's father visits them, but refuses to enter when he ses his brother. The girl brings them together, and Uncle George then tells of his test, and presents her with a deed to the cottage.

Smuggler's Island—Gold Seal—(Two Reels)—January 19.—Grace and Francis are engaged, and, naturally, are quite jealous of each other. Grace sees Francis flirting with a girl at the seashore resort at which they are staying, and encourages the attentions of a revenue officer, to make her lover repent his action. One day while standing on the sea shore Grace witnesses an attack on a revenue officer made by a band of smugglers. The men discover her and, fearing that she will tell about what she has seen, abduct her. Francis and the revenue officers take up the pursuit in a motor boat, and, after several thrilling experiences, overtake the smugglers' boat. Francis' heroic act convinces Grace that he is true to her, and the lovers make up their quarrel.

When Cupid Caught a Thief—Nestor—January 19.—Eddie, the reporter, visits Miss Hobby to get a story about her wonderful diamond necklace and Kickamoor ruby on the same night on which Second Story Jerry and his pal visit the house to steal the gems. Ludicrous and embarrassing complications then arise as to the identity of the thief, but in the end Eddie finds out, and turns Jerry and his assistant over to the police.

The Lone Game — Eclair — (Two Reels)—January 20.—Sid Burton, a detective, is summoned from Chicago to help in the capture of a lone bandit who has been terrorizing the citizens in and about Cuga, Ariona. The sheriff welcomes him upon his arrival, and escorts him to his home where he meets and falls in love with Edna, the sheriff's daughter. Shortly after Burton's arrival the express office is held up and the strong box taken. Burton finds the empty box, and hits on a scheme that will cause the bandit to return for it. He advertises for the box's return, stating that it had a false bottom and that the money hidden in the bottom undoubtedly escaped the bandit's notice. The plan works, and Burton is shocked to find that the bandit is none other than the sheriff. In trying to escape the sheriff is thrown from his horse and is mortally injured. He confeses the hiding place of his loot to Burton, and asks him to return it to its owners. The detective is appointed sheriff to succeed the man who played the game alone and lost. He also wins the girl.

Every Inch a Sweetheart—L-Ko—January 20.—The hero is thin and ill-fed, but nevertheless possesses all of the sterling qualities of literary heroes. The villain, be-whiskered and inhuman, attempts to break up the romance between the hero and his gentle sweetheart, but is foiled time after time. In the end the villain falls into his own trap, and the hero receives an open-armed welcome from his sweetheart.

Their Island of Happiness—Big U—(Two Reels)—January 21.—Robert Belden's life of social gayety does not appeal to his plain, home-loving wife, and, after pleading with him in vain, she leaves him to his new found love. Belden's sorrow at finding her gone awakens in him a realization of what a shallow, artificial life he is leading. He deserts his high-life friends and devotes his time exclusively to business. Ten years pass. Helen is now a nurse in the leper's colony in the Philippines. Belden, on a trip around the world, stops at Manila, and Helen learning of his arrival decides to visit him, thus causing him to be detained on the island. By bribing a Chinese fisherman she manages to escape from the island, and makes her way to her husband's room at his hotel, notifying the authorities by telephone where she might be found. Belden is delighted to see her, and relates his many attempts to find her after her leaving. Helen is impressed by his sincerity, and tells the officers, on their arrival, that her husband has not touched her, but he refuses to be separated from her, and they return to the island together.

Six Months to Live—Rex—January 21.—Howard Ellsworth's physician tells him he has but six months to live, and, thinking that cocaine will afford him more pleasure during that time than anything else, the man begins using it. When in the grip of the drug Ellsworth learns that the doctor had diagnosed his case wrong. Intending to murder him he calls on the aged doctor, and finds him a victim of one of his own experiments. Glowing with pride Ellsworth's office boy pulls the last sheet of his story from his typewriter, and presents it to his employer for approval, for it was only a story.

The House of Fear—Imp—(Three Reels)—January 22.—At her rich uncle's death Margaret Irwin inherits his fortune and with it inherits her cousin, Ralph Irwin, as her guardian. One of the terms of the will is that she cannot marry without Ralph's consent, and, in the event of her death, the money will all revert to him. Ralph and his father are dissatisfied with their share of the Irwin fortune, and determine to obtain the rest of it by having Margaret die "from heart failure." Knowing that a severe shock may prove fatal to the heiress they take her to "the house of fear," as the elder Irwin's residence is called by the neighbors, and have Nick, a half-witted, beastly looking fellow who lives with them, scare her. Hobart Henderson, the executor of the Irwin estate, becomes suspicious of Ralph's intentions in having Margaret stay with him and his father, and calls on the girl. Her story confirms his fears, and he decides to have the house watched. Later that night Hobart sees Nick's figure, knife in hand, silhoutted against the curtain. He foils his attempt to kill Margaret, and has Ralph and the uncle arrested. Nick dies from the effects of his fight with Hobart who becomes engaged to Margaret.

And the Deacon Swore—Nestor—January 22.—Alice visits her grandfather who is the minister of a small country church. The deacon holds a mortgage on the church, and, calling on the minister to collect on it, sees Alice and falls in love with her. The minister gives a barn dance and basket social as a means of raising money to pay off the mortgage, and Alice attends, accompanied by Jack. The deacon overhears her tell Jack that she will tie a hair ribbon on her basket, and he determines to buy it at any cost, knowing that its donor will then eat the lunch with him. Mandy, who is deeply in love with the deacon, ties a ribbon on the handle of her basket before handing it in. When it comes time to auction off the baskets Alice and Jack take theirs and steal off. The deacon buys all the baskets in an effort to secure Alice for a partner and, failing, presents his mortgage to the minister for immediate payment. To his chagrin his debtor is able to pay him the whole amount out of the receipts of the basket auction—and the deacon swears.

Ridgeway of Montana—101 Bison—(Two Reels)—January 23.—Waring Ridgeway and Simon Harley are deadlocked in a financial battle. Harley and his young wife become caught in a blizard, and are separated. Ridgeway who is travelling the same way, finds Aline, Harley's wife, and revives her. The woman's husband offers Ridgeway a place at the head of a large and powerful copper concern, but the young engineer refuses, saying that there must be no compromise in their fight. Angered, Harley starts a campaign to crush his rival, beginning by paying one of his men to dynamite one of Ridgeway's mines. One of the miners is killed in the explosion, and Ridgeway has Harley brought to trial for the crime, but the millionaire is acquitted. When the jury brings in the verdict the miner's widow shoots Harley. A year later Ridgeway marries Aline Harley, and Virginia Balfour, a girl whose love for Ridgeway centered only on his wealth, consents to marry Hobart, once the manager of Harley's mines.

The Clue of the Portrait—ECLAIR—JANUARY 24.—William Vernon, a rich cattleman from Chicago, meets Dorothy and her little sister while in the West buying cattle, and is greatly attracted to the elder girl. On his return to Chicago he manages to corner the market, and ruins several ranchmen, one of whom is Dorothy's father. The latter dies of a broken heart, and Dorothy goes to the city to find work. Later Vernon returns to the West to claim his sweetheart, but finds her former home deserted. After a long search in the city he sees a picture of Dorothy's little sister in a shop window and through it is reunited to its painter, Dorothy.

After escaping from him a gentleman crook, who posed as a millionaire, adopted her and sent her to school. When she had grown up to be a young woman he asked her to become an assistant in his life of crime and when she refused attempted to abuse her. In a struggle between them she killed him and escaped to a small town, but the law followed her and she fell into its clutches. Her story completed the case is given to the jury who at once return a verdict "not guilty" and Betty is happily received into the arms of her lover.

General Special

C. O. D.—VITAGRAPH—(FOUR REELS).—Three friends, C. O. Darlington, a traveling salesman, C. O. Drudge, a millionaire, and C. O. Dusenberry, a college professor, leave the city to spend a bachelor holiday, all pleading business engagements to their wives. The wives discover the deception and decide to have a holiday themselves by posing as widows. The train on which the three C. O. D.'s are riding meets with an accident, but all escaped scantily clad. They are all forced to seek shelter in a farm house. The farmer mistakes them for three convicts who are wanted and locks them up while he rushes for the sheriff. The wives arrive at their hotel and make the acquaintance of three young men who invite them to go for an automobile ride. They stop at the Jones farm for dinner, but their husbands see them first and avoid being discovered. The city men establish their identity after their wives have left and proceed to patronize Jones' household, including the farmer's three pretty daughters. They are given the three daughters' rooms for the night after they have bribed Jones. The three wives and their escorts experience a blow-out and are caught in a rain storm. Mrs. Jones, passing in a wagon, takes the wives home. They are also assigned to the three daughters' rooms, the farmer's wife not knowing that her husband had already given the rooms to the city men. The three C. O. D.'s escape when they see their wives and rush to the barn, where they spend the night. In the morning both the wives and husbands find little difficulty in cleverly explaining their presence, and all ends happily.

The Eagle's Nest—LUBIN—(EIGHT REELS).—A man, his wife and their son, Jack, live on a mountain side in the West in the shadow of an eagle's nest. After the father's death three more persons come into their lives, Milford, a business man, Blasedon, his partner, and Rose, his daughter. Jack and Rose fall in love, to the chagrin of Blasedon, who also loves the girl. Because he knows that her father forged some notes, thereby depriving a poor family of a fortune, Blasedon forces the girl to marry him. Before he does this, however, he kills Jack's mother, who tries to protect the girl. Jack is accused of the crime, but escapes and follows Blasedon to the city, where he succeeds in having him sent back to justice. Events follow which prove that the family Milford wronged was Jack's. The boy, however, forgives him and claims Rose as his share of the fortune. A complete review of this production will be found on page 43 of the January 9 issue.

After some difficulty he learns to drive it and calls at the home of a girl who is entertaining a number of college boys on their vacation. The Boob, believing they are all going to a football game in the town, tells them he is entered in the Corona cup races and asks them to come and see him drive. To his surprise and chagrin they cancel the other engagement and accept his offer. Despite all efforts to get out of it, he is forced to appear at the track as the cars line up for the race. The Boob finds the solution before the crucial moment and hires a mechanician to drive in his place. The mechanician in the Boob's car wins and all would have gone well with the Boob had he not forgotten to pay the mechanician the amount promised to drive for him.

The Girl of the Golden West—Lasky—(Five Reels).—"The girl of the golden West" keeps a saloon in a frontier town and is loved by Jack Rance, the sheriff of the county. She protects Ramerrez, a highwayman, from the law and when he is discovered hiding in her cabin by Rance, she plays a game of cards with the latter for the outlaw's life. Later, when Ramerrez attempts to leave the place and is captured by Rance, the "girl" saves him from being hung by recalling the result of the game of cards to Rance. Ramerrez determines to reform and takes the "girl" East with him. A review will be found on page 96 of the January 16 issue.

The Dancing Girl—Famous Players—(Five Reels).—The colorful exteriors of the rocky coast of "The Isle of Endellion" contrast with the rich interiors of the home of the profligate Duke of Guiseberry, under whose patronage the dancing girl lives for a time in this film, and there is the dramatic comparison of the sober life of the grave Quakers on the lonely island with the gay life of London society and the bright Bohemia of the singers and artists, with whom the Quaker girl mingles, when she becomes the favorite of the duke. Perhaps the greatest incident of the play is the famous staircase scene, when Drusilla comes to dance before the duke's own family and declares to her old Quaker father, who comes to take her home, that she wants to be "the topmost rose on the topmost bough." She is crushed by the terrible wrath of a father's curse. Tottering for a moment beneath her father's scourging censure, she faints, and falls the length of the grand staircase, and awakes to consciousness, knowing at last the failure she has made of her life. The tragedy of this is followed by a splendid scene in which occurs the meeting of penitent Drusilla with the nobleman whom her extravagance has ruined, on the lonely coast of Endellion, where both have come to seek death, and where they decide, instead, to rebuild their shattered lives.

Pathe

Close Cropped Clippings—Pathe.—Punctual Pete needs an assistant for his shaving shop. Gertie, almost a soubrette, learns of this and rushes home, where she masters the technique of the tonsorial art via an instruction book. She applies for the job and is hired. From this point on the fun is furnished by her experiments upon the comical characters who stroll into the shop. Finally she catches sight of the bank roll of a "live one" and, after securing it, makes her getaway. On the same reel is:

Mount Dore—Pathe.—This is a scene which shows the grandeur of the country around Mount Dore, France. A historical castle, a calm lake, a far-reaching valley and the ruins of a historical sepulcher are among the many things which are included in the picture.

The Vanishing Jewels—(Third Episode of "The Exploits of Elaine")—Pathe—Two Reels).—Craig Kennedy is summoned to prevent the "Clutching Hand" from robbing a Broadway jewelry store which they threaten to do at noon that same day. Despite Kennedy's presence, the jewel case is dropped into the basement and robbed of its contents and later when Kennedy pursues the thieves he is overpowered and Elaine is carried away by them and imprisoned within a huge boiler. From this Kennedy manages to release her by means of an oxy-acetylene flame with which he cuts a circular section from the top of the boiler and brings the girl to safety just as the rising tide seems sure to cause her death. See review on page 113, this issue.

The Coveted Heritage—Balboa-Pathe—(Three Reels).—An old man, whose child has been stolen years before by gypsies is about to die and, at the making of his will he leaves his fortune conditionally to the two servants, who have cared for him in his declining years. The development of the story showing the whereabouts of the girl, her appearance on the scene, and eventually the plot worked out by the servants to get her out of the way has been done with a goodly sprinkling of sensationalism that is more than interesting. Some excellent examples of double exposure are exhibited in the recital by the old man of the story of the loss of his child. The picture is realistic to a degree, the photographic work throughout is of fine quality, and the action is smooth and of such character as to be a credit to the director, and to the company.

Runaway June—(Episode One)—Reliance—(Two Reels).—January 13.—The wedding of June and Ned takes place and immediately after it June, finding that she is forced to ask her husband for money, runs away from him. She sells her watch to a woman and Gilbert Blye, "the man with the black vandyke," secures it from the woman. June throws both her husband and Blye off her track when they attempt to follow her and reaches the home of friends. Blye sends a card to June saying that should she desire to secure her watch she can get it from him at the address which he gives. A complete review will be found on page 89 of January 16 issue.

Runaway June—(Episode Two)—Reliance—(Two Reels)—January 20.—Ned eventually locates June at the home of her friends and goes there with her parents, but she escapes and returns to her home, where she hastily gathers her clothes together and flees. Ned and June's parents find Blye's card and hurry to his home where, through his wife, they learn that he is at Rector's cafe. All arrive there and find him in the company of a soubrette and Orin Cunningham. He disowns his wife and starts off, presumably in pursuit of June. The others enter another taxi and follow him. Review will be found on page 89 of the January 16 issue.

United—Warners

The Blonde Lady—A. C. A. D.—(Three Reels).—An adventuress plans to win a position and a fortune for herself at the same time and causes a young count to fall in love with her. To rid herself of the count's wife she has one of her male confederates visit the wife in her apartments and has the count find them there. The confederate forcibly embraces the count's wife, but the count believes that the woman is unfaithful to him and sues for divorce. His father-in-law and an old crony take an interest in the affair at this time and their investigation leads to a disclosure of the truth. The count and his wife are reconciled and the adventuress and her confederate are arrested.

Lost in London—Warner's—Daisy, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Westbury, has her forehead injured and when she has recovered is sent out with her nurse to play in the park, as a reward for her bravery during her illness. Through the maid's carelessness she becomes lost and is found by Charlie Brooks' parents and adopted into his family. They grow up as brother and sister. One night when they run away to attend a theater they are sent from the house by Charlie's father. Daisy secures work as a model for an artist named Anderson, who is in love with Olga Westbury, Daisy's sister, though neither of them know it. Olga manages to separate them, and Daisy goes on the stage, where she becomes a famous dancer. Again Anderson is attracted to her and their love is sincere until Olga again separates them by telling Anderson that Charlie is Daisy's sweetheart. Later Daisy is run down by an automobile and while Dr. Westbury is attending her he recognizes the scar on her forehead. She is taken home and when Olga sees that she has wronged her own sister, she steps aside and allows Anderson to become engaged to Daisy. Charlie, who has never felt anything but brotherly affection for Daisy, is best man at the wedding.

Retrieving the Past.—A. C. A. D.—(Three Reels).—A wealthy banker is assisted in his office by an old clerk and by his own son. The latter lives a fast life and keeps company with the clerk's daughter. When he spends his entire salary, he is forced to steal from his father's safe in order to pay his bills. The father learns of the incident from the old clerk and is forced to suspect his son. In company with the old clerk, the father traces the boy and they find him and the girl together in the young man's apartment. The clerk at once resigns and leaves for a country town with his daughter. The banker forgives his son, but the latter fears that the clerk will attempt to blackmail him, because of a letter which the girl has in her possession. He goes to the country town and in trying to steal the letter seriously injures the girl. His sympathy for her is aroused and he asks her to become his wife, thus righting the wrong which he had committed.

Universal Special

The Master Key—(Episode Eight)—Universal—(Two Reels).—Dore is arrested for the death of Pell as a matter of form and while Everett goes to arrange his bail Ruth is left in charge of Kane. From him she learns of tthe trouble at the mine. Wilkerson and Mrs. Darnell learn of Dore's arrest and plan to kidnap Ruth and thus secure the papers. They send a message stating that Dore wishes to see her at the jail and that a taxi will call for her. Kane, however, goes with her and foils them in their plan to capture the girl, one of their number being arrested but the three leaders escaping. An ashman finds the deeds while working in the alley and puts an advertisement in the paper to find the owner. Through a deception the plotters secure them and Dore, Ruth and Everett arrive at his home too late. Ruth's health breaks down and she is forced to go to the southern part of the state. With her friends she leaves on the same steamer which carries her enemies away from the scene of their crime but as they are disguised she does not recognize them.

The Master Key—(Episode Nine)—Universal—(Two Reels)—Ruth, Dore and Kane arrive in Los Angeles and go to the hotel to rest a few days. Wilkerson and Mrs. Darnell discover that they cannot claim the mine until they secure a conveyance of property but decide to seize the property and send a representative there to carry out their orders. Ruth meets an Englishman at the hotel and while she does not become infatuated with him, she flirts with him and this causes a coolness to spring up between her and Dore. Dore learns of the trouble at the mine, through Kane, whom he has repaid and sent back to the territory with money borrowed from Everett. He hurries to the mine with Ruth and gathers his followers about him. The plotters and a band of Mexicans attack the mine and a fierce battle takes place. In a hand to hand fight Dore hurls Wilkerson over a trestle and fears he has killed him but is unable to tell because of the gathering darkness.

World

Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch and Lovey Mary—California—(Five Reels). Before marriage Mr. and Mrs. Wiggs are employed as servants to Colonel Vanderhurst. The colonel has disinherited his son Jack for marrying a circus girl, and later Jack's child is left an orphan by the death of her parents. She is taken care of by her mother's sister, the wife of the ill-tempered circus manager, who also secures her mother's locket containing the portraits of herself and her husband, also their wedding certificate. A strike at the works, where Mr. Wiggs is employed, brings hardships to their family of five. Bob, the step-son of Murphy, manager of the works, helps the Wiggs family. Through the influence of Stephen, Murphy's nephew, Bob is discharged and eventually becomes a successful attorney. Mr. Wiggs leaves home in search of work, meets Lovey's Mary's uncle, the circus proprietor and is engaged by him as ring master. Colonel Vanderhurst repents having disowned his son and a few years later makes out his will in Lovey Mary's favor. As she cannot be found an advertisement is inserted in the paper and when Mary's uncle sees this he plans to substitute his own daughter for her. Wiggs falls in love with one of the circus performers named Cordelia, by whom he has a child named Tommy. Mary loves little Tommy, through her mother's instinct and runs away from the circus, taking him, her mother's locket and the wedding certificate with her. Her uncle pursues her, but she is rescued by Bob who takes her home and gives her shelter for the night. In the morning the uncle is about to kidnap her when she again escapes and boards a freight car which carries her to the cabbage patch of Mrs. Wiggs. Her uncle again follows her and kidnaps her, and takes the wedding certificate, leaving Tommy, who is wearing the locket. The uncle then presents his daughter as the colonel's heir, but the lawyers representing the estate doubt it. Bob being the junior partner of the firm when Mary disappeared. Mrs. Wiggs discovers the locket and recognizes the portraits of her old master's son and his wife and when Bob learns of this, his suspicions are confirmed. Murphy discovers that Stephen's books are wrong and Stephen fearing discovery of his crooked work, robs the safes and escapes turning the suspicion upon Bob. After the wedding of Hazy, one of Mrs. Wigg's daughters, Stubbins, her husband, drunk, is put on a freight car by the neighbors. He wanders back to town and sees Stephen's crooked work. Bob, in disguise, follows Mary's uncle to a gambling den where he has hidden the girl and in a desparate struggle rescues her, as they are about to murder her, and takes her back to Mrs. Wiggs. Bob and Murphy have had a quarrel and when Murphy dies of the wounds inflicted by Stephen, Bob is arrested. Stubbins' evidence clears Bob, however, and Bob and Mary discover they are in love. They decide to get married and adopt little Tommy, while Wiggs, who arrives in town with the circus, is persauded to return to his wife, Mary agreeing to say nothing about Cordelia.

The Deep Purple — Peerless — (Five Reels).—Leland, the leader of a band of crooks, attempts to swindle the congregation in a New England town by purporting to be a salesman for an organ company. On this mission he meets Doris Moore, the daughter of the village minister, and is attracted by her beauty. He pleads with her to elope to New York with him and she does so. Will Lake, in the meantime, returns to New York after a successful mining venture in the West. Leland sees a way to make use of Doris and manages to place Lake and her in a compromising position and then attempts to blackmail Lake by threatening to cause a scandal in case he does not settle for cash. Laylock and "Frisco Kate," although they are hardened crooks refuse to assist in the dragging down of the innocent girl and oppose the operations of Leland and his gang. Lake is robbed and bound in a room, but is released by Laylock and Kate. The three then secure the assistance of the police and manage to track down the crooks. Lake discovers that he is in love with Doris; Laylock and Kate also decide to get married.

Your Girl and Mine—Selig—(Eight Reels).—Ben Austin, marries Rosalind Fairlie, an heiress. After her wedding Mrs. Austin finds that the law compels her to settle her husband's debts, that the law makes her home his, to do with as he likes, that the law permits him to will away his children and place them under the guardianship of his father. Mrs. Austin has an Aunt Jane, who is an ardent suffragett, and eventually the latter induces Mrs. Austin and thousands of her sisters to work for the cause of suffrage, pointing out that that is the only way in which their rights under the law can be protected. The closing scenes of the eight-reel picture show the governor signing the bill which gives votes to women, and Lieutenant Governor Burbank tendering the pen, with which the governor has signed the bill, to Mrs. Austin, now divorced, with the suggestion that it be used to sign their marriage contract. During the action of the film story such problems as child labor, tenement house fire escapes, and an eight hour day for women and children are vividly presented and suffrage cleverly suggested as a remedy for these present day evils. The Vision of the Shepherd

Production Directed by COLIN CAMPBELL

This is a particularly beautiful story, the characters in which are admirably portrayed by KATHLYN WILLIAMS, WHEELER OAKMAN, FRANK CLARK, EUGENIE BESSERER, etc. It's a pastoral story in which the heroine becomes infatuated with a rich young man from the city and runs away from her old parents to join him there. He attempts to perpetrate a mock marriage, but his plans are defeated. Old Jacob, her father, has a wonderful vision of the Savior and is directed where to search for and bring back to the fold, his missing lamb. The acting is artistic and all of the pathos and dramatic points are strikingly delineated. Scenario by Malcolm Douglas.

"The Twenty Million Dollar Mystery"

REVIEWED BY NEIL G. CAWARD

WITH episode ten Zudora becomes "The Twenty Million Dollar Mystery," by which title it will be known in the future. Also in episode ten one meets again such old friends among the players as Sidney Bracy and Frank Farrington, who will be well remembered from "The Million Dollar Mystery" serial, and in addition is introduced to Morgan Niblack, who, in the role of "Mr. Bruce," a smuggler, seems likely to have a great deal to do with the further development of the plot.

All the sliding panels, underground passages, unique conveyances for passing from one floor to another and the general atmosphere of mystery, cunning and danger, which pervaded so many episodes of "The Million Dollar Mystery," is again evident, for the home of Madam Duval into which followers of the story were first introduced in episode nine, previously described, one finds to be a perfect network of ingenious contrivances for the secret entrances and exits of the various crooks and criminals, now so busily engaged in plotting against Zudora.

Bruce, the smuggler, secures the jewels for Madame Duval.

Madame Duval receives visitors.

The story of the tenth episode begins aboard an Atlantic liner, and one sees Mr. Bruce, a smuggler, carefully pour out from the handle of his cane, which is hollow, a number of diamonds, which he secured from the Zudora mine, and which are to be smuggled past the customs officers upon his arrival in New York City. One sees him lift his berth and in the base-board of his state room, hollow out a little receptacle into which he tucks the chamois skin bag full of diamonds, then closing up the cache and repainting the base-board, so that it defies the closest scrutiny.

Meanwhile at the home of Madame Duval, Captain Radcliffe appears and is informed of the plans under way for keeping the Zudora mine from its real owner. Mr. Bruce, upon landing, goes through the custom house, and at once visits a lonely structure on a deserted street, where he descends to the basement and by a subterranean passage arrives underneath the home of Madame Duval, steps onto a cleverly contrived elevator and has himself lifted to the parlor floor, making his entrance into the living room from a secret panel in the wall. He is warmly greeted by the conspirators and also told of Zudora's ignorance that she is owner of the mine.

It later develops, however, that Zudora, by means of papers and documents found in a box rescued from Hassan Ali's home, at the time it was destroyed by fire, learns that her father had willed her his entire fortune, including the mine, and with this paper and accompanied by Jim Baird, a reporter, she goes to consult Tom Hunt, a noted detective. Mr. Hunt agrees to assist her in re-claiming her fortune.

From that time on events move swiftly and one is thrilled by the capture and subsequent rescue of Jim Baird, and such clever scenes as the one aboard the liner when Mr. Bruce starts back for Europe, and has Madame Duval call upon him in his state room for the purpose of conveying to her the diamonds he has so carefully concealed in the little hollow made in the base board of his state room, just beneath his berth. He transfers the jewels to her and as the film closes, she carefully stows them away in a secret hiding place in her apartment.

Pathe Enlarging All Branches

Owing to the extension of business and new plans shortly to be carried out, the Pathe offices have been moved to 25 West Forty-fifth street, New York City. At that address are now located not only the head offices of the Pathe Exchange, Inc., but also those of Pathe Freres, which have been moved over from Jersey City.

The big studios in Jersey City are, of course, not to be discontinued, but are busier than ever because of the making of the big serial, "The Exploits of Elaine," and several other features which will be printed and published by Pathè.

The motion picture newspaper, the Pathe News, remains located in Jersey City, where special extensions have been added to insure a most efficient service. A special factory installation has also been made where nothing but the Pathe News will be printed in the future.

The big factory in Bound Brook, N. J., is working night and day at full capacity, not only on the regular Pathe pictures, but also on the work of a number of other concerns which have their printing done by Pathè. A large addition to this factory building is seriously contemplated, in view of the full weekly program of about 30 reels to be put out before long by Pathè.

The Selig Polyscope Company was one of the first to introduce a motion picture studio in California, about seven years ago.

Beecroft General Manager of Centaur

After serving in the capacity of advertising manager of the Centaur Film Company for several months, Chester Beecroft has been promoted to the position of general manager of the same concern by David Horsley.

Mr. Beecroft is one of the best known publicity men in the film game and his friends are stretched from coast to coast. He served as advertising manager of the General Film Company and as publicity director for the Patents Company and the originality of the "copy" he prepared attracted universal attention.

With the advent of the Mina films Mr. Beecroft became their advertising and publicity man and within the short time that they have existed he has made them more than popular. It is expected that he will assume his new duties at once and though they will keep him busy it is thought that he will find time now and then to dip his pen into the advertising ink and "put over" some more of the copy for which he is famous.

Lubin Director Turns Pugilist

Joe Kaufman, one of the directors at the Lubin studio, has battled Willie Houck, the rugged little Philadelphia lightweight fighter, but it is generally admitted that the most important element in the bout they fought last week at the Lubin plant was a motion picture camera.

Kaufman is making a comedy called "The Millinery Man," and is playing the leading role himself. One of the scenes called for a gymnasium set and a boxing match between the leading man and a regular professional, and Kaufman sent for Willie Houck, who recently fought a thrilling battle with Johnny Kilbane, the featherweight champion.

Kaufman is ninety per cent actor and ten per cent fighter. With Houck the conditions are exactly the reverse. Kaufman says he won the bout, as he struck the most blows; Tommie Keenan of the Olympic

Joe Kaufman and Willie Houck in scene from Lubin's "The Millinery Man."

A. C., who refereed, declared the affair a draw; while Houck announced that any old decision suited him as long as no one said he was a "bum" actor.

The Favorite Players have closed a contract with Miss Neva Gerber to play opposite Carlyle Blackwell in "The High Hand."

A "Different" Melodramatic Production

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

FOR a long time the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company has been producing artistic subjects which will relieve the picture patrons who have become weary of the "straight melodrama" and, at the same time, satisfy the wants of those who desire that style of entertainment. Its release of February 5, entitled "Third Hand High," belongs to this class.

Its theme is melodramatic and in its action is not exceedingly unusual, but the camera effects which are achieved and the unique method used in disclosing the denouement of the story lift it out of the ordinary and place it in the class which is mentioned above. Added to this are several delightful bits of acting, E. H. Clavert, Sydney Ainsworth and Ruth Stonehouse being the chief contributors in this line.

The plot is unfolded something on the order of a magazine story—perhaps because it originally appeared in the Smart Set—and while it must be admitted that at times this is liable to prove confusing on the screen, it is, nevertheless, something new and in this case does not tend to mutilate the interest. This allows the springing of a surprise toward the climax by covering up some of the plot incidents earlier in the story, and in this picture the return of a man, who has apparently been killed is very cleverly handled.

The settings in the city home are rich and in the cabin realistic. There are very few exteriors. The photography throughout is clear and the lighting effects are such that they vie with the results obtained by the clever manipulation of the camera. The players who assist the leads are Richard C. Travers, Royal Douglas and Bryant Washburn. The acting of all is fully up to the standard which has established them as public favorites and they do all that is required in a finished way.

The quarrel between Trevor, McArdle and Goodman.

The story opens with a scene in the cabin of George and Will Trevor, two brothers who are prospecting in Australia. The former has just lost his wife and the men are left alone to care for the little baby girl. Will receives a letter from his wife, in which she asks him to come to her, as she is lonely. George realizes that he will be unable to give the proper attention to his little girl, and asks Will to take her with him and raise her in civilization. When his brother goes away George is left alone, but immediately sets to work, devoting all his time to making a fortune in order to provide his little girl with luxuries when she grows up.

McArdle, posing as Trevor, forbids the marriage of Constance and Drayton.

Twenty years pass. One day, just before Trevor is about to pay his daughter Constance a visit for the first time, he receives two callers in his cabin. They are McArdle and Goodman, bushmen, who have heard that he is wealthy and are determined to rob him. They coax him into a card game and when he finds one of them cheating, a pistol battle follows, in which Trevor is shot down. The bushmen find that Trevor has deposited his money in his daughter's name, and leaving Trevor for dead, start for America, where McArdle pretends to be the girl's father, while Goodman tries for her hand, in order to get her money.

The girl is already betrothed to Penfield Drayton, but McArdle frowns upon the match and forbids Drayton the house. Goodman makes love to Constance, but she spurns him. McArdle in a rage forces Constance and her widowed aunt to go to the girl's room, where he locks them in, declaring they will stay there until Constance consents to wed Goodman.

Constance hands a note to a lineman at work on a telephone pole just outside her window. He takes it to Drayton, who calls the police and hurries to the house. Trevor, however, proves to be only wounded. He recovers and hurries to America, arriving at his daughter's home just before Drayton reaches it with the police. He surprises the two bushmen in the drawing room. There is a fierce battle. Goodman is about to shoot Trevor, when Drayton and the police arrive. The bushmen are arrested. Drayton releases Constance and her aunt and the girl finds her real father; he agrees to her marriage with her sweetheart.

Selznick Discusses Feature Pictures' Future

The day of the feature picture has only just dawned and the future will see more and better multiple reel features than anyone today dreams of. That is briefly the opinion of Lewis J. Selznick, vice president and general manager of the World Film Corporation, expressed in an interview granted to a representative of MOTOGRAPHY in Chicago on Tuesday, January 19.

Lewis Selznick.

Mr. Selznick arrived in Chicago on Monday and spent that day and the one following in many conferences and consultations with various big men in the film industry, in talks with district and branch managers, and in a perusal of innumerable reports which had been prepared for his scrutiny. From Chicago he left for a brief tour of other World film branch offices throughout the middle west and then expects to return direct to New York City.

A mysterious smile was the only answer Mr. Selznick cared to give to a question relating to the particular significance of his trip at this time, though he later admitted that it related to a big plan he has in mind, and the details of which he hopes to be ready to announce shortly after his return to New York.

Asked point blank as to whether there was any truth in the rumor that an effort was under way to consolidate another big program with the present World Film Corporation, Mr. Selznick would neither affirm or deny the story, but did go so far as to say that consolidation between the big programs was sure to take place within the next few months, possibly weeks. He declared that big capitalists of Wall Street were ready to back a gigantic consolidation of the really big feature programs and predicted that, following his return to New York City, a story would be given out which would surprise the whole industry.

Speaking of the feature films of the future, Mr. Selznick gave it as his opinion that more costly productions than anything the world has yet seen will be offered. He mentioned casually that "The Pit," a recent release on the World program, cost in the neighborhood of $60,000 to produce, but hinted that the future would see many releases on the high class feature programs costing in the neighborhood of $100,000 or more apiece.

While in Chicago Mr. Selznick signed contracts whereby he secures the American rights to "Salambo," the nine reel feature picture made at the Pasquali studios, and which has been lauded so highly abroad. It will be given a private advance showing in New York and Chicago within a few weeks at most.

The profit sharing plan recently inaugurated by Mr. Selznick in the various World film offices throughout the country proved the theme of a lengthy discussion and the vice president of the World Corporation described in detail its workings and the results it seems likely to achieve. It is his firm belief that profit sharing is the basis upon which all successful business enterprises of the future will be based, and he thinks that each employee of every concern should share in the increased earnings which his or her activities bring about. The larger the share of the profit distributed among the employees the greater the profit of the firm itself, asserts Mr. Selznick, and therefore the greater the prosperity of the firm. He therefore argues that the firm to first realize the importance of securing the greatest co-operation of its employees, will be the firm which in the long run is sure to rise superior to all others.

United's Cable Address Causes Trouble

Rigorous account kept of all cablegrams sent to cities of the belligerent nations by non-combatant governments has resulted in the confiscation of twenty or more under-ocean messages sent by the United Film Service to its London office. The cable address of the United Film Service is "Warfeature," a contraction of the term Warner's Features, by which the United Film Service was known before it augmented the scope of its productivity in placing on the market daily single and double reel releases as well as feature films.

The censors, trained to seize upon anything in the least related to the war, in strict and primitive adherence to their instructions evidently placed the United Film Service's cable address on its proscribed list and filed away or destroyed messages intended for the London office. J. A. McKinney, general manager of the United Film Service, has made preparations to place the matter before the Washington government and secure a release of the pigeon-holed cablegrams.

Photoplayers Hold Election

At the last meeting of the Photoplayers Club of Los Angeles, Del Henderson was elected president, succeeding Fred Mace, who is now in the South. William D. Taylor was chosen first vice-president, Henry Walthall second vice-president and Wallace Reid secretary-treasurer. Otis Turner, Al W. Filson, Carlyle Blackwell, George Melford, J. C. Epping, Douglas Gerrard, David Kirkland, George Siegman and Fred Kley are the men who compose the new board of directors.

According to a recent report by Consul William H. Gale, Colon, films for cinematographs, imported into Panama and destined to be re-exported, are exempt from customs duty.

A Strong Subject from American's Studio

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

HEREDITARY insanity and the price paid by a doctor for allowing himself to be "bought," forms the basic elements around which the two-reel release of the American Film Manufacturing Company for January 25, entitled "Silence," revolves.

The fortunes of a family are followed through three generations as the story gradually leads up to the climactic incidents. During the opening scenes the squalid poverty in which a miser, the representative of the first generation of the Morris family, lives is vividly portrayed by means of realistic settings. In direct contrast to this picture of the gloomy side of life are the wonderful scenes on a golf link and on a little lake, when the boy of the third generation courts the daughter of the family doctor, the man whose silence has been purchased. These scenes, reflecting beautiful California in all its glory, are exceptional even for the ever artistic American films and will draw more than one expression of admiration wherever shown.

The doctor's daughter grieves over her husband's actions.

The story itself, while tragic throughout, furnishes numerous dramatic situations which are rather fresh and which afford the players an opportunity for some strong dramatic acting. Ed Coxen, Winnifred Greenwood, George Field and Josephine Ditt have the principal parts and their work is free from criticism. Mr. Coxen especially has a difficult part, that of a young man who has inherited mental trouble, but manages to draw his character in an unoffensive manner. Mr. Field is given a splendid opportunity when he is placed in the situation wherein the doctor, the character he creates, learns of the marriage of his daughter to the boy whose mental condition he had concealed from the world. Assisted by Miss Ditt, Mr. Field makes this one of the most impressive scenes in the film.

Frank Morris, Jr., shows the first signs of insanity.

At the opening of the story the first member of the Morris family to show signs of insanity is seen hoarding his fortune in the basement of his shabby dwelling. His wife takes sick and dies through neglect and starvation, and Frank, his son, determines that he shall some day enjoy life as other boys do. When the boy grows old enough to know his own will, his inherited greed for money causes him to take the life of his father. With the coveted gold he buys his wife from her greedy father. The spectre of his dead father soon drives him to distraction and causes him to take his own life.

His son is reared in a home of luxury, but through his veins courses the tainted blood of his parent. The doctor, called to minister to the dying parent, learns of the hereditary traits of the boy, but permits his silence to be purchased. A unique effect is introduced at this point. When the boy's mother offers to buy the doctor's silence a bag of money is faded in; when the doctor refuses, two bags appear, and so on until four have been offered him. Then he abandons his scruples.

In later years the doctor's daughter becomes the sweetheart of Frank Morris, Jr., the boy. The remonstrances of the parents only cause the elopement of the lovers, after a summer courtship at a resort.

Time passes with no startling developments until the disease-laden mind of the young husband precipitates a tragedy at his own fireside. The maid's hurried call for the doctor brings the conscience stricken father to the home of his daughter just as the son-in-law is being taken away, a raving maniac. The father views the cold limp form of his daughter and realizes that he has paid the price for having permitted his better judgment to be stifled by the sight of gold. The old adage, "the sins of the fathers shall be visited upon the children," which he considered when he was tempted, recurs to him and he realizes its great truth. The climax is strong and convincing and is carefully handled via the cut-back system, the actual attack of the insane man upon his wife not being shown.

Two Strong Cosmofotofilm Subjects

The first thing that impresses one on viewing "The Black Spot" is that it has a strong and original plot. With a foundation such as this and a talented group of artists building upon it the finished play can be nothing short of excellent—nor is it. The climax comes just as the right moment, and the outcome is so unlooked for that one will not soon forget it. Spectators as a class may or may not like to be fooled, but in any case they will all like this picture because it leaves the obvious distinctly alone, and emphasizes the mysterious in a way that is sure to arouse interest.

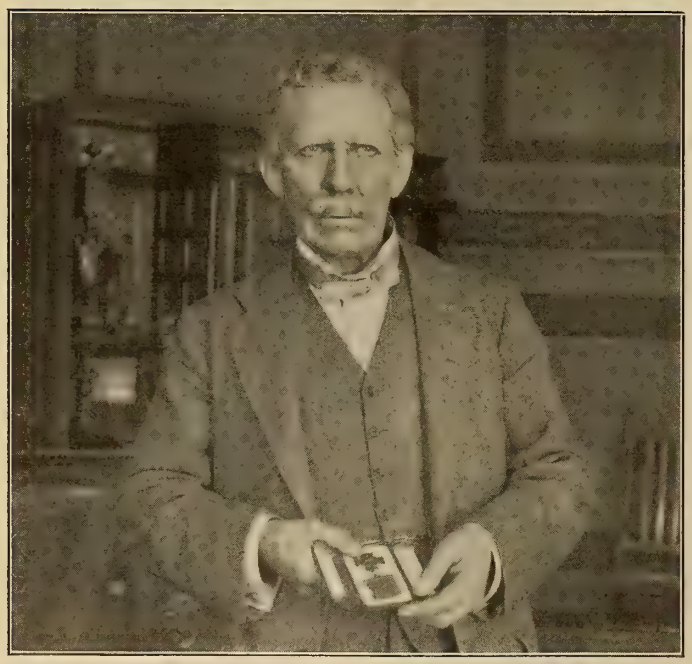
Another four-reel feature is being released by the Cosmofotofilm Company. The story is by John Alwin, and it was filmed by the London Film Company under the direction of George Loane Tucker. The cast is a large one and contains Charles Rock as Professor Scerloff; Jane Gail as his daughter, Olga; Stella St.



Scene from Cosmofotofilm's "The Victoria Cross."

Audrie as his wife; Arthur Holmes Gore as the Grand Duke Paul and also as Serge Malkow, a dual role which he handles most cleverly; Gerald Ames as Captain Drouky; and Frank Shanmore, who brings with him the only laughs in the play, as the Grand Duke's secretary.

To produce a mediocre picture and call it "The Victoria Cross" would seem like a sacrilege, but the London Film Company need have no fears about committing this crime. Its three-reel film of this name now being released by the Cosmofotofilm Company is fully worthy of its title, and has sterling quality in every foot.

There is not an adverse criticism that can be made of it. The members of the cast are well chosen for type and their work pronounces them capable and convincing; the photography is without a blemish and tastily tinted; the settings are in strict accordance with the atmosphere and time of the play; and the story is consistent, unconventional, and has a strong punch in its ending which shuns entirely the "happily ever afterward" class. Humor plays but little part in the situations, tragedy being the dominating note.

Anne and Bannister Merwin are the authors of the play, and Harold Shaw produced it. Ben Wilson plays the part of Charles Oldwood; Charles Rock, the part of Colonel Oldwood; Gwynne Herbert, that of the latter's wife; Edna Flugrath, the part of Alice Bilson; and Douglas Munro, the role of the moneylender, Mr. Bilson.

A brief story of "The Victoria Cross" will be found in the synopsis section of this issue. "The Black Spot" appeared in synopsis form on page 80 of the January 9 issue.

Pathe Executive Gives Interesting Views

In view of the general interest taken in the announced plans of Pathè to enlist the co-operation of other able producers in order to put out a complete program of some 30 reels and to give joint publicity to these producers, Felix Malitz, vice-president and managing director of Pathè, was asked to give his views as to what he considered the biggest essential in the producing end of the business today. Mr. Malitz's views are interesting and show a keen analysis of conditions.

"It is very evident," he said, "that a considerable number of film producers have devoted themselves to getting out quantity and that quality in their product has consequently been sacrificed. Perfection is rarely if ever attained in a picture that is hastily made, and thus producers are compelled very often to dispose of their negatives at a very low price. This could be avoided if more care, time and attention were used and this extra trouble would bring a very much better remuneration.

"The scenario writer who writes say five stories a week produces work that in the majority of instances shows the marks of haste. The producer, in his turn, striving to turn out two pictures a week has to sacrifice much to his speed, and the consequence is that often his product is a total loss. Time is absolutely essential to quality, and quality brings its reward not only in money but in fame.

"The scenario authors, producers and manufacturers who offer to the public pictures of quality will survive. This the house of Pathè has always believed and there appears no reason why this belief should be altered. In fact, we could not, for it is as much a part of us as is the name Pathè."

Clutching Hand Threatens Kennedy's Life

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

LIQUID air forms the latest modus operandi of the Clutching Hand, the scientific criminal who is featured in the Pathe serial "The Exploits of Elaine."

Craig Kennedy, the internationally famous detective assisting Elaine Dodge, in eluding the plots of the Clutching Hand to obtain a paper, for which he murdered her father, is able, however, not only to protect his client, but foil an attempt of the Clutching Hand to assassinate him.

The thrills and sensational plots and counter-plots shown in the fourth episode of the exciting serial are fully up to the standard of those explained and depicted in previous installments of the story, while the increased bookings of the film itself seem to indicate that exhibitors in the Chicago territory in particular are much impressed with the strength of this serial as a drawing card.

Craig's visitors are shown the seismograph.

Episode Four opens with a love scene, it now being evident that Craig Kennedy has fallen head over heels in love with Elaine Dodge. Later, Elaine receives a package which the butler tells her arrived from Craig Kennedy, and she places it in a novel safe, which has just been installed in her home to take the place of the one wrecked in episode three by the Clutching Hand.

The Clutching Hand examines the safe.

Shortly after placing the bundle in the safe, Elaine is amazed to discover that the steel is icy cold to the touch and seems to be sweating. Kennedy, who happens to call her on the telephone, is advised of the strange happening, and hastens to tell her that he sent no package to her.

Calling upon her almost immediately, Kennedy is shown the strange behavior of the safe, and, realizing that delay will endanger their lives, makes haste to get both Elaine and others of her household out of the room—and just in time, for a moment or two later the safe is wrecked by a dull explosion and falls apart, Kennedy explaining that the package contained liquid air, and the action of this element had caused the wrecking of the safe.

Kennedy explains the action of the liquid air.

Upon returning to his apartments, which Kennedy occupies jointly with his friend Jamieson, Kennedy displays to his friend a seismograph, which has been installed in a panel in the hallway just outside the entrance and which registers on its continually moving tape the footsteps of anyone entering the room. Kennedy explains he has installed it to learn whether anyone besides himself ever makes use of the apartment and Jamieson is much interested in its workings.

In the absence of Kennedy the Clutching Hand has himself delivered to Kennedy's apartment in a huge cabinet, and after the expressmen have uncrated the box and departed, the Clutching Hand emerges, carefully explores the room, and noting a picture of Elaine Dodge, which hangs over Kennedy's desk, arranges a sawed-off shot-gun in the fire place in such a fashion that a wire extending from it runs to the cord from which the picture is suspended, and is sure to cause the gun to be exploded if anyone so much as touches the picture.

His plan to kill Kennedy thus arranged, the Clutching Hand re-enters the packing case, after signalling to the expressmen to again call for the cabinet, and a short time later is carried away by the same men who delivered him to the Kennedy apartment.

Later, when Kennedy, accompanied by Elaine Dodge and a girl friend of hers, arrives at the entrance of the Kennedy apartment, Kennedy shows them the seismograph concealed in the panel and is amazed to discover by its record that someone has entered his rooms.

Preventing his visitors from entering, Kennedy, alone, explores the chambers, and at last discovers that some one has moved Miss Dodge's picture. He is instantly suspicious, and by using a long fishing pole manages to so manipulate the picture that it explodes the weapon.

All danger then past, Kennedy invites his visitors to enter and explains to them in detail the trap arranged for him by the Clutching Hand, but which he has so cleverly foiled. At this point the exciting story ends, to be continued in another episode.

"The Power Behind the Animated"

By Captain Leslie T. Peacocke.

From East to West, from pole to pole, he scours all the earth; for the mighty Universal he secures all things of worth for the Animated Weekly which now everywhere is shown, give credit to its brainy head, our genial Jack Cohn. He's a hustler, he's a hustler, he is tried and proven true, and he gives us more live topics than the other weeklies do.

Jack Cohn.

When Jack Cohn puts on his thinking cap he never thinks in vain, and he's planted operators in a never-ending chain, who record each daily happening and film them for us, and Jack Cohn makes up a program which is gay and humorous. He studies all exhibitors, he knows their likes and tastes, from the launching of a cruiser to the latest style in waists.

He shows us fierce-fought battles from the various seats of war, he gives us baseball matches and all other games galore, he shows us how a battleship is blown up in the air, and the latest way the ladies have of doing up their hair. He gives us views of presidents and kings upon the throne, all come as fish into the nets laid daily by Jack Cohn.

"It's No Laughing Matter"

Can you imagine Macklyn Arbuckle as a village postmaster, poet, town cut-up, hen-pecked husband, and philosopher, and wearing spectacles that sit on the end of his nose, a vest that seldom has its top button buttoned and never any of the others, while woolen socks which are prone to gather about his ankles, shoes whose two top hooks are never in use, a seedy suit of clothes, and a wide-brimmed straw hat which has no especial front or back? If so, you have an exact picture of how he, as Hi Judd, looks in "It's No Laughing Matter," a four-part Bosworth feature written and directed by Lois Weber; if not, you should see the picture, as it is a treat not to be passed over lightly.

Pictures such as this are the kind exhibitors and manufacturers have in mind when they tell the censorship board that they are luxuries. There is not an objectionable feature in it, and it presents comedy in a way that is a remarkable character study and appeals to nothing but one's finer artistic sense. There is a touch of pathos in the story, coming near the end and creating a situation which is dispelled by the climax.

No end of praise is due Macklyn Arbuckle for the manner in which he makes Hi Judd everybody's friend and favorite, spectators included. Cora Drew plays the part of Mrs. Judd, the scrupulously neat housewife who has no patience with Hi's poetic inclination and good-natured negligence. Myrtle Stedman is exceedingly clever as Bess Judd, and possesses a disposition exactly the opposite of that of Jim Skinner (Charles Marriott), who was never known to smile at anything but money. To Adele Farrington falls the only melancholy role in the cast, that of the Widow Wilkins, and to Frank Elliott the part of Sam, the heart-breaking city sport.

The best thing, possibly, that can be said of the play is that it lifts one bodily out of his surroundings and places him in a small, "one-train-a-day" country town. The acting is so natural, the incidents so commonplace, and the people, streets, houses and store so countrified that one forgets that he is seeing the picture through the courtesy of the projection machine, and becomes as enveloped in Hi Judd's joking-bees and home and postmaster experiences as though they were transpiring in real life. Good photography is also numbered among the picture's assets. The story of the play is given in the synopsis department of this issue. C. R. C.

Next Favorite Players' Release

"The High Hand," the next production of the Favorite Players, is rapidly nearing completion. The picture is taken from the novel by Jacques Futrelle, and is the story of a successful fight waged against the grafters and gun men of a political ring. It is a strong story of red-blooded action, in which stirring situations of dramatic interest abound. Carlyle Blackwell takes the leading part, that of Jim Warren.

Lord Stranleigh's Adventures Continue

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

WITH each episode of the "Young Lord Stranleigh" series his lordship deals the ring of scheming brokers a blow that is wholly unexpected and which they can in no way retaliate. It is not in this, however, that Stranleigh takes pleasure, but rather, in the knowledge that each victory is a step further in his suit for Lady Sinclair's favor and hand.

The latest release of this series which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post and is being filmed by the Edison company, is "An Invitation and an Attack," and contains more startling scenes and action than either of its predecessors. The episodes are two reels in length, and the next will be the fourth and final release, according to the original intention when the series was started.

Miriam Nesbitt, who is the only feminine character in the story, does not appear at all in this release, but Marc MacDermott, whose characterization of Lord Stranleigh is both amusing and convincing, is even more prominent and enthusiastic than in previous episodes. Duncan McRae still occupies Peter MacKeller's position at Stranleigh's right hand, and Yale Benner continues to be ever subservient and deficient as the cook, Hobbs.

Repelling invaders.

The exterior scenes are unusually picturesque and realistic, and are splendidly photographed. The scene showing the Rajah's men fighting on the rocks put an added amount of spice and force into the developments. One point which might be made clearer is how Stranleigh and MacKeller board the Rajah and make their way to the officers' quarters without being discovered.

Stranleigh and his men land a short distance from where the Rajah has anchored, and set themselves to watch the movements of the syndicate's pirates. MacKeller spends most of his time with the men who are being drilled to act as marines should a battle with the syndicate's men become necessary. His lordship, on the other hand, stretches himself out unconcernedly near the fire, smokes cigarettes, and refuses unpalatable-looking specimens of Hobbs' skill at cooking.

The syndicate's men discover Stranleigh's camp, and set out to attack it. Preferring to fight his side of the battle from on board ship his lordship moves his forces out to the yacht from which they can pick the enemy's poorly protected men off at leisure. A rapid-fire machine-gun is also brought into use, and the attacking force soon loses its aggressiveness.

Scene from Edison's "An Invitation and an Attack."

When the Rajah is loaded with ore the captain and a crew of men plant mines in the river to prevent Stranleigh's following them. MacKeller, watching them through a field-glass, becomes greatly excited and plies Stranleigh with inquiries as to how they shall get around them. The calm, indifferent manner in which his lordship receives the news and its accompanying horde of questions irritates him, and again he thinks that Stranleigh does not feel the gravity of the position, but again he is mistaken, for beneath his bored mask Stranleigh's mind is working out a plan that will clear the river for them.

He puts the men to work at throwing old logs and driftwood into the river. These spread out, covering the river's span, and set off the mines meant for the yacht. Stranleigh then allows the Rajah to carry the ore for them until they almost reach London. Here he catches up to the ship, boards it, and surprises the officers in the cabin. A short time later he enters the conference rooms of Schwartzbrod and his gang, and calmly informs them that he is in possession of the Rajah's cargo of ore. They do not believe him, and show him a wireless telegram recently received and signed by the captain, himself, telling them that all is well and naming the day on which he will be in dock. Stranleigh laughs at them, telling the dumfounded group of brokers that he was in possession of the Rajah at the time, and sent the message himself.

Life Photo's "The Avalanche"

William H. Tooker has played strong parts in past Life Photo productions and has played them well, but in none of them is he afforded such opportunities to display his versatility or to make his personality felt as in the company's latest five-part feature, "The Avalanche." The role of John Grey is sufficiently virile to allow the man's rage to almost make a brute of him at times, and then at others it requires the finest kind of interpretation.

Catherine Countiss, well known both on the stage and screen, has the feminine lead as the flirtatious and socially ambitious Clara Benson, later Mrs. Vaughan, and plays the part to perfection. Supporting these two are Caroline French as Helen Barrington, later Mrs. Grey; Roy Applegate as Peter Vaughn; Claire Mersereau as Rose Grey; Edward F. Roseman as Ashton Cameron; Fraunie Fraunholz as Philip Carlton; Vivian Tobin as Polly, the street waif; and William Slider as James Simpson.

The plot is solid; its dramatic points, well-defined and its situations veiled just enough to prevent their being uninterestingly obvious. With few exceptions the scenes are all interiors and have expensively furnished and tastily decorated settings for their background. Not once does the general trend of the story descend to even the average walk in life, consequently the properties and costumes require the utmost care—and receive it from Will S. Davis, the director. The photography is good beyond criticism. Taken as a whole "The Avalanche" is on a par with the best of the Life Photo productions up to the present time. The story will be found in the synopsis section of this issue. C. R. C.

Reenie Farrington, daughter of Frank Farrington, is leading lady of the Princess Company, taking the place of Muriel Ostriche.

Frederick Lewis Joins California Corporation

After nine years with E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe, playing important parts in Shakespearian classics, Frederick Lewis has taken the leap to motion pictures and will in the future be Beatriz Michelena's leading man in the California Motion Picture Corporation's big company.

Frederick Lewis.

In the course of his extended career on the speaking stage he has played with Henry Miller, Mary Shaw and other noted artists. It was through his work in Ibsen's "Ghosts" that Lewis made the success which put him at the forefront of his profession. Now he has yielded to the spell of the screen-drama, and his first work in the new field will be in "The Lily of Poverty Flat," a photoplay to be filmed from Bret Harte's well-known poem.

Selig Players Off for Panama

W. N. Selig has returned from New Orleans, La., where he bade farewell to the Selig company of motion picture players who have embarked at New Orleans en route to the Isthmus of Panama. Those who took passage were Kathlyn Williams, Wheeler Oakman, Lamar Johnstone, Harry Lonsdale, Sidney Smith, Frank Clark, Jack McDonald, Al Green, Robert H. Kelly, Helen Coates Ellis, Norma Nichols, Robert Carson and Harry Gerstead, the latter two being camera men. Colin Campbell, the director, and Lanier Bartlett, special scenario writer, also accompanied the party.

The Selig company went from the Selig Jungle-Zoo studios at Los Angeles, Cal., to New Orleans, where some particularly interesting scenes of the French quarter and of creole life were filmed for use in some forthcoming productions. In the Canal zone Mr. Campbell will direct the production of the more important scenes in Rex Beach's famous novel, "The Ne'er-Do-Well." Much of the action takes place along the Panama Canal, and no time nor expense will be spared to obtain true local color. The magnificent tropical scenery along the Isthmus will also be photographed in all its natural grandeur.

Carney Under United Banner

Augustus Carney, who is known to motion picture audiences throughout the country as "Alkali Ike," and was for years with the Essanay Company and later the Universal, has been added to the roster of the United Film Service. Carney is now appearing with the Albuquerque Film Company, which releases its output as the Luna brand. His first appearance under United will be in a double reel farce comedy, "Hickville's Diamond Mystery."

Artistic Exteriors in Selig Production

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

BACKGROUNDS of real artistic worth, photography that is second to none, and a story that is bound to interest both old and young, rich and poor, regulars and now-and-thens, makes Selig's two-reel release of Monday, February 1, which is entitled "The Vision of the Shepherd" one of the best multiples released by the Selig Company in many months.

Director Colin Campbell is responsible for the production and is surely to be congratulated on the wonderful exteriors shown in the first reel. A flock of sheep numbering five or six hundred, at least, is shown amid a rural background of real magnificence and much of the action of the story takes place amid such surroundings. Frequent fade-ins are used to show the figure of Christ, who appears in a vision form to old Jacob, the shepherd.

Arthur induces Nell to elope.

Kathlyn Williams, Wheeler Oakman and Frank Clark have the leading roles, and Mr. Clark in particular makes his character one not easily forgotten. Probably no other player could have appeared to such good advantage in such a role.

Old Jacob, the shepherd, while tending his flock is amazed to behold a wonderful vision of Christ, and he believes the Lord asks him, if all his sheep are safe in the fold. Jacob replies that they are, but later discovers that a little lamb is missing. With lantern in hand, he goes forth to search for the missing lamb and finally discovers it, alone and frightened, in a little hollow. Tenderly he carries it back to the distressed mother, and then returns to his humble home.

Old Jacob has accepted the vision as a literal inquiry about the welfare of his flock, then not realizing that his most precious lamb, Nell, his only daughter, stands on the threshhold of a great indiscretion, since Arthur Harding, a handsome young city man is tempting her to elope with him under the promise of marriage. Poor, deluded Nell finally consents to leave the parental roof and goes to the city with her sweetheart. Harding has telephoned ahead to an actor friend of his, named Giles, asking that the latter make up as a minister and perform a mock marriage.

Meanwhile, old Jacob has another vision of the Christ, and this time believes that he is instructed to visit the city in search of his missing lamb. He packs his carpetbag and sets forth on his search. Nell, meanwhile, is going through the marriage ceremony with Harding, but as the last words fall from the lips of Giles he apparently falls into a faint, and Harding rushes into an adjoining room to get some liquor. While Harding is absent, Giles tells Nell that he is no minister, that Harding means to wrong her and strongly urges her to return home to her mother, while yet there is time. In horror the girl grabs her hat and flees from the room. Later Harding pursues her into a small public park, whither she has fled, but Maggie Hunt, a salvation army girl, induces her to visit the mission.

Giles is introduced as a minister.

Old Jacob describes his vision.

There it is that Nell finds her father, for old Jacob, confused by the strange sights and sounds of the city, has gladly sought refuge from the hurly burly outside in the salvation army chapel. Jacob hurriedly returns home with Nell and when the final vision of the Christ appears to ask "Are all the sheep in the fold?" old Jacob with devout thankfulness replies that the wandering lamb has been found.

Powerful Vitagraph Story

The new three-reel Vitagraph feature of the Broadway Star brand, "The Silent Plea," is advertised as "a dramatic appeal for the widowed mother's allowance" and rightfully so for it is a convincing and heart-touching plea for the passage of this bill. At the Vitagraph theater where the picture was recently shown it was enthusiastically received.

It is not in any way a picturized sermon or an educational film. It is the story of a woman who is kept so busy providing for her children that she has no time to take care of them. Consequently, outside environment, instead of maternal influence, is seen in their every trait. The outcome of this condition brings home the fact that had the State paid the mother instead of a public institution for the bringing-up of the children, the expense being the same in both cases, they would grow up a pride to the nation instead of outcasts of society and, ultimately, inmates of the prisons.

Scene from Vitagraph's "The Silent Plea."

The dramatic side of the story is the first consideration in the making of the picture, and the interest in it is sustained so well by avoiding the improbable and adhering to a true-to-life presentation of facts that one unconsciously grasps the suggestion of the widowed-mother's-allowance arrangement as being the only solution to the problem. The entire play is handled in a masterly manner, and is well photographed.

It was produced under the direction of Lionel Belmore who had the co-operation of Sophie Irene Loeb, member of the New York State Commission for the Relief of Widowed Mothers. The scenario is by E. Mae Koch. Edith Storey is versatility itself in her characterization of Marie Carson, the mother, and is ably supported by Harry Morey and Donald Hall. Helen Connelly, Mary Anderson, Malcolm Beggs, Jr., Denton Vane, and Edward Elkas complete the cast.

The story opens with a scene in which John Aldrich, a suitor for Marie's hand, is introduced by her to her husband of a few days, Phil Carson. Some years later Aldrich is seen as a close friend of the couple, and a patient playmate of their two children, Tom and Mary. Phil meets with an accident on the street, and is killed instantly.

Mrs. Carson is forced to work day and night to support the children, and has little or no time to talk or play with them. Straightened circumstances compel her to apply to charity for help, and the children are taken from her and placed in an institution. As the years go by mother and children grow apart. On their release Tom and Mary obtain employment, and find pleasure where they can, after working hours, regardless of their mother's advice.

The result is that Mary innocently becomes involved in a murder scandal in one of the cafes, and Tom yields to temptation on obtaining a responsible position in a bank, and is jailed on a charge of larceny. In her hour of grief Mrs. Carson turns to her old suitor, Aldrich, who is now a state senator. Not having seen Marie for a number of years he at first does not recognize in the white-haired, haggard-looking woman the fresh, jovial Marie whom he once courted.

The poor woman then sits down and relates the sorrows that have entered her life since her husband's death—and all because she could not afford to bestow a little attention upon her children each day. Aldrich, who has already decided to take a stand against the Widowed Mother's Allowance Bill, readily sees that all of her trouble and the children's waywardness and disgrace could have been avoided had Mrs. Carson been allowed the six dollars a week that it cost the state to support the two children. He reverses his decision, and the final scene shows Aldrich before the senate pleading for the passage of the Widowed Mother's Allowance Bill. C. R. C.

State Right Men Attention

Believing that the time is now ripe for the return to the old basis of marketing feature films on a state rights basis, Jesse J. Goldburg, secretary and general manager of the Life Photo Film Corporation, is visiting the various large cities of the United States with sample prints of the multiple reel subjects "The Avalanche," "The Ordeal" and "A Modern Magdalen." He will present Life Photo's proposition to various state right buyers and exchangemen in each city on his route, but any who may be interested are asked to communicate by wire with the home office of the corporation, to the end that Mr. Goldberg may be advised in time and surely look them up when in the vicinity.

Chaplin Returns to California

The Charles Chaplin Essanay comedy company left Chicago for Niles, Calif., last Thursday, where it began work upon arrival. While in Chicago a two reel special picture was produced, which will be released about February 1. It was at first planned to have the comedian work in the Chicago studio, but on account of the lack of available exterior locations and the climatic conditions it was thought best to return to the West. Ben Turpin and Leo White, who have been in the Chicago company for some time, were among the players who left with Mr. Chaplin.

The Need For More Originality

WORKING under constant pressure, with every job a "rush," develops an over-free use of the line of least resistance. It is always easier to adapt someone else's work to our ends than to originate a brand new idea. The story is told of a small-town editor who unwisely spent an evening with the boys without first having filled his editorial page. When he awoke he had just time and ambition enough to clip an editorial from another paper and add to it the question, "What does our esteemed contemporary mean by this?" So he filled the hole in his own paper quite easily. If he had had a little more time he would probably have rewritten the other fellow's editorial. Originating one of his own would be too difficult.

This little story does not illustrate anything in particular, and is not especially apropos. But it is a fact that some of the film manufacturers, with the excellent excuse of over-pressure, are offering too little encouragement to originality. And this applies not only to scenario plots, but also on any new classification of story. It seems to be a general rule that if any one company originates a good mystery story, half a dozen other companies immediately get in line with similar mystery stories. If the first one is a serial, the other companies produce serials also.

There is nothing wrong with this in an industry that is naturally co-operative, and where anyone's discovery of a new way to please the public must become the property of all. But we cannot avoid the conclusion that it is still possible for the producing companies to secure more purely original matter, to the more lasting success and reputation of the producer.

Some of our very best and most successful photoplays are reproductions of former book or magazine successes. The same thing is true, of course, of the legitimate stage, some of whose greatest productions have come from dramatized novels and short stories. Nevertheless, a host of competent writers are available to the film producers, where but a few have gained recognition, and the whole difficulty seems to be a sordid matter of price.

An able and recognized short story writer can command from five to ten cents a word for his manuscript. To such a writer an average short story of three thousand words brings a check for one hundred to three hundred dollars. Film scenarios, of course, cannot be calculated on a word or line basis. The scenario of a story—or at least the part of it that the producer uses—may be very much shorter than the manuscript of the same story for a magazine. But its value lies in the fact that its author, if he has used his usual ingenuity, would have made an average length story out of the same material.

Producers who are willing to spend thousands of dollars on productions should be equally willing and glad to pay a hundred or two hundred dollars for a scenario that is really worth it. Of course they are doing so now, in some cases; but it ought to be common practice instead of only in occasional and much-advertised instances.

The standard of payment to scenario writers is undoubtedly higher now than it was a few years ago. But it is not high enough. At present the short story writer is only tempted to submit something made over from an oft-rejected story manuscript; and if he actually sells it, and gets a check for five, ten or fifteen dollars, he sends nothing more until another story written for the magazines has been proven hopeless.

The film producers can afford to pay better prices than the magazines. Encourage the writer to try his ideas in scenario form first; he can make over his rejected scenarios into magazine stories as easily as he can do the opposite. If the producers were as free with their money in this quarter as they are in some others, they would have the pick of the world's talent—not all of which is now recognized.

A Problem in Distributing Circulars

PRIVATE mail boxes at the entrances of houses and apartments may no longer be used as receptacles for circulars distributed by messenger. That ruling has just been made by the postmaster-general, who thereby forces a great many picture theater men to consider new ways of placing their heralds in the hands of the public. For it should be noted that, in the eyes of the United States postoffice department, he is responsible whose circular is distributed, and not the messenger he employs. And the penalty for violation of the new law is quite severe.

There is nothing, of course, to prevent the messenger slipping his circulars under the front door instead of into the mail box. But a circular in the box is worth five or six under the door, at least. People are not nearly so apt to read what they have to pick up off the floor, even in their own homes. And it is perfectly obvious that a circular under the door of an apartment house is no one's property and generally is not read at all. Usually, in fact, it is swept away by the janitor before any of the tenants see it.

It is only the neighborhood show, of course, that uses heralds or circulars distributed from house to house. Sometimes the distributer varies this scheme by standing at a busy street corner or a suburban railway station and handing out heralds to all who pass. But this method is little if any more efficient than slipping them under doors. Anyone who watched the hurrying pedestrians glance at the paper handed them and then throw it on the ground would soon condemn the system.

There is still one way of getting circulars into the private mail boxes, and that is by addressing them by name and putting a one-cent postage stamp on them. This method costs one dollar per hundred for distribution, without counting the cost of addressing and the time consumed in stamping. It may be said that the old system of house-to-house distribution had no fixed cost. It was customary to employ schoolboys and their remuneration consisted of admission tickets to the show, on a basis of, say, one admission for every hundred circulars distributed. If the theater was habitually showing to capacity, or the boy was allowed to redeem his admission tickets for cash at the box office, his work had a certain definite cost. Otherwise his labor cost nothing more than the chance that he might possibly have spent actual money for the ticket he got for his work.

Distribution by mail, even under a one-cent stamp, has many advantages. It is pretty certain that everybody reads all of his mail, whatever the color of its stamp. It is equally certain that most people pay little attention to circulars simply stuffed in their mail boxes, especially when each box may contain a dozen or more "dodgers" of all varieties.

The exhibitor who contemplates continuing the distribution by mail of the circulars he formerly distributed by hand, should recognize that he gains many advantages. Most of his competition for the eye of the householder or tenant will be removed. His circular will be one of few, instead of one of many, and entitled to the consideration of all mail matter. In short, the same number of circulars will go a great deal farther by mail than by hand.

But the cost is ten or twenty times as great. Whether the increased benefit will balance the increased cost is a problem that only trial will decide. Some will make that trial; but we believe the majority of exhibitors who give the subject the careful consideration that all advertising should have, will decide that circular distribution has become, through the new law, too expensive a luxury for the average small show. We shall be glad to hear from any exhibitor who tries the scheme of mailing his bulletins and pays enough attention to the results to know whether he is losing money or gaining patronage by it.

Just A Moment Please

Starting here, it looks like a long ways to the bottom of this column but, by perseverance, we may perhaps finally get there.

Did you notice that story of Sam Spedon's about Leah Baird of the Vitagraph studio purchasing a bull dog with a pedigree a mile long, because "she needs some protection against burglary and other intrusions?" We thought Leah now had a husband. Such a story scarcely flatters him, it seems to us.

We are advised that our old friend, Chester Beecroft, is now general manager of the Centaur plant. Congrats, Chet. There is something to that old saying "Onward and Upward" isn't there?

"These scenics make me tired!"
"Isn't she pretty?"
"Imagine making love to a face like that."
"It's a wonder that stunt didn't kill 'em."
"What's it all about?"
"Just my luck to always arrive when the third part is on."

Hey, Lloyd, the Caward Art College has hooked another pupil. Jake Wilk of World Film was enrolled recently and already shows promise of becoming a regular connoisseur on Art. He threatens now to land a frontispiece every other week, and by jing from the samples he is submitting it looks as though he really meant it.

CAN YOU SUGGEST ONE?

Out in California they are now showing motion pictures to convicts condemned to death. The first one sprung on 'em was Selig's "The Spoilers." What, in your opinion, is the film that ought to be shown a man just before he dies? A bright Lincoln penny will be awarded for the best suggestion.

We lamp by an esteemed contemp that "The Hypocrites," the much discussed naked truth film, made months ago by Bosworth is to see the light of day this week at the Longacre Theater, in Noo Yawk. Judged by the amount of discussion the pic has caused in trade circles in Chicago, we'll bet the line of truth seekers at the box office will be a block long on the opening night. Specially so since the film hasn't been censored by any Major Funkhouser and despite the fact that it will cost one dollar per look.

My my, lads, isn't it awful the way this chap Neff does stir up things! He just opens his mouth and talks and then—Blooie! Denials, contradictions and frequent references to "the short and ugly word" fill the air and the various trade journals.

OUR BURG.

Lewis J. Selznick, vice pres. & gen'l mgr. of the World Film Corp., was to Our Village this wk. said "Howdy" to all the folks and then boarded the rattler for points still farther West. Lewis opined as how there was some big doings soon to occur, but expects to tell you about 'em in a week or so.

Tom Finnigan, this Dallas, Texas, feller, dropped into Ye Ed's offis one day this wk., paused at the R. R. eating house for a little lunch and then took the 12:40 for Noo Yawk. Good luck, Tom, come again.

Ernest Truex, him as was seen at the local pitcher houses in such fillims as "A Good Little Devil," "The Bomb Boy," etc., is now appearing at the local Opry House, in "The Dummy" and by Heck he's as good in real life as he was in the picters.

Harry H. Green of the Regent Theater, Mpls., and William Steffes, Sec'y of the M. P. E. A. of the N. W., also of Mpls., was to our Burg this wk.

Geo. Cox, our w. k. fellow cit., had a narrow escape from death last Sat. when the 9:36 over the I. C. was wrecked a short ways out of the village. Geo. covered himself with glory and cinders by rescuing some of the terrified passengers but, later, in a interview, tried to pass the buck for all what he did to another chap what hadn't done nothing at all.

Chas. Chaplin, the comical chap what so recently arrived in our midst, has shook the dust of our fair city from his ft. and is even now back in that sunny Calif. at work.

Real Egyptian Princess for Universal

NELL SHIPMAN DESCRIBES HER

T was in the projection room de luxe of the Universal Company that Nell Shipman was located one day last week. She was sunk deep in one of those immense and comfy chairs for which this especial projection room is noted, and she was also sunk deep in the screen story of "Neptune's Daughter."

Nell Shipman.

She came pleasantly forth from both, however, and Earnest Shipman, head of the Universal Feature department, and incidentally Nell Shipman's husband, piloted us through the shipping room and into the private office of the feature head, where he left us to the interesting discussion of Miss Shipman's newest scenario—a six-reel one in which life in an Egyptian harem is to be enacted with the Princess Hassan of Cairo, Egypt, playing a chapter from her own life in the role of the American actress who marries an Egyptian prince, is confined in his harem and, tiring of this constrained existence, induces her prince to take her to Paris from which city she and her maid, gathering up the royal boxes and bags, hastily and stealthily depart for America.

"She gave me all the details," said Miss Shipman, letting her white-lined wine-red coat slip from her shoulders to the back of her chair. "You see, I had known her before she was a princess. She was on the stage when I was, and went to Europe where she made a sensation and attracted Prince Hassan to her. He looked like any American or Englishman, as regards his dress and manner; only, so his princess says, he had a magnetic charm about him that no American or Englishman she ever had met possessed. And he made such wonderful love to this American actress, whose home was in California, and who was finding Europe and its reception of her so satisfying. So one day when she could find no new reason to give the prince as to why she would not become the Princess Hassan, she said 'Yes,' instead, and they were married, both the English and the Mohammedan ceremonies being used.

"Then began the trip to the princely palace, in Cairo, Egypt. It sounds like a fairy tale, really—doesn't it?" the maker of the six-reel scenario stopped her narrative to exclaim. The interest her brown eyes expressed was as keen as though their owner, too, were hearing the story for the first time.

"Well, they were received in state and the princess donned the costume that Egyptian royal convention demanded. It seemed such a novelty at first—the trousered costume and the veil that let only her eyes show—that she thought it fun. But when she found her freedom restricted to the extent of seeing no one but her husband and maid and being allowed to go nowhere, she began to scheme to get to Paris, feeling she could surely escape once there.

"It seems so funny to me," Miss Shipman commented, "an American girl—and especially one who had been an actress—being shut in like that!"

And what an interesting foundation for a scenario, the listener approved, and Miss Shipman said that it was the most interesting thing she has ever done, that scenario, and that, with the princess' description of places and customs and costumes, in addition to the hours Miss Shipman spent in the public library getting further information as to the country she previously had known very little about, why the scenario was brought to satisfying completion and the princess and company and precious script set off for Universal City, where the story is to be filmed.

"When the princess finally induced the prince to take her to Paris she made up her mind to run away as soon as she got there," Miss Shipman resumed. "And she did. Then she wanted the prince to sue her for divorce, but so far the prince has refused to do this and the princess does not want to get the divorce herself, because then she will receive no endowment.

"The Turkish law requires that the prince, should he divorce the princess, support her in princely style. And an American girl could do wonders with the money that would mean," Miss Shipman laughed. And having met the princess at the Universal Christmas party and having seen how very beautiful and very American she is, the listener was sure that the Princess Hassan would have a lovely time spending the princely endowment.

As the scenario world knows, Miss Shipman is one of the very best contributors to that world. She has won several prizes for best scenarios, conducted a scenario office of her own out on the coast, two years ago—and not only that, but has been in pictures herself many times. Before interesting herself in scenarios, the stage was her biggest interest. She toured Alaska and Canada as leading woman in her own company. Since then, and that was about five years ago, she has written a number of vaudeville sketches, has fostered her interest for photoplay writing and has brought the Shipman heir to the age of three years and robust baby perfection.

Film Folks Have Narrow Escape

While returning from a visit in the South on Saturday, January 16, George L. Cox of the Advance Motion Picture Company narrowly escaped death when the train upon which he was traveling was wrecked near Homewood, Ill. He received a slightly bruised shoulder and a severe shaking up. On the same train was Adrienne Kroell, formerly leading lady for the Selig Polyscope Company. Miss Kroell was in the coach ahead of Mr. Cox and also had a lucky escape, a sprained ankle being her only injury.

"Uncle Jimmie" Daly

At the Lubin studio "Uncle Jimmie" Daly is a real live wire and doesn't look his sixty odd years the least bit, for he is one of those gifted persons who simply refuse to grow old. Over forty years ago he became an actor and since then he has played something like 1,200 parts in different productions. Thirty years ago he had a dramatic school in Philadelphia and today some of his old pupils are famous in the theatrical world. Nearly all of "Uncle Jimmie's" old associates are dead. He received his first dramatic instruction from the late Dion Boucicault and the late E. L. Davenport. For a number of seasons he played with William B. Sheridan, who was one of his most intimate friends, and on the list of other well known persons he played with appear the names of Laurence Barrett, John McCullough, Joseph Jefferson, Roland Reed, Sol Smith Russell, Mrs. John Drew, John Sleeper Clarke and Annie Pixley. Clara Lambert, who in private life is Mrs. "Jimmie" Daly, is also a Lubin photoplayer. They have been married for a great many years and have always played in the same productions. They agreed on the day they were married to do this, and no manager of a production has engaged one without the other.

Duplex Double Exposure Camera

David Horsley who has long had a place in the ranks of inventors of motion picture apparatus has just perfected a camera which takes two exposures and makes two separate double exposed negatives at one time. Mr. Horsley has been working over this idea for a long time, and is greatly elated over his success.

The new duplex double exposure camera is already in use in the Centaur studios in Bayonne and has demonstrated its thorough practicability in actual test. The possibilities opened up by Mr. Horsley's astonishing device are almost without limit. Both the vision and the scene are made at one time and either or both may be faded in or out by an independent controller. The mechanism is operated by a spring motor, which can be set to any speed from one to twenty-four that may be desired. This motive device enables the camera man to give his attention to the more important details in photography. The duplex negative is made merely as an insurance against any defect in, or accident that might happen to, a single negative, such as static, scratching, errors in the developing, etc., thereby obviating the necessities of costly retakes.

Some of the effects that have already been accomplished with the new camera are most weird and startling. In one protean comedy several different human heads change and alternate on one body with startling rapidity. And the illusions are said to be perfect. In another test a lion is seen eating peacefully out of the same plate with a little girl.

Another great advantage, as great in its way as the effect, is the time and money which will be saved by the Horsley camera over the double exposure method now in general use.

In the first place, as both the scenes and visions are made at one time and in one location, the same light is used for each. Under the present method, scenes and visions are made at different times and the negative has to be rewound with exactness, and the acting in the second exposure timed with minute precision. Any error, however slight, will spoil the entire effect, and the work has to be done over and over any number of times—until the combination has been accurately obtained. The Horsley camera, by making both exposures on the same film at the same time, entirely eliminates these wastes and uncertainties, and proportionately reduces the cost of production.

Another unique feature which adds wonder and broadens the scope of Mr. Horsley's invention, is a device which is said to register the words spoken by the character right on the picture, so that speeches and necessary sub-titles are read as the scenes are being unfolded.

Gollos Gets Record Breaking Feature

The Photoplay Productions Releasing Company, 414 Mallers Building, states that it has just purchased the big six-reel production entitled, "The Blue Mouse."

Madge Lessing, one of the most popular comediennes of the American stage takes the title role and it is predicted that this production will be a bigger box office winner than anything which has come into the city for a good many months.

Those exhibitors who keep in touch with the legitimate productions doubtless know that "The Blue Mouse," during its first engagement at McVickers and its second at the Garrick Theater in Chicago, broke all attendance records for these houses up to that time.

There is a laugh in every foot of the film and as it is scheduled for release about February 15, a few of the wise exhibitors have already been in to make bookings.

Over 40 bookings were made on January 19 and two of the biggest exhibitors in Chicago are now negotiating for the opportunity to run this film in a loop house.

The Photoplay Productions Releasing Company is to be congratulated on selecting features of this superior kind.

Feist Is Optimistic

Felix Feist, head of the Celebrated Players Film Exchange of Chicago, which represents the Alliance program in Illinois and Indiana, was a recent visitor in New York and made the Alliance offices his headquarters.

In remarking upon the present conditions and the future prospects of the film business he expressed a very practical opinion by declaring "It is a waste of time and effort to utter foolish prophesies about the return of good times and then sit down like Macawber and 'expect something to turn up.' My advice to film men is to get busy and stay busy. In my territory the conditions are on the mend slowly but surely. What money is being made comes in on the high-class picture that offers a strong attraction to the public. This is the only type of film that will survive the depression."

"The Morals of Marcus"

Marie Doro photographs well. "The Morals of Marcus," the Famous Players' picture in which she is appearing this week at the Strand theater, is proof of this fact. The story is a pretty and interesting one, and the Famous Players Company has been able to put into it much of the atmosphere of the Orient. The play in which the Turkish subject, Carlotta, unconsciously makes love to the sedate Marcus, was the play in which the public best liked Marie Doro. So it is that the popularity of a Famous Players film featuring Miss Doro in her favorite role is a satisfactory and pleasure-giving choice. It is difficult to associate Eugene Ormonde, the heavy, with Eugene Ormonde as Marcus. But it is necessary for the further enjoyment of the film that this be done, as Mr. Ormonde is cast as the man whom Carlotta loves, and who, in return, loves Carlotta.

The story has its beginning in Turkey and the orphaning of Carlotta, a little English baby. She is brought up in the harem as the foster-daughter of Hamdi, chief of police. Because she refuses to marry a grandfatherly person whom Hamdi chooses as her husband, she is imprisoned but is helped to escape by an American tourist who later shoots himself. Carlotta tramps about London alone and wanders into the gardens of Marcus Ordeyne, who befriends her, much against the wishes of his aunt and cousin, and later, when Hamdi appears to demand her return, avows his intention of marrying her and thus having the right to say to what country she belongs. And so, with interesting developments, the story reaches the decision of Marcus and the satisfaction of those in sympathy with him and the harem girl, Carlotta.

Educational Films

There is a good deal of activity these days in the way of private ventures in pictures. This week at the plant of the Evans Film Manufacturing Company on Two Hundred and Sixteenth street, New York City, there are a number of excellent industrial pictures taken by various individuals who specialize more or less in that direction. A party named Heller has been up through New England and brings back three well taken subjects, namely: "Watch Making," taken at Attleboro, Mass.; "Making Hats," taken at Danbury, Conn., and the "Manufacture of Jewelry," taken in New Haven.

Also in course of completion at the Evans plant are a few subjects by the Brown Brothers, as follows: "Making Silverware," "Floral Fete at New Orleans" and "The Coffee Industry." This latter picture was taken in Brazil at the special order of Chase & Sanborn, the well known importers of coffee. It makes an interesting subject on account of the foreign scenes.

By far the best educational subject of any at this plant is "Uncle Sam at Work," a six-reel subject made with Government co-operation by Henry W. Savage, the well known theatrical magnate.

"The Fight" Finished by Lederer

Having put the finishing touches to Bayard Veiller's "The Fight," the first photoplay to be produced by the George W. Lederer's Stage Filmotions, Mr. Lederer expects to announce its release within a few days.

"The Fight," which was a success at the Hudson theater, New York City, was especially written for Miss Margaret Wychlerly. It is her first experience in acting before the camera, and she has to be urged to essay the part, but now she is in love with the work. Others in the cast well known to the legitimate and silent drama are Tim Cronin, a vaudeville favorite; Miss Katharine La Salle, who was featured in the "Banker's Daughter," Miss Jeanette Berergard, a pantomimist; Miss Sonia Massell, a Russian actress; Miss Edna Hibbard, an ingenue who has appeared in many Broadway attractions; Charles Trowbridge, leading juvenile of the New York "Daddy Long Legs" company; and Albert Gran, the leading man in many Norwegian pictures.

The George W. Lederer's Stage Filmotions will hereafter make a monthly release, the name of the second picture that the company is at work on being kept a secret for the present.

"The War Pigeon"

Canada's first feature photoplay is the joint effort of Arthur Stringer, the well-known author, and Frederic Colburn Clarke, the distinguished artist-photographer. The title is "The War Pigeon" and the subject is based upon some thrilling incidents in the war of 1812 between the American and British forces along the Canadian border line. The developments in the story are all favorable to the American side; in the end the old trapper, king of the Canadian forests, works out his revenge on the British troops although his beautiful daughter does become the bride of Lieutenant Fitzgibbon, who is in command of the English forces. Edith Potter appears in the title role of Alice Crandall and Herbert Withrow is the opposite lead, Lieutenant Fitzgibbon. This production will be offered on a territorial basis by the E. & W. Transfilm Bureau.

Minnesota to Have Exhibition

Harry H. Green, manager of the Regent theater of Minneapolis, Minn., and William A. Steffs, secretary of the Motion Picture Exhibition Association of the Northwest, also of Minneapolis, were Chicago visitors this week and callers at MOTOGRAPHY's office. These gentlemen were looking over the film field and returning from the East, where they went to close several contracts with regard to space at the motion picture exhibition which is to be held in Minneapolis next May. They report much interest in their project in the East, and expect on the opening day of the exhibition to have a great variety of exhibits.

Hoffman Opens Offices

Hugh Hoffman, for five years cartoonist, interview man and techncial man with the Moving Picture World has opened an office, room 308, Gaiety Theater building, 1547 Broadway, New York, where he is prepared to write advertising copy for moving picture firms, design heralds and general publicity matter.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

Brevities of the Business

"The Goose Girl" is the attraction at the Strand theater this week and diminutive Marguerite Clark will, through permission from the Famous Players, be seen on the screen in the title role of this Harold McGrath story, which was produced by the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company.

Through the columns of the Los Angeles Record, Miss Agnes Vernon, leading lady with Charles Giblyn's company of Nestor players at the Universal Hollywood studios, this week announced her engagement to Abe Deuce, special staff writer for the Newspaper Enterprise Association.

Following a romance of two months duration in the big studio of the Lubin Manufacturing Company in Philadelphia, Clarence Jay Elmer, a widely known Lubin photoplayer, will wed Miss Edyth Strowd Anderton, another Lubin photoplayer, on February 13. The wedding will be one of the most unique ever held in Philadelphia, for the young couple will be married in the daylight studio on the top floor of the Lubin plant and motion picture cameras will record every detail of the wedding.

The guiding star of Miss Elsie Janis' meteoric career is her mother. Mrs. Janis is the luminous shadow of the Bosworth star; she is her press agent, the first applause of her audiences, her directress and—primarily her domestic and national bank.

Aboard the French S. S. Rochambeau, which arrived in the port of New York recently, were M. Claude Patin, secretary-general of the Eclair Film Company of New York and Paris, accompanied by Mons. and Madame Chautaut. Mons. Chautaut, French director of Eclair, came to America to produce the famous Brady-Shubert productions in motion pictures for the Peerless Film Company.

The United Film Service is releasing an extraordinary four reel feature, "Are They Born or Made," the scenario of which was written by Jack Rose, and which was produced by the Humanology Film Producing Company of Medford, Mass., of which Mr. Rose is president. The new film is an exact depiction as to certain phases of Rose's early experiences, which had as their setting a slum environment.

Shannon Fife, one of the shining lights of the scenario writing staff at Lubins, returned to Philadelphia last week from Dallas, Texas, where he has been spending a few weeks telling the "folks at home" the latest inside news of the motion picture world.

The audiences of to-day have a critical eye alert to the picking out of flaws in the most minor details. Take the scene of the old village general merchandise store and post-office in "It's No Laughing Matter" starring Maclyn Arbuckle and released by Bosworth, Inc., which is particularly true to life. As the producer humorously described it—"I spared no expense to make it look just as economical as possible."

Louis Joseph Vance will, in the future, write motion picture scenarios instead of stories. He has organized a company, leased a big studio in California and employed players, director, camera man and the entertaining scenes, heretofore put on the printed page, are being published on the celluloid ribbon. Wilfred Lucas has been engaged as director-general and is now filming a five-reel subject, "The Spanish Jade," from the stage production of the same name by Mr. Vance.

At the new Selig jungle-zoo in Los Angeles there are wild animals valued at a half-million dollars. There are 13 Bengal tigers, more than 40 lions, 14 deadly pumas, jaguar, hyenas, black bear, sloth bear, civet cats, ant eaters, 15 leopards, two black panthers, three Malay bears, nine wolf dogs and various other beasts.

Besides appearing in the title role, Mr. Bosworth of Bosworth, Inc., personally attended to the direction of "Buckshot John." Each scene has been staged in a manner entirely in accordance with the painstaking care evident in every Bosworth release and nothing has been overlooked, to the smallest detail.

Mary Pickford, accompanied by her director, James Kirkwood, has arrived in Los Angeles for an indefinite stay. When it was learned that the popular leading woman was coming to the coast the committees of three organizations to give big balls—the Motion Picture Exhibitors, the Static Club and the Photoplayers' Club—all began using the wire liberally. Miss Pickford is now to be guest of honor at the three big functions of Filmland.

Jess Willard, the latest and most promising hope of the white race, who is to meet Jack Johnson at Juarez, Mexico, next March for the heavyweight championship of the world, made his debut in motion pictures several days ago in a Universal one-reeler, the title of which is "The Heart Punch." Tom Jones, Willard's manager, and Howard Crampton, Allen J. Holubar, Marie Weirman and little Jane Lee, of the regular Imp Company, are in the photoplay.

Violet Mersereau, the little blond Imp leading lady, is very happy these days. She is the proud possessor of her first long dress, that is, her first very long gown. It is a beauty, too, and she promises to wear it soon in a film.

In William Cato, the western Essanay Company claims to have one of the most versatile persons in the motion picture business. "Bill," as he is called by everyone, came to the Essanay Company about three years ago from a large ranch where he was vaquero boss. In the first production he played in for G. M. Anderson, he worked with ease. Since then he has taken part in almost every comedy and drama staged at the western Essanay studio.

Thomas H. Ince and Mack Sennett, producers for the New York Motion Picture Corporation and the Keystone Film Company, respectively, have joined hands in a private enterprise—they have the concession at the Panama-California Exposition at San Diego, to give a demonstration of "how motion pictures are made."

B. A. Rolfe, president and general manager of the photoplay company bearing his name, which is releasing on the Alco program, has leased one of the largest studios in Los Angeles, and now has one of his producing companies engaged in filming the Clyde Fitch play, "The Cowboy and the Lady." For this production S. Miller Kent, the star of the original company, is playing the main role and an excellent cast supports him. Edwin Carew is in charge of the production.

An addition to the list of producing companies comprising the United Motion Picture Producers has been made in the inclusion of the Pike's Peak Film Company, Colorado Springs, Colo. This organization will specialize in western reels.

Biograph—This company declared a dividend of 50 per cent, payable February 1, in the script certificates which are convertible on or before December 31, 1916, at par, not bearing interest and convertible either into cash or stock or some form of interest-bearing obligation determinable by the board of directors. The regular dividend of ½ of 1 per cent was paid January 2 and it is reported that distributions hereafter will be made at the rate of 1 per cent.

Mutual Film—The preferred stock was in demand all of last week, but very few sales were made.

New York Motion—We understand the board of directors reserved their decision in respect to payment of dividends for their adjourned meeting.

Syndicate Film Corporation has declared a dividend for January amounting to 32 per cent on the preferred and common stock outstanding.

Captain Harry Lambart, one of the Vitagraph directors, is the proud father of—not a new boy—but one whom he had not seen in over four years until last week. When Captain Lambart left England for America, he placed his son in school for a four years' course. The time having expired, Lambart, Jr., was placed aboard ship for a visit to his father.

Joseph Smiley, one of the well known Lubin directors, did some tall hustling this week when he completed a three-reel picture is less than three days. The play was A. Gil Spear's "Rated at Three Million," and Smiley wanted to complete it to begin some new plays. The "full speed ahead" signal was given and the company got in action. One day they did seventy-two scenes in eleven and a half hours. It was strenuous work but Smiley got the results he desired.

The wonderful collection of wild animals in the new Selig Jungle-Zoo, at Los Angeles, Calif., are housed in massive cages, built in reinforced concrete. Massive pillared pergola effects and rare shrubbery with gaily colored cockatoos as inhabitants, will form an effective background.

Violet McMillan, recently of the Oz Film Company, has signed with the New York Motion Picture Corporation. Thomas Ince will direct this pretty and petite actress.

In the projection theater of the executive offices of the Selig Polyscope Company last week, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sindelar, who are with the Chicago company of "Potash & Perlmutter," Gilson Willets and Roy L. McCardell, were the guests of W. N. Selig at a private showing of the Selig special pictureplay, "The Carpet From Bagdad."

William H. Turner, the well-known character actor, has returned to the Lubin studio after an engagement with the E. F. Albee stock company in Providence, R. I. Mr. Turner has been on the stage for over twenty-five years.

Charles Eyton, formerly western manager for Oliver Morosco, has been appointed general manager of Bosworth, Inc., and the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company. Among other new additions to the Bosworth plant, a concrete and steel office building is about to be erected. This building will house the new activities of Mr. Eyton, who will be in charge.

David W. Griffith is at the Hotel Astor, New York City. 'Tis said he brought fourteen reels of "The Clansman" with him from out of the west and before his return will arrange for the showing of the picture, into which he says he has put his best work. There is great interest in film circles regarding "The Clansman."

Edwin August would be grateful to anybody who might prescribe a remedy for the I-hate-to-sit-for-a-picture malady which has seized some of our very best screen talent. "I dislike having my chin tweaked and tilted," complains Mr. August. "By the time the photographer has me ready to 'take' I'm sore enough to bite nails." Whereupon he called his brother Hal and issued the command that he (Hal) lead, browbeat or inveigle him (Edwin) into a Broadway studio and force him to have some new photographs made.

George Kleine was amazed at the twice-capacity attendance the Kleine invitation to the showing of "Du Barry" at the Kleine Candler theater called forth two Sundays ago. "The box office saw that the house would not hold all the people that filled and refilled the lobby," said Mr. Kleine, discussing the picture and its attendance on the morning after the big showing, "so we had a card printed announcing a second show at nine-thirty. It was ten minutes past 10 when the first performance was over and it was midnight when the second house emptied. I'd like to know," mused Mr. Kleine, "how many of the people who were turned away at the first show did wait for the second." Very nearly all, was the answer, as the second performance also had a capacity attendance.

Harry Reichenbach is pursuing a happy, not to say ever-useful, existence in the twenty-third floor offices of the Bosworth Company building. At that he says, "Wait till I get my swing" (meaning stride). We wait.

John W. Grey is responsible for the book containing a "Fifteen weeks' special advertising campaign for 'Runaway June' —the great love story special in fifteen episodes by George Randolph Chester, produced by the Reliance." That is the information which the cover contains and inside is every possible bit of information the exhibitor can desire, plus photographs of cuts and ads to be used. A great little booklet, thanks to John Grey.

Arthur Rosenbach is the new magnet which accounts for many additional calls and callers at the office of the Alliance Company on the eleventh floor of the Leavitt building. Whatever your mission you're welcome, is "Rosie's" implied greeting.

H. Z. Levine—room No. 4 of the Box Office Attractions Company, hallway marked "Private"—has sent forth the second issue of the Exhibitors' Bulletin and for its fineness does he and others who have aided in its making deserve credit. It is an interesting and attractive house organ.

Pat O'Malley stopped horseback riding in Edison interests long enough last week to drop into The Room and refresh his vision with the Irish green of the rug and the Irish atmosphere of the pictures which Valentine Grant brought back with her on her picture-trip there last summer with the Sid Olcott players. Pat O'Malley was one of those players. "Sure, I'd better turn away before the tear comes to me eye," said Mr. O'Malley, rolling his green velour hat into a new shape. "I'm going back in a few years and spend the rest of me days on the Emerald Isle," was his decision. Then, refreshed, he departed for the subway and the Bronx.

Frank Kugler is responsible for the splendid camera work in the big and fine "Samson" picture which the Box Office people are releasing. Mr. Kugler is a peer of camera men and did good and early service in the Edison studio.

"The Truth Wagon," the latest release on the Alliance program, in which Max Figman appears, is rapidly making a record for itself as a repeater. From all over the country reports reach the Alliance offices that exhibitors, in answer to requests, have played the picture on return dates.

It has just come to the ears of the film world that Emile Offeman, the genial general manager of the Eclair Film Company, Inc., became the proud father of a baby boy on New Year's morning. Mother and child are doing nicely and the young scion of the Eclair head already dominates the Offeman household with an iron hnad.

George Kleine held a convention of his eastern branch managers at his New York offices on Sunday, January 17. Among those present were D. H. Bergh, Chicago; W. E. Raynor, J. J. Dacey and H. A. Bugie, of the New York office; J. J. Rotchford, Philadelphia; D. L. Dennison, Pittsburgh; B. F. Simpson, Atlanta; D. Cooper, Toronto, and R. D. Marson, Boston. After the meeting Mr. Kleine tendered his men a banquet.

"The Chocolate Soldier," a recent release upon the Alliance program, is based upon the late war in the Balkans and the entire first reel is devoted almost exclusively to battle scenes. These pictures were taken under actual war conditions and the troops taking part in them are almost to a man veterans of the army that shed its blood upon the Balkan battlefields.

Bosworth, Inc., through Frank A. Garbutt, made an offer of $5,000 to Mr. and Mrs. Vernon Castle, the famous dancing pair, to appear in a forthcoming Bosworth production in which a scene in a ballroom is one of the principal incidents. Mr. Castle, appearing at present in "Watch Your Step" at the New Amsterdam theater, New York, would not give any definite reply, but promised the Bosworth office that he would give the offer his earnest consideration.

Dorothy Gish, the clever Majestic star, who was struck by an automobile and seriously injured Thanksgiving day, is now back at work, rehearsing as the simple country maiden in "An Old Fashioned Girl," a quaint, pastoral drama soon to be released in the Mutual program.

Donald Crisp director on the Griffith Mutual staff in Los Angeles, has left that concern to join Allan Dwan's Famous Players Company.

"The High Hand," the five-reel feature being produced by the Favorite Players Company with William D. Taylor directing, promises to be as excellent a photoplay as "The Last Chapter" and Carlyle Blackwell is revelling in the part of Jim Warren the factory hand, who becomes a big political factor in his city.

Miss Margaret Turnbull, widely known throughout the United States as a successful writer and dramatist, has gone to the Lasky studios in Hollywood, Calif., to become a photo-dramatist in association with William C. De Mille, who has charge of preparing the scenarios for all the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company productions.

At the annual meeting of the General Film Company, A. E. Smith was elected treasurer and F. R. Clark secretary. All the other officers were re-elected.

The Mutual Film Corporation, to deal adequately with the stress of new business, has opened a complete new branch office at Albany, N. Y., with J. M. Mullen as manager. The new exchange occupies the building at 733 Broadway.

Eugene Pallette and R. A. Walsh of Mutual, claim they have Damon and Pythias backed off the map. They were school-mates in Kansas City and there formed a partnership in marbles and other commercial enterprises common to boyhood. After school days they drifted apart, only to meet later in Texas and Mexico where they punched cows together. They now live with each other in bachelor apartments in Los Angeles, and several weeks ago they bought, jointly, a big fighting British bull dog. They have named the canine Jack Johnson, and he enjoys the 60-horse power racing car the two actors share in common as much as they do.

The feature picture of the Vitagraph theater program for the week commencing Sunday, January 17, will be the five-part historical drama of adventure, "Hearts and the Highway," picturized by Colonel Jasper Ewing Brady from the Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady's novel of the same name.

Helen Badgley, who, as "The Thanhouser Kidlet," has been featured in dramas released in the Mutual program, has a new baby brother. The child was born Wednesday and little Helen adores the nine pound addition to the Badgley household.

After seeing the World Film photoplay "The Pit," in which Wilton Lackaye is starred, General Manager Langley, of the Turner & Dunker circuit of California, decided that the feature deserved an increased price, and orders were given that made the best seats at the Tivoli Opera House, San Francisco, fifty cents.

J. P. McGowan, the Kalem director who has been confined to the Sisters' Hospital, Los Angeles, Calif., for over six weeks is able to go out at last. He has taken two rides in an automobile and will continue to do so from now on each day. Of course he visited his old stamping ground and gave personal direction to the scenes to be taken in the "Hazards of Helen" series.

St. Vincent's College, Chicago, has a membership of 5,500 and has arranged a big benefit performance of the D'Annunzio "Cabiria" at the College theater of that city. Frank Samuels, former manager of the Motion Picture Expositions at Grand Central Palace and now representing Itala's interests in the middle west, promoted the affair and is in charge of the details. A choir from St. Vincent's will render the choral accompaniment and a large orchestra will be used.

Riley Chamberlin, the well known comedian at the Thanhouser forces in New Rochelle, N. Y., has just finished another "Conductor 786" picture, in which he displays his best talent and mirth-provoking characteristics.

Winifred Greenwood, of the American studios, was nearly drowned in an over-realistic rain storm in "Justified," now under production by Henry Otto. The huge fire hose belonging to the studio apparatus was brought into play. It took four men to hold the nozzle, and shot a stream 150 feet into the air. The deluge was so strong that Miss Greenwood ran out of the scene once and it had to be retaken.

Otis Turner is creating some new effects in his big detective and mystery series of pictures based on scientific phenomena which has puzzled science for some time. In this series (not serial) he is mounting some magnificent sets and has the able support of such fine artists as Anna Little, Herbert Rawlinson, William Worthington and Laura Oakley.

Al Lichtman, head of the special attraction department of the World Film Corporation, is paying a flying visit to Montreal, Canada, where he will devote his time to special work on the suffrage photoplay "Your Girl and Mine." He is expected back within a week.

A dilapidated shack in the mountains back of Inceville—it was once the home of a hermit—furnishes the principal setting for "Through the Murk," a Domino release in the Mutual program. The shack was discovered by Director Charles Swickard while working on another picture.

Helen Badgley, "The Thanhouser Kidlet," and Leland Benham have certainly been enjoying themselves for the past two weeks as Marselene, the famous clown from the New York Hippodrome, the man who has made all the kiddies laugh, has been with the Thanhouser forces at New Rochelle putting on "Marselene, the Window Cleaner."

Reaves Eason, Jr., newest of all new things at the American-Mutual studios, Santa Barbara, Calif., making his first appearance recently before the moving picture camera, scored an "emotional triumph." He was playing the part of an infant, and at the right time injected the proper punch by yelling lustily. And he is only two months old.

The World Film Corporation is sending Fred Mace, and the entire "What Happened to Jones" company to Jacksonville, Fla., to take the exterior scenes of that photoplay. In the company that have gone South, are Mary Charleson, Chester Barnett, Josie Sadler, William Mandeville, Chas. A. Mason, Joe Daly, Mrs. Henry M. Blossom, Caroline Rankin and Leon Horgan. There is another World company working in and near Jacksonville, Fla., under the direction of O. A. C. Lund. This company is making "The Butterfly," in which Howard Estabrook is being starred.

Eddie Lyons of the Nestor comedy company returned to Los Angeles from his home at Beardstown, Illinois, to which place he was summoned by the news of the fatal illness of his mother. He arrived there the day following her death which occurred in her eighty-first year. The popular young director-actor was very much attached to his mother and her death was a great shock to him and he was much touched at the many expressions of sorrow from his associates.

There was a royal welcome awaiting Romaine Fielding and his Lubin company of twenty-one people on their arrival at Phoenix, Arizona. Over five hundred Phoenicians were at the station to extend the glad hand. A two-reel feature, started at the railroad station in Philadelphia, will be completed in Phoenix at once. Written by Mr. Fielding, it is entitled "West, Two Thousand Miles." The company worked on the picture en route to Phoenix and there will be incorporated in it both eastern and western scenery.

Report from the west coast has it that Ford Sterling is to desert the studio for the stage, a forty week engagement over the Orpheum time being the magnet which drew him away.

Tyrone Power, the distinguished actor, especially engaged by W. N. Selig to enact the star roles in a number of Selig feature pictureplays, was born in England. His grandfather and father were actors and writers.

Florence La Badie, the star of "The Million Dollar Mystery," is credited with wearing evening clothes as tastily as any leading lady appearing before the picture public. Miss La Badie recently took a "vacation," but in reality put in her time, when all her friends imagined her enjoying her liberty to the full, in keeping four dressmakers busy.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 5—Selig—January 18.—Governor Walsh of Massachusetts is seen being inaugurated in this issue of the weekly, also a demonstration of trotol gelatine, the new explosive; President Wilson arriving in Indianapolis for his Jackson Day speech; Rover, a Boston police dog, is seen with his master; the ice harvest near Boston is thoroughly pictured and numerous interesting war scenes are shown, the majority being taken in Austria.

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 6—Selig—January 21.—In this issue of the weekly Japanese war nurses are seen at New York City en route to England; several automobiles leave Washington for the transcontinental race to the Panama Exposition at San Francisco; at the San Diego fair marines are reviewed by Rear Admiral Howard; a close-up view is given of the special educational commission from Mexico upon its arrival in Boston; Earl Cooper is seen in the three hundred mile automobile race at Point Loma, and numerous scenes from the European war zone are contained in the war section of the weekly.

Diogenes Weekly No. 23—Biograph—January 25.—In this film is found another burlesque of the popular topical weekly, the cameraman being old Diogenes, who again crawls out of his tub and taking his trusty motion picture camera, sets off to collect near news and views. On the same reel:

The Boob and the Baker—Biograph—January 25.—The boob wanders into a bakery and flirts with the baker's wife. The boss attacks him with a huge loaf of bread and the boob then enters the restaurant next door and after eating cakes out of the show cases, helping himself to cigars and interrupting a fat man's breakfast is thrown into a huge vat of dough from which he emerges to frighten the baker who, sure he had killed the man, thinks he sees an apparition.

Joey and His Trombone—Edison—January 25.—Edward Boulden, assisted by Gladys Hulette, Dan Mason and Jessie Stevens, make this comedy a thousand feet of real fun. Joey and his trombone drove all Ezra Perkins' customers away and although Ezra was his prospective father-in-law he put Joey out of his store. Joey went to the city, got a job with a German band and Tillie Perkins, his sweetheart, joined him there for she couldn't live at home without him. Somebody insulted Joey's musical dignity and he lost his job. Wandering about Joey and Tillie came to a moving picture studio and applied for work. The director, realizing the opportunity for comedy presented by Joey, his trombone, and Tillie, took them on his cast. They made a bull-fighter out of Joey and a Carmen out of Tillie. The heavy made stage love to Tillie. Things flew thick and fast and it wound up by Joey, Tillie and his faithful trombone taking up their belongings and walking back to the old town. M. C.

Two Hearts that Beat as Ten—Essanay—January 25.—Mildred refuses Archie's proposal of marriage and becomes engaged to Fred. As Fred is leaving the house he helps a young lady to get a cinder out of her eye and Mildred, watching from an upstairs window, thinks he is kissing her. She breaks her engagement and marries Archie, and after the marriage Mildred discovers her husband is the father of four children. Soon after Fred marries a nurse from a hospital and learns with surprise that she is the mother of four children. Several months later Mildred, now a widow, and Fred, now a widower, meet and decide to get married and each is surprised to learn that the other has four children. Wallace Beery and Betty Brown featured. N.G.C.

The Tragedy of Bear Mountain—Kalem—(Two Reels)—January 25.—Benton annoys Edith, the wife of Charlie Barry, one of his employees, and when Charlie learns of this and knocks Benton down, both Charlie and his brother Steve are discharged. Charlie goes west, makes a big strike on Bear Mountain and suffers a fall which causes him to lose all memory of the past. A dead man is later mistaken for Charlie and Edith is informed that her husband is dead. Benton again gets in touch with Edith and after apologizing for his past conduct, secures her promise to marry him, she believing Charlie dead, of course. Steve later visits the west and at the sight of him Charlie recalls the past. When Charlie learns of Edith's approaching marriage, he is horrified and the two brothers manage to reach town and a telegraph office just in time to prevent the wedding, the message arriving just as the minister is preparing to begin the ceremony. Marin Sais featured.

Patsy in Business—(Fifth of the Patsy Bolivar Series)—Lubin—January 25.—Patsy secures a job in a store owned by Mr. Grace, uncle of his friend Tilly, but when he gives a customer caustic soda for bicarbonate of soda, and nearly kills him, he loses his position. Meanwhile, Jack, Mary, Tilly, Jane and Sykesy arrive in the village to attend a church bazaar, and Patsy, who is grieving over the loss of his job, is comforted by Mary, and the two are discovered by Jack, her husband, and Patsy is thrown out of the hotel. He next secures a position in a barber shop and his first customer is Sykesy. After cutting Sykesy two or three times, the two quarrel and Patsy starts after Sykesy with the open razor, is seen by the barber and discharged. Patsy's parents arrive to take him home, but when he goes to the store for his suitcase he touches off the burglar alarm, is pursued by the constable and hurries out of town on the trucks of a freight car.

The Spirit of the Violin—Selig—(Two Reels)—January 25.—John Graham is accused of a murder which he did not commit and sent to prison for life. Mary, his wife, suffers from loneliness and when Rann, a gambler, offers to marry her, after tricking her into believing that her husband is dead, she agrees. Rann then arranges a mock marriage, but just before this takes place Mary is overcome by the spirit of her husband's violin and sends the gambler away. John is freed by the confession of the real murderer and returns to bring happiness to his wife. A review appeared on page 129 of the January 23 issue.

The Slightly Worn Gown—Vitagraph—January 25.—When a gown intended for Isobel, an actress much admired by Mr. Clark, is delivered by accident to Mrs. Clark she becomes angry and suspicious. Mr. Clark manages to convey the gown to Isobel, but insists she must dispose of it, as his wife would recognize it anywhere. She inserts an ad in a newspaper that she has a slightly worn gown for sale. Meanwhile Mr. and Mrs. Dodge are invited to dinner with the Clarks and Mrs. Dodge needs a new dress and having not enough time in which to secure one, is induced by her husband to purchase the worn gown from Isobel. Mrs. Clark at once recognizes the gown worn by Mrs. Dodge and denounces her husband and accuses Mrs. Dodge of being "the other woman." Her husband cannot explain and Mrs. Dodge has no desire to tell that her dress was purchased second-handed, so the party breaks up. Later, however, the modiste who made the gown is induced to call on Mrs. Clark and offer her apologies for having sent a gown and bill to her which should have been delivered to Mrs. Dodge. Charles Brown and Leah Baird featured.

File No. 113—Biograph—(Two Reels)—January 26.—A two-reel adaptation of the famous detective story by Emile Gaboriau. Valentine de la Verherie, a humble country girl, after giving birth to a son, is taken to Paris by her mother, while the child is left with some peasants who promise to care for him. In Paris, Valentine marries the banker Fauvel. Twenty years later, Louis, the brother of the father of Valentine's child, discovers that the girl has made a wealthy marriage and determined to profit by what he knows of her past, he substitutes his companion Raoul for her son, who has died in the meanwhile, and then presents himself to her, threatening to expose her past unless she gives him the key to the bank vaults, and she reluctantly acquiesces. By Fauvel Valentine has a daughter, Madeline, who becomes engaged to Prosper, Fauvel's confidential clerk. The night that Raoul and Louis rob the bank, they leave clues behind which lead to Prosper being suspected of the robbery by M. Lecoq, the celebrated detective, who attempts to solve the mystery of the robbery. Eventually Lecoq obtains a confession of her part in the crime from Valentine and visits the lodgings of Louis and Raoul just as the two kill each other over the booty of the robbery. Prosper is at once released and restored to favor. Fauvel forgives Valentine and she is overjoyed to learn that Raoul was not after all her son.

Olive and the Madhouse—EDISON—JANUARY 26.—Here is a story of a gruesome experience which forms one of the releases of the "Olive's Opportunities" series. Drew Martin and Boggs, the butler, make arrangements with Dr. Spicer of Stormy Hill Asylum to confine Olive without a formal examination. The girl's frantic struggles to break away when she is half-carried in by the two schemers, convince the attendants that she is insane, and when the doctor orders her placed in a cell they follow his instructions without suspecting that the girl is the victim of a plot. Fire breaks out in the asylum, and Vance Coleman, who has learned her whereabouts through a detective agency, arrives just in time to rescue her. C.R.C.

At the End of a Perfect Day—ESSANAY—JANUARY 26.—The story of an old couple sitting in front of a fire-place recalling the happenings of their younger days. The young man had left his country home to seek work in the great city and after finding employment as office boy in the same office with a young lady, had been bullied by the other employees, until the girl took his part. One day the employer tried to force his affections upon the young lady, and the office boy rushed to the latter's rescue. Shortly afterward they were married and now at the end of a perfect day, find themselves comfortably seated at their own fireside. Bryant Washburn and Gerda Holmes featured. N.G.C.

A Model Wife—KALEM—JANUARY 26.—Having lost her allowance at bridge, Mrs. Morton decides to earn money herself by posing as an artist's model. Starr, the artist for whom she poses, has a studio with Lockwood, a sculptor, who has just sold a statue to Mr. Morton. Starr receives visitors unexpectedly and induces his model to hide in the case prepared for the shipment of the statue. The case is later delivered to Morton's, and upon opening it he is amazed to behold his wife. Thoroughly angry, he rushes to the studio and mistakes one of Starr's visitors for the artist, engaging him in a rough and tumble battle. Ruth Roland featured. On the same reel is:

Fatty's Echo—KALEM—JANUARY 26.—Fatty and Hungry Ike, both starving, plan to deceive some tourists. Hungry Ike is hidden and Fatty informs the tourists that he can show them the most wonderful echo in the world. When a tourist shouts, Ike plays the echo. When the guide becomes suspicious he urges that the whole party shout together. Ike forgets his part and shouts back, demanding to know whether they think him a crowd. This results in both Fatty and Ike being chased away. John Brennan featured.

Green Backs and Red Skins—LUBIN—JANUARY 26.—Wilhelm Holehogg is advised that he has inherited one million dollars. He and his friend Frenchy go to collect and give away thousands. Lord Cashin was a mighty hunter according to his own stories, and after his description of choking a rhinoceros, Wilhelm and Frenchy set forth for the woods, and there are captured by Chief Battleax, who orders them shot as spies. The Princess Right Wing saves them and they marry into the tribe.

The Grizzly Gulch Chariot Race—SELIG—JANUARY 26.—A farce comedy with action a-la-Keystone, effectively "put over," through the efforts of Tom Mix, Dick Crawford, Inez Walker and Sid Jordan. There is no let-up to the fun and some of the things the players do are real hair-raisers from the thrill point of view. Mr. Mix especially takes a long chance of being injured by allowing himself to be dragged through two scenes clinging to the reins of two runaway horses. The plot deals with the attempt of two cowboys to win the love of a petite maiden of considerable proportions. A shrimp also enters the contest for her hand, but is roughly handled by the big fellows, though he manages to cause them considerable trouble. When portraits of a chariot race are given away at the village store the maiden decides that the two strong lovers must race in their carts to see which wins her. The race scenes are full of excitement and fun. While they are thus engaged the shrimp gives the maiden a ride on his bicycle and marries her before the others return. A picture worth booking. C. J. C.

The Game of Life—VITAGRAPH—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 26.—Larry Stanwood, son of a prominent politician, loves Madge, sister of Pug Wilson, a gambler. He gives her a locket which is later taken from her by Crowley, another admirer. Learning what has happened to the locket, Larry rushes off to face Crowley, but Crowley has lost the locket in a card game with Pug and after a quarrel is killed by Pug. Larry enters at this time, finds Crowley dead, secures the locket and returns it to Madge. Pug is later arrested, convicted and taken to the prison hospital. In the meanwhile Larry's father runs for governor and Beldon and Williams, two politicians, learn of Larry's interest in Madge and threaten Mr. Stanwood with exposing his boy as a murderer unless he voluntarily withdraws from the election. Pug, meanwhile, dying, signs a confession which Larry and Madge use to foil the politicians. Myrtle Gonzalez and Alfred Vosburgh featured.

The Terrible Trunk—EDISON—JANUARY 27.—A laughable comedy in which Cora Williams, Edward Boulden and Dan Baker are featured. Luke, the town sport, in love with the widow Smith, is jealous because she favors Reuben, a country simpleton, and vows vengeance. One day when the widow and Luke visit a store to buy a trunk and Reuben accompanies the widow, Luke shoves his rival into a trunk and locks it. The widow misses Reuben and is told by Luke that Reuben just passed on the street with a lady friend. The widow orders the trunk sent home and later discovers Reuben within it. The two then turn the tables on Luke and imprison him in the trunk, after which it is removed and hurled into the river. Eventually Luke escapes from his misery and everything ends well.

Lodging for Two—EDISON—JANUARY 27.—There are many laughs in this comedy. William Wadsworth and Arthur Houseman provide the fun and a small town during fair week plus a store window containing a bedroom set afford them fun-making situations. Edward O'Connor appears as the night watchman. The story concerns Rayden and Phelps, two gentlemen from rural parts unknown, who come to the city to attend the fair. They become separated and endeavor to find respective lodgings but fair week has filled every hotel and boarding house. Each, respectively, gazes longingly at the set-up bedroom in the store window and bribe the doorkeeper to admit them. Rayden has already retired when Phelps comes to take possession. Thinking each other store burglars, they engage in a chase which leads to recognition after which they retire in peace. Their awakening is an awkward one, as they are the center of attention for a gaping crowd outside the window. M.C.

The Fable of the Syndicate Lover—Essanay—January 27.—Kate has a beau named George. George loves the girl so hard that he loves all of her relatives. He thought it his duty to shop with mother, to go shooting with father, to go to the gym with brother and even slops over by sending flowers to sister Lil. When mother tires of his shopping, father of his shooting, brother of his gym pranks and Lil of his flirtations, George is about to give up in despair, but Kate tells him if he wants her, he will have to make love to her rather than to her family. N.G.C.

The Affair of the Deserted House—(1st Episode of the Girl Detective Series)—Kalem—January 27.—Rumson, a counterfeiter, is wounded escaping from the police, and others in the gang who have never seen Rumson's daughter Kate, plan to have her carry away the dies, thinking she will not be suspected. Ruth, who happens to be dressed the same as Kate, is mistaken for her and receives the dies. She learns, of course, where they are to be deliverd, sends a dispatch to the police and then boldly enters the house, where she is recognized as someone else than Kate, and overpowered. The police arrive and only Blair, Rumson's assistant, escapes. In the raid which follows the chief of police learns of Ruth's courage, offers her a position as special investigator, and she accepts. Ruth Roland featured.

The Attorney for the Defense—Lubin—(Three Reels)—January 27.—Frederic Stratton, a young lawyer, sees a chance to increase his reputation by accepting the defense of one Basset, charged with the murder of his employer, Mrs. Hamlin. Ruth Wingate, his fiancee, is horrified when she learns that Stratton has taken the case of the murderer, but he convinces her the man is innocent and Ruth praises him for his stand. Stratton succeeds in winning Basset's acquittal on a technicality and is immediately called to another city on a similar case. Ruth's chauffeur meets with an accident and Basset is given the position. When Stratton learns this he is well nigh distracted, since he knows Basset to have been guilty and threatened with death by his pals for the crime because of his failure to divide the spoils of his murder. Basset, driving Ruth on a lonely road one day, is waylaid by his two pals and the uncontrolled car dashes over the edge of a bridge. Ruth and Basset are badly injured, but on his death bed Basset confesses, and Ruth then knows for the first time that Stratton knew of the murderer's guilt, and when he visits her later and promises never to defend another criminal, she forgives him for deceiving her and the two renew their engagement. John Ince and Ethel Clayton featured.

Heart's Desire—Selig—January 27.—For a novel way of reuniting lovers who have been separated, this drama comes close to taking the prize. After Ann Merrick has been dismissed as social secretary to Mrs. Knox because Guy Knox, the son, is in love with her, she goes away and becomes the secretary of a charitable organization in another city. Guy goes to the mountains and one day a tiny balloon descends near his cabin, which tells him to come to Miss Merrick at the headquarters of the charitable association, and he may have whatever his heart desires. The balloons were sent up by Ann, so that all poor children finding them could have whatever they wanted. When Guy arrives and tells Ann of his heart's desire, it is granted and she marries him. Worked into the story are numerous human interest touches of delightful quality, in which a number of poor children figure prominently. Edith Johnson appears as Ann and Charles Wheelock plays opposite her as Guy. C. J. C.

The Homecoming of Henry—Vitagraph—January 27.—Henry Hannibal and his wife on the third day of their vacation in their country bungalow are separated, when Henry is called back to the city on business. He writes Mrs. Hannibal that he may be absent for some time as he has to make a trip West and she promptly rents the bungalow to four young ladies and then goes to her mother's. Henry, ignorant of this and having concluded his business much earlier than he had expected, returns home and to surprise his wife enters stealthily. He is overpowered by the four girls and after some difficulty manages to get himself released. The girls then treat him very kindly in an endeavor to make up for their holding him a prisoner. Mrs. Hannibal, learning of his return, visits the bungalow and is amazed to find him on such good terms with the girls. Henry explains everything satisfactorily and a genuine homecoming celebration results. Sidney Drew featured.

Milady's Boudoir—Biograph—January 28.—Nellie, one of the girls in the department store, is selected for a window demonstration and shortly afterwards spends many hours each day in a beautiful boudoir, which has been arranged in the show window. Jack Benson, a wealthy bachelor, seeing Nellie in the show window is struck by her beauty and that night as he is passing the store he is held up by a robber. Nellie entranced by the beautiful boudoir in which she spent several hours daily, eludes the watchman and plans to spend a night in the luxurious surroundings. When Jack is held up outside the window, he slashes at the robber with his cane, misses him and breaks the show window. Nellie, peering out from inside, beholds the robber and screams, thus frightening the robber away. A policeman arrives, arrests Jack and ridicules his story of what happened. Nellie, meanwhile, is discharged from her position in the store and by chance notes in a newspaper the story of Jack's trial. She appears, and testifies in Jack's behalf, thereby freeing him. Jack promptly proposes, marries her and on the return from their honeymoon installs her in a boudoir far more beautiful than the one in which she played lady.

When Slippery Slim Bought the Cheese—Essanay—January 28.—Slippery Slim, calling on Sophie, was chased off the premises by Hiram, her father. Sophie manages to write a note on his cuff telling him to call that evening after her father has retired. Mustang learns of Slim's date, and determines to have some fun. While Slim is calling on Sophie that evening, Mustang slips some limberger cheese into his pocket, and not only Sophie is disturbed, but father is brought on to the scene by the odor of the cheese. He chases both Slim and Mustang, who take refuge at the top of a telephone pole. Father starts to chop down the pole, but Slim lowers the cheese on a string and father is forced to leave. Victor Potel featured. N.G.C.

In Her Mother's Footsteps—Lubin—(Two Reels)—January 28.—Raymond Longstreth paints a madonna, using his wife, Helen, as a model. He is intensely jealous of Harold Winters, an art dealer and a former rival for Helen's hand. Helen and Harold are seen together and Raymond's jealousy is further aroused when Harold buys the madonna picture from the art gallery, not knowing that he is really acting as an agent for Clayton Burroughs. Even the birth of his baby does not lessen the husband's jealousy, and when later he finds Helen and Harold together again he drives his wife from home. Years afterwards Helen, under the name of Mrs. Raymond, becomes housekeeper for Dr. Marriott, and her daughter Naomi is also taken into the household. Sterling Burroughs, son of the art collector, meets and falls in love with Naomi and when the picture of the madonna owned by the elder Burroughs is destroyed by fire, he institutes a search for the artist in the hope of securing a new picture. Harold succeeds in finding Raymond, now a wanderer, but the latter declares it would be impossible to paint another madonna. Burroughs promises to obtain a model, having noted the likeness of his son's fiancee, and Naomi finally consents to pose, although she discloses to her sweetheart that she is the artist's daughter. Raymond is amazed by the resemblance of the girl to his wife and while he is sunken in reverie she steals from the studio and Helen, his wife, takes her place. The two thus re-united decide to begin life anew. Lilie Leslie and Jack Standing featured.

Black and White—MINA—JANUARY 28.—Harry La Pearl, the famous circus clown, appears in this Mina release as a negro, who answers an advertisement for a servant to the Newlywed family. While the family are dining he gets into many comic mix-ups. Later Mr. Newlywed decides to go to a cabaret with his guests and Mrs. Newlywed discovers in the meanwhile that the new butler is not colored and decides to have him escort her to the same cabaret that her husband is attending. There his absurd antics start a riot among the guests and Mrs. Newlywed faints. La Pearl is thrown out of the cabaret and Mr. Newlywed discovers that the lady in the case is his wife. He takes her home, but La Pearl has restored his makeup and is busy making bread when the Newlyweds arrive. He is discharged after a row, but not ejected until he has squashed a pan of dough on his irate master's head.

The Barrier of Faith—VITAGRAPH—JANUARY 28.—Jacob Aaron, learning his daughter Rose has married Harold Weston, a Christian, curses and disowns her. When Rose and her husband seek a reconciliation they discover that her parents are moaning for Rose as one of the dead. Months later Rose's husband is killed in a barroom brawl and on the night of the Feast of the Passover, the lonely girl again visits her home. The mother is ill from grief and worry, though still able to assist her husband with the customary rites for the Feast of the Passover. In accordance with the Jewish ceremony, one of the party opens the hall door for all those who are in need of food and drink and they are all amazed to find Rose standing in the doorway with arms outstretched to her mother. Gradually the barriers of faith are removed and the girl is received back by her father and mother. Van Dyke Brooke and Norma Talmadge featured.

Her Slumbering Conscience—BIOGRAPH—JANUARY 29.—All her husband's funds are tied up and she is induced by a friend to order an expensive new dress. The gown is sent C. O. D. and her husband refuses it as he has no money. Shortly afterwards he introduces her to a business friend and he makes her a present of a bracelet. Though she does not mistake the man's intentions, she accepts the gift and later when the man calls upon her and they are surprised by her husband both she and the man are ordered out of the house. Later her husband follows, bursts into the room and she gives a shriek of fear—then awakes to find her husband standing over her all smiles saying, "the big deal went through and the gown is yours." She realizes then for the first time that it was a dream.

An Invitation and an Attack—EDISON—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 29.—This is the third episode of the "Young Lord Stranleigh" series, featuring Marc MacDermott. The syndicate's gang land and start loading the Rajah with ore, all of which Stranleigh, who has landed and camped a short distance away, views with perfect indifference. After a battle with his lordship's forces in which they are badly whipped the syndicate's gang sets out for London with their cargo of ore. Stranleigh follows, and, as they near the port, overtakes the Rajah, captures it, and brings the shipload of ore into port without having to lift a hand in the trouble of handling it. This is a distinctive victory over the ring of brokers who seek to ruin the MacKellers.

The Ambition of the Baron—ESSANAY—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 29.—A thrilling story of love and intrigue in which Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne are featured. Baron von Tollen, with his daughter Annetta as a bait, entraps Count de Lugnan into a plot to start up a revolution in Leutala, the plan being to make the count king, after the country has been conquered. Arrived in Leutala the count and Captain Tanner, an army officer, quarrel over Annetta. The captain exposes the plot and the count, baron and Annetta are forced to flee the country. Annetta has meanwhile really fallen in love and the baron gives his consent to their marriage. See review on page 121, issue of January 23.

The Language of the Dumb—LUBIN—JANUARY 29.—Bob Owen, superintendent of a bread plant, loves Helen Page, an heiress. Holt also loves Helen, and finding himself on the verge of ruin knows he must marry her in order to keep up his social position, and finding Bob in his path he plots with one of Bob's men to have him implicated in a crime which will send him to the penitentiary. It happens that a motion picture is being made of the bread plant, and Breen, Holt's tool, stands in the foreground of the scene and confides the plot against Bob to a confederate. Later Bob is brought to trial on a charge of murder and robbery, and the evidence of his guilt, though false, is apparently conclusive. Helen, who is much interested in a school for deaf and dumb children, has the picture shown there and is amazed to learn that by lip reading it is possible to understand what Breen is talking about and consequently learns that Bob is innocent. She arranges to have the picture shown in the court-room and as a result Bob is acquitted and Holt and his tools arrested. William Cohill and Justina Huff featured.

She Wanted to Be a Widow—SELIG—JANUARY 29.—A farce comedy in which fast and furious action furnishes the fun. Lyllian Brown Leighton, Elsie Greeson and William Scott dance through the thousand feet of film and their work, coupled with the comical incidents will draw many laughs. Gladys, living in the city, gets a letter from her country uncle stating that if she will marry her cousin Hiram a fortune will be given to them.

As Hiram is a country rube, she objects. Hiram arrives in the city, gets mixed up with a crew of gamblers and loses all the money he has with him. Seeing a chance to make some money on the gambling tables, he borrows five hundred dollars from Gladys and, in return, marries her and agrees to make her a widow within a month. He risks the five hundred dollars in a gambling den and makes a fortune. Gladys is determined to do away with him and secures the assistance of an undertaker. The incidents which follow deal with the attempts of the undertaker to make Gladys a widow and secure business for himself. Eventually the girl discovers that Hiram is a "regular fellow," and when she learns that he now has a fortune of his own she decides that she wants him to live, despite the fact that the uncle has disowned both of them because of their actions.

The Chief's Goat—VITAGRAPH—JANUARY 29.—When Deacon Jameson and his bosom friend, Tom Boles, win a horse race from Gus Wheelock, chief of police of Bricktown, the latter is such a hard loser that he telephones ahead and orders the arrest of the deacon and Tom. In court Wheelock gets them fined $100 each and they, boiling with rage, threaten to "get even." They first secure White Star, a famous trotter, and get the chief to bet $100 on another race, permitting him to win. The chief is tickled and thinks White Star a slow nag. A week later at the county fair the chief backs his mare, Mollie, to the limit, while Boles and the deacon cover all his bets. After an exciting race White Star wins and Tom and the deacon, grinning from ear to ear, face the almost paralyzed chief. Harry Morey and Wally Van featured.

The Dancer's Ruse—BIOGRAPH—JANUARY 30.—Lydia, a famous dancer, is beloved by the military governor of a Russian province. Dimitroff, her sweetheart, learns that her brother is to be executed and she sends him to the governor with a note asking the governor's favor for the bearer. Dimitroff is taken into the governor's service as a butler and on the eve of her brother's execution, Lydia visits him in his private apartments none others being present save Dimitroff, who serves them with wine. The girl secures the governor's autograph and Dimitroff puts a sleeping potion in his liquor , and immediately he is unconscious, the butler, who greatly resembles him, dons the governor's uniform, while Lydia writes her brother's pardon beneath the signature obtained from the governor and then Lydia and Dimitroff enter the governor's private car, drive to the prison, present the pardon, hurry her brother into the car and escape across the frontier.

In His Father's Footsteps—Edison—January 30.—The feature of this picture, which is an educational subject dealing with hygienic farming, is the thrilling bare-back riding of Patrick O'Malley who plays the part of the farm hand, Fred. The story is interesting and brings its point out clearly, that is, that sanitary conditions, not tradition, is the only weapon with which present day diseases can be conquered. The exterior photography is unusually fine. Sally angers her father by sending to Washington for books on scientific farming. Farmer Griggs takes pride in the fact that his grandfather and father before him ran the farm without trouble, and guesses that he can do the same. Later Sally is taken ill, and Fred rides hard and recklessly for the doctor. He tells the farmer that she is threatened with typhoid fever due to drinking the water from the old well. This and the sanitary commission awakens Griggs' sense of duty, and in a few weeks his farm is on a level with the best. C.R.C.

Broncho Billy and the False Note—Essanay—January 30.—While on the round-up, Broncho's rival steals his sweetheart's picture from Broncho's watch. He returns it to the girl saying that Broncho has fallen in love with another girl and so is returning her photo. Believing Broncho's love dead, the girl marries his rival, but as years go by the man becomes cruel and finally she breaks down from abuse and hunger. One day while she is being horse-whipped some cowboys happen along and rescue her. Her husband flees to town and gives himself up to the sheriff, who happens to be Broncho Billy. Broncho recognizes him, but protects him from a horrible death at the hands of the cowboys. N.G.C.

The Little Engineer—Kalem—January 30.—While Hastings, the engineer of a freight train, is at lunch, Bobby Heywood, a little boy, climbs into the cab, and having seen his father operate the machinery, jerks the throttle open. Helen, telegrapher at Lone Point, sees what is happening and on a gasoline velocipede starts in pursuit of the train. Helen leaps aboard the caboose, when she finally catches up with the runaway freight, and climbs over the cars, reaches the engine and averts a frightful wreck. Helen Holmes featured.

Another Shade of Green—Lubin—January 30.—Peter Green, somewhat henpecked, is extremely jealous of his wife, Samantha, when she takes in a boarder named Briggs. He thinks she loves the other man and determines to kill himself that she may have him. Later he determines on a trick and leaves a note saying he has jumped in the well. Samantha having discovered that Briggs, the new boarder, is wanted by the police, determines to get the reward for his capture. Peter, in a ghost make-up, attempts to frighten them and Samantha makes love to Briggs, finally inducing him to accompany her to the constable's, where he is arrested for wife desertion, and she gets the reward. Peter, who has followed, thinking they are about to be married, arrives at this time and learns that his wife still loves him when she hands over the reward money to him.

The Hut in Sycamore Gap—Selig—January 30.—Banker Wilson and his daughter Helen visit a secluded spot in the woods. The girl asks her father to tell her of his errand, but he refuses, for he is there to secure some counterfeit bills, which he distributes. The daughter meets one of the counterfeiters and falls in love with him. Two detectives arrive and the guilty men are finally exposed. Wilson commits suicide and the counterfeiter is led off to jail. Helen learns to love one of the detectives, while the other one becomes engaged to the sister of the counterfeiter. C. J. C.

Undearneath the Paint—Vitagraph—(Three Reels)—January 30.—Walking through the Ghetto, Arthur Kellogg rescues Tryphena Winters, an actress, and her little sister, Salome, from starvation. He falls in love with, and proposes marriage to Tryphena, but she tells him that she must first make her success on the stage. Kellogg, senior, a theatrical backer and financier, learns of his son's love affair and asks Tryphena to give up Arthur. She refuses, and finding his son equally obstinate, Kellogg angrily disowns him. The financier learns of Tryphena's burning ambition to become a star and cunningly appeals to this one weak spot in her opposition. He demands she renounce Arthur in his (Kellogg's) presence, promising to fulfill her ambitions should she carry out his plans. She agrees, but secretly sends a note to Arthur beforehand, begging him not to believe anything she may do or say at the meeting. Unfortunately, the note miscarries. Arthur meets her and not understanding her dissimulated renunciation of him, bitterly says farewell and plunges into a life of gayety. Later, conscience-stricken at the wrecking of his son's life, Kellogg destroys himself. Arthur visits the theater to see Tryphena, now a prominent star, and there is handed the long-lost note. He interrupts the performance to ask Tryphena if she sent it. The curtain is rung down and Arthur tells her he never received the note until that moment. She now understands it all and after a joyful reunion with her lover, steps out upon the stage again and the play goes on. Helen Gardner and Gladden James featured.

Mutual Program

Craft Versus Love—Thanhouser—(Two Reels)—January 19.—Henry Williams doubts the integrity of Lawyer Newell, the executor of his father's estate, and interviews him at his office. Violet Grey, Harry's fiancee, becomes worried when she does not hear from him and calls at Newell's office. The lawyer is out, but Violet frightens the stenographer into confessing that Newell and an accomplice had been closeted in the private office with a young man the night before. Violet then induces the girl to go away on a visit, and she takes her place. Newell falls in love with his new stenographer who, intent on finding Harry, searches the office until she finds a letter giving a clue to his whereabouts. She rescues him from the private asylum in which he has been confined, outwits Newell in his attempt to secure possession of the Williams estate, and Harry comes into his rightful property.

The Sea Brat—Reliance—January 20.—A boy whom an old fisherman has rescued from the ocean is known only as the "sea brat." One day while sitting on the shore he has a horrible dream in which he sees himself as the murderer of his guardian and the possessor of all of the old miser's gold, which he offers to his sweetheart, a fisher girl. The village priest wakes up the brat, and they go back to the cottage, where they find the old man dead.

A Lucky Blow-out—Broncho—(Two Reels)—January 20.—Annie Crum refuses to marry John Harding, saying that she could never endure the drudgery of farm life. Fired with an ambition to go to New York, she runs away from her uncle's home, and obtains a position as a salesgirl in the city at a salary of $4 a week. Annie finds that she is unable to live on such low wages, and wonders how Ruth, the girl at the next counter, can dress so well when her salary is about the same. Ruth's answer to her question horrifies Annie, and at the first opportunity, she returns to her uncle's farm. Harding suggests selling the place and moving to the city, but Annie tells him that her choice is simple farm life.

The Man Who Died—Kay Bee—January 22.—Joe Lebarge, a highwayman sought by the Canadian Mounted Police, escapes to the little town of Grand

Pierre in the guise of a clergyman. The people receive him with open arms, and he lives up to his part by holding services, tending to the sick, and doing all the good he can in the community. An officer of the police, stranded in Grand Pierre, recognizes Lebarge, and sends him to Sergeant Grey at headquarters with a letter disclosing the man's identity. Grey, believing that Lebarge is sincere in his good work, sends him back to the officer with a letter stating that the real Lebarge, highwayman, died some time ago.

Sergeant Jim's Horse—KAY BEE—JANUARY 22.—The young sergeant gives up his beloved horse, Midnight, to his superior officer when the latter's steed is killed. The faithful animal deserts his new master to console and protect the sergeant when he sees the latter lying on the ground, fatally wounded. The final scene shows the beautiful black charger kneeling on the sergeant's grave. On the same reel is:—

An Innocent Burglar—PRINCESS—JANUARY 22.—Edwin Marshall's wild ways are a constant source of worry to his parents and sister, Mary. To secure money to pay his gambling debts Edwin enters the home of Hal Davis, who is in love with Mary. Hal's generosity in promising to keep his secret and in giving him money with which to pay his debts moves Edwin to reform. Later he meets Hal's sister, Helen, and they become lovers. Hal presents Mary with a valuable necklace which she thoughtlessly leaves on the top of a dresser near an open window. It mysteriously disappears, and all but Helen think Edwin guilty. The girl turns detective and finds out that the real burglar is an organ-grinder's monkey, saving Edwin from a term in prison for the theft.

After Twenty Years—RELIANCE—JANUARY 22.—Tom Evans, his wife and child live happily on their little place in Arizona—until the craze to see a big city and the thirst for gold get hold of Tom. He strikes it rich at Cripple Creek and journeys to Chicago to enjoy his wealth, forgetting all about his wife and child. Twenty years later he returns home, and is openly threatened in a saloon by his now grown-up son. The next day Tom is found lying unconscious at the bottom of the arroyo, and the boy is arrested for assaulting him, but is released when Tom recovers and testifies that it was an accident. A reconciliation is effected between him and his family.

The Craven—RELIANCE—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 23.—Bud Walton, the village blacksmith, is big and strong, but lacks the courage to defend himself against the attacks of men and boys much smaller than he. May, Bud's sister, is attracted to a handsome stranger, Sykes. One day while the pair are walking near the edge of a cliff the man attempts to embrace May. In resisting she falls over the precipice and is killed. Will, Bud's assistant, follows Sykes, who has left town, and tries to avenge the girl's death, but returns badly wounded. June, Bud's sweetheart, arraigns him for his cowardice. Stung by her sharp words, Bud determines to kill Sykes or die in the attempt. He brings the murderer back dead, throws his body at June's feet, and then drops dead from the wounds received during the fight.

Her Hero—ROYAL—JANUARY 23.—To test his daughter's suitor a wealthy business man gives him a sum of money, telling him that to every dollar he makes he will add one thousand dollars. The suitor buys a photograph gallery, and, after many amusing experiences with patrons, frames up and photographs a fake robbery in which he is seen to rescue his sweetheart. The father's severity melts before this proof of gallantry, and he gives them his blessing.

The Better Man—MAJESTIC—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 24.—At the invitation of an ambitious aunt, Lord Dunster visits the "Lazy L Ranch." Agnes Crosby, the owner, welcomes him as her aunt's friend, and fulfills her duties as hostess. Jim Murray, the range-boss, who loves Agnes, mistakes her motives in riding with Lord Dunster and forever trying to entertain him, and thinks himself forgotten. At the aunt's suggestion he leaves the ranch and attempts to forget the girl, whom he thinks would have married Dunster months before but for his presence. The Englishman, who has come to love Agnes unselfishly, confesses his mercenary intention in visiting the ranch, and begs her to marry him. She is impressed by his manly spirit, but refuses him, telling him that there is someone else. Dunster guesses that Jim is the lucky rival, and sends for him.

The Dog Catcher's Bride—THANHOUSER—JANUARY 24.—Cy Beggs, village dog catcher, and his wife arrange a dog show to entice more canines to town. When the exhibits arrive they put them in the wagon and drive them off to the pound. Hamlet Boggs, leading man in a theatrical company, vows vengeance on Mrs. Beggs, who has repelled his advances, and opens the door of the wagon, releasing the canines. Cy hands the reins to his wife, overtakes Boggs, thrusts him into the wagon with the puppies, and drives him off to the pound.

Silence—AMERICAN—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 25.—Insanity is inherited by the Morris family through two generations. The family doctor knows of this, but allows his silence to be bought by the mother of Frank Morris, Jr., the representative of the third generation. Later Frank marries the doctor's daughter, despite the protests of both their parents. For a while all is well but at last he, too, becomes insane and takes his wife's life. The doctor then realizes his grave mistake. A review of this subject appears on page 159 of this issue.

Evans' Lucky Day—BEAUTY—JANUARY 26.—Cleverly handled double exposure work enables Joseph Harris to play opposite himself in this picture and is the means of creating a good comedy situation. The action moves forward swiftly and the film will draw many laughs. Virginia Kirtley and Kathryn Wilson have the female leads. The plot deals with the making of a date with a soubrette by a married man, and the discovery of this fact by his wife. A young man wishes to marry a girl and is told he may do so by her father, if he can sesure two hundred dollars within a few hours. It happens that the married man and the young man are identical in appearance, and when the wife catches the married man in a cafe with the other woman, the man pays his double two hundred dollars to impersonate him. When the wife learns that she has made a mistake in accusing the young man, she adds another hundred dollars to his fund, and he sets off to claim his wife, while the husband enters the cafe and squares things with his wife. A clever comedy, well put over. C.J.C.

The Broken Lullaby—MAJESTIC—JANUARY 26.—A young mother vainly tries to lull her baby to sleep, while her drunken husband and his cronies carouse in an adjoining room. At last, in despair, she carries the child to the barn, and puts it to sleep in the warm hay. A farm hand, who secretly loves the young wife, finds it there and takes it to his own shack. Later, the drunken father stumbles out to the barn, and falls asleep in the hay. His pipe falls from his mouth, ignites the dry hay, and when the mother awakes a short time later the barn is all in flames. She attempts to rush in to certain death to search for her child but the farm hand prevents her, assuring her that the baby is safe in his house. The drunkard perishes in the flames.

The Finger Prints of Fate—THANHOUSER—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 26.—When William Gray is discovered lying dead in the library and his recently disinherited nephew bending over him the police naturally suppose that the latter is the guilty one. There is one that knows that the prisoner is not guilty, Gray's stenographer. She had been in the room before him, and, thinking him guilty of the crime, had covered up the finger print that she found on the safe. Hearing someone coming she stepped behind the curtains, saw the nephew enter, pick up her glove which was lying on the floor, and try to divert suspicion from her. The girl reasons that since he suspects her of being the guilty one he must be innocent himself, sets herself to the task of clearing up the case. The pretty little stenographer is equal to the emergency, and proves conclusively that another is guilty of the murder.

Coals of Fire—AMERICAN—JANUARY 27.—Despite the fact that this production does not seem to make its point, it is decidedly worth while, and the acting of Harry Von Meter adds much to it. John Vincent, a factory owner, upon the death of his wife, neglects his little girl and devotes his entire attention to his son. The girl is raised at boarding school and later in life is happily married to a young man, whom she meets. The son becomes a partner in his father's firm and Vincent's entire time is devoted to the boy until one of the workmen, whose mind is demented, kills the boy. The daughter has become a mother to a little boy and girl and when she hears that her father's mind has been affected by the loss of his son, she goes to him, but he will have nothing to do with her. She leads her little boy to him, and Vincent, thinking it is his own son returned in his boyhood, clasps him to his breast. And as the days pass she allows the deception to continue in order to make her father happy. C.J.C.

The Gun Fighter — Broncho—(Two Reels)—January 27.—Tucson, a professional "gun fighter," orders Rhita, his girl, to dispose of their little baby whom he despises, looking upon it as an intruder. The Lawsons find the baby, take it home, and become very fond of it. Later the Lawsons settle on grazing ground just outside of the village, and defy Santro, a Mexican rancher, to make them vacate. Santro hires Tucson to kill Lawson. The "gun fighter" horsewhips the homesteader in the village store, and orders him never to enter the village again. A few weeks later exhausted supplies necessitate Lawson's purchasing at the store. Tucson hears of his presence in town, and prepares to carry out his agreement with Santro. Rhita learns of it and ties his gun to the holster, determined that her baby shall not be deprived of its protector. Tucson confronts Lawson and attempts to pull his gun, but cannot get it out of the holster, and is killed by Lawson.

The Volunteer Fireman—Thanhouser—January 29.—Here is an excruciatingly funny farce-comedy depicting a fire company which holds victory in love more sacred than the glory of extinguishing a blaze. Minnie Berlin, Dave Thompson, and Clifford Saumo are the chief fun-makers in the picture.

There he and Marie meet again and become reunited.

When Eddie Took a Bath—Nestor—January 26.—Shortly after their marriage Lee and Bess invite the former's friend, Eddie, to visit them. Before the guest's arrival the newlyweds quarrel about a cracker bowl, and both leave to purchase one. During their absence Eddie arrives, and, finding no one at home, enters and proceeds to take a bath and get spruced up. Many complications and misunderstandings result when Lee and Bess return, but they are all straightened out in time.

Cancelled — Eclair — (Two Reels) — January 27.—In a little Eastern village Clayton Emrick is the butt of many hard, boyish tricks because of his weak constitution. One day a bully, Ed Dunlap, saves him from a severe beating, and the two become firm friends. Years later Emrick, now a wealthy lawyer, in touring the West falls into the hands of a band of desperadoes who have long and successfully defied the law. The leader of the band, who has directed the operations from their rendezvous, decides to leave the country when the governor sends the cavalry to scour the district for him. He is captured and brought face to face with Emrick who recognizes him as his boyhood protector, Dunlap. The outlaw is taken to jail, but has the consolation of knowing that Emrick will see that his family is not left in want.

Merry Mary's Marriage—L-Ko—January 27.—The sheriff convinces Mary that his rival, Rube, drinks, and Mary almost gives in to the sheriff's charms, but discovers that he, too, drinks. Angered, she accepts Rube and they are married. During the time between the ceremony and the villagers' visit Rube manages to become intoxicated. Mary hides him in an ash barrel. The neighbors see her throw out the limp form and have her arrested for murder. Rube recovers from the influence of the liquor while Mary is being put through the third degree, and immediately things began to fly.

The Unmasking—Big U—January 28.—Lorrenzo, a young, ambitious Italian comes to this country, promising his wife that he will send for her and the child when he has saved up enough money for their passage. At Ellis Island Lorrenzo meets a debonaire, Americanized Italian who, after much coaxing, induces him to cut off his beard and adopt the American style of clothes. When Lorrenzo has enough money to send for his wife and baby a girl enters into his life, and impressed with his personality, induces her father to take him into his firm. The Italian's wife and child come to America to seek him. Lorrenzo finds them employed in the factory of which he is the head and they become reconciled.

Alias Mr. Smith—Big U—January 28.—Frank Wilson, alias Mr. Smith, arrives in a small western town and stops at the Andrews home. Here he meets Alice Andrews and they become quite friendly. One day they go horseback riding and on the road Mr. Smith is signaled by a stranger. He fakes a fall from his horse and while Alice returns home for help he and the stranger make arrangements for the division of some plunder. Newton overhears them and notifies the sheriff. Mr. Smith is carried to the Andrews home. Late that night he escapes from the house, whereupon Andrews and his hired man give chase. The story ends with a reconciliation between Alice and Frank.

The Measure of a Man—Rex—(Two Reels)—January 28.—Bob Brandt, a young gambler and adventurer, stops for a time at Bear Lake, there becomes acquainted with Helen McDermott, the factor's daughter. He persuades her to elope with him, and it is not until six months later that Helen learns that Bob is crooked. While in the woods Bob accidentally shoots himself in the shoulder. Jim Stuart of the North West Mounted Police finds Helen and Bob and takes them to headquarters where Bob is cared for. Jim realizes that he is slowly but surely falling in love with Helen. To prevent trouble he leaves. Shortly afterwards Bob finds Helen's diary and reads in it a confession of her love for Jim. He follows his friend, overtakes him, and induces him to return. Bob then makes preparations to leave the country, but Helen is filled again with her old love for her husband and begs him to stay.

The Treasure Seekers—STERLING—JANUARY 28.—Meyer visits his friend Heinze in the latter's grocery store, and the pair drink hard cider and discuss the probabilities of a treasure chart. They fall asleep and dream that they are shipwrecked on a cannibal island. After a series of hair-raising experiences they wake up with a start to find that Heinze's cigar has started a fire about them.

The Millionaire Engineer—IMP—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 29.—Daniel Spencer, a self-made man, has acquired a great fortune and is president of a railroad. A reception given by him to his wealthy neighbors in honor of his engagement to Maude Allyne is interrupted by a mob of his railroad employes who insist on more pay. Spencer resents their domineering attitude, and defies them to strike. Maude gives him back her ring, and spends most of her time helping the strikers' families, refusing to speak to her fiance until he has ended the strike. One day news comes that a forest fire has encircled a distant orphan asylum. The enginemen refuse to run a train of cars to the rescue, so Spencer takes the train through the blazing forest himself, and saves the children in the asylum. The strikers approve heartily of his brave act, and the good will they bear towards their employer brings about a settlement of the strike. Spencer and Maude become reconciled.

Jed's Little Elopement—NESTOR—JANUARY 29.—Jed has the only automobile in town and, although it is a little ancient, it suits his sweetheart. Then a city drummer appears with a big, high-powered car and Jed's troubles start. The girl's father insists on her marrying the drummer, and to escape such a fate she agrees to elope with Jed. More trouble results from Jed's placing the ladder under Father's window instead of the girl's, but in the mad chase to the minister's which follows the fleeing couple win out and become married.

How She Fooled Aunty—VICTOR—JANUARY 29.—Irene's aunt, with whom the girl has lived since her parents' death, is too strict with her, and will not allow her to see or speak to boys. Irene dresses in boy's clothes and goes out with a crowd of boys and girls. They decide to play a joke on Aunty and send her a note stating that Irene has joined a band of gypsies and will never return. After the message has had its full effect they obtain gypsies' costumes and burst in upon Aunty, promising to restore Irene to her if she will be more lenient. Aunty promises and then the whole party discard their disguises.

The Mystery Woman—101 BISON—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 30.—Boyd, a stranger in the small western town, recognizes in Berta, "the crazy girl" as she is called, a girl he knew in the past. He visits her at the "haunted house," and induces her to walk with him. She consents and is taken to the justice of the peace and married to Boyd. Meanwhile another stranger, Macklin, arrives in town, and the landlord recognizes a picture on his dresser as being that of "the crazy girl." He informs Macklin of the girl's presence in the town. He and Boyd meet and a terrible struggle ensues. In fleeing from Boyd, Berta is thrown from her horse and stunned. Her memory returns with consciousness, and she sees again the events following her marriage to Macklin. She rushes back to the hotel, and returns just in time to prevent Boyd's shooting Macklin. The bullet meant for Berta's rightful husband enters Boyd's body, killing him. The happily reunited pair recover the deeds to the rich Eldorado mine, and look forward to a future of ease and happiness.

He Fell in Love with His Mother-In-Law—JOKER—JANUARY 30.—After their marriage Jack and Jill are anything but the devoted couple they were before their marriage. Jack rebels against living in the kitchen and doing the washing while Jill reposes on soft cushions, and Jill sends for her mother. Jack and his mother-in-law get along so well together that Jill becomes jealous, and decides that they do not need her mother around any more.

The Crime of Thought—POWERS—JANUARY 30.—John Winton loses his better judgment in jealousy when he sees his sweetheart, Paula Nolan, embrace a stranger. Paula teases him, concealing the fact that the other man is her brother. After reading an account of a recent hanging Winton falls off to sleep and dreams that he is to be hung for murdering Paula. After a series of torturing visions he awakes to find his mother shaking him. Shortly after his awakening Paula and the stranger arrive and she introduces the two men. Winton promises never to let his jealousy run away with him again.

The Thief and the Chief—ECLAIR—JANUARY 31.—When Jimmie Weston laughs at the clubmen's admiration of a mysterious thief who is working in the neighborhood they take up his boast that he, too, can do it and evade arrest and select a house which he is to enter. The owner discovers Jimmie who takes refuge in the Henderson house next door. Clara Henderson promises to protect him from the police, feeling sorry for the wayward youth. When Mr. Henderson returns he thinks Jimmie is the professor whom he was to meet at the station, and welcomes him. Jimmie is compelled to keep up the part. Several days later Clara informs him that the chief of police is to dine with them, and advises him to stay in his room. Jimmie does not tell her that he is the chief's son, planning to spring it as a surprise. Henderson receives a wire from the professor, stating his regrets that he cannot pay him a visit as he had promised. Suspicious, Henderson orders the chief to arrest the guest. Imagine the surprise when the chief confronts his own son. Explanations follow.

After Her Millions—L-KO—(THREE REELS)—JANUARY 31.—Henry and Billie both fall in love with a little millionairess, but Billie wins out. Henry consoles himself with a beautiful pictured lady, but again the little millionairess intrudes on his dreams, and he makes another effort to win her. Gertrude ducks him with a hose and he retaliates. Billie, looking for the lady of the alluring smile, finds Henry's picture, and induces the latter to sell it. Later Henry finds Billie intoxicated and takes back his pictured beauty. Billie arrives at the hotel and things start whirring immediately. Quiet has hardly settled down before another rumpus is raised by Henry in search of his picture, which has blown out of the window. This time everybody in the hotel becomes involved in the confusion which does not end until a harassed guest descends upon Henry and Billy, and puts them to sleep with a few well-aimed blows.

Storms of Life—WHITE STAR—(THREE REELS).—Fred Lloyd, a young artist, is dissipating in a cafe, when suddenly the face of the fisher girl he married and deserted appears in his wine glass. He rushes from the place and hurries to the little village in which he met her only to learn that she has died and that the child which was born to them has also passed out of this life. At the side of their graves he recalls how he had run away from home after a quarrel with his father and how, after the vessel on which he was travelling was wrecked, he had wandered into the fishing village, his mind a blank as to his past life. Here he had met Nan, the fisher girl, and had married her. A wonderful painting he had made of her was taken to an exhibition by an artist who visited the place and this eventually led to his mother finding him. After much persuasion she eventually caused him to return home, leaving Nan alone. As memories of the past come to him the artist bows in grief over the two graves.

Rose of the Alley—BALBOA—(THREE REELS).—La Belle Rose, a dancer who is a public favorite, is engaged by the aristocratic Moores to give an exhibition of her art to celebrate the engagement of their son, Jack, to an heiress. As she is performing her dance, she comes face to face with Jack and faints. Her face startles Jack and in a moment he recognizes her as his wife whom he had thought dead. In a vision he sees the girl, who was known as "Rose of the Alley" and who was adopted by his parents after she had been trained to become an assistant to a criminal. He later fell in love with her and they secretly married. When she saw him, apparently in the embrace of the heiress whom his parents wanted him to marry, she ran away, for she did not know that the woman had merely fainted and that Jack cared nothing for her. When Rose is revived Jack explains the situation to her and they find happiness together.

General Special

The Valley of Lost Hope—LUBIN—(FIVE REELS).—Two get-rich-quick promoters boom a worthless gold field and when they have made all the money they can they plan their get-away. The son of one of them is innocent and pleads with his father to right the wrong he has done. One of the miners learns through the son of the trick which has been played on them and when two safe-blowers get away with all that remains of their savings the wronged men become desperate. The car on which the fake promoters escape is wrecked and the majority of the inhabitants of the town are killed when the husband of the parson's sister blows it up. The son of the promoter, the parson's sister, an old lady and the parson himself escape and the son's honesty is rewarded when he wins the parson's sister for his wife and the old lady agrees to become a mother to him. A review will be found on page 87 of the January 16 issue.

Tattooed Man—Monty—Margery, in spite of the protests of Dr. Evans, her fiancee, decides to join a suffragette "hike," the other members of which are spinsters of the most modern type. On the same day the "hike" starts, a tattooed lunatic escapes from Dr. Evans' sanitarium. Every endeavor is made to capture the man who spreads terror throughout the countryside. The suffragettes take refuge in a vacant roadhouse, into which the lunatic has climbed. The women are in terror through the antics of the fugitive, until he first is put out of business and then succored by the eldest of the suffragettes, who shows in the end an unexpected tenderness for the stronger sex. The doctor comes to the rescue of the women, only to find them contented with the exception of Margery who, disgusted with her co-adventurers, is willing to be taken home by the doctor.

The Call of the Sea—Monty—A fisherman, his wife, and three boys find a child castaway. They take her to their home and bring her up as one of their own. Years pass and the three boys now grown to manhood are in love with Nora, the castaway. Dave, the favored one, is sent to study for the ministry. The father requests on his deathbed that Nora marry Dan, as he is the oldest. In order to be alone with her thoughts of Dave, Nora goes to the rocks for solitude, and unnoticed by herself is trapped by the incoming tide. The following morning Dan and Dick find her on the rocks—dead. Later in a dispute over which of the three she really loved, they open her locket and find within Dave's picture.

Blown Upon—Punch—By breathing the fumes of rigidal on anyone they will sleep for one hour. This is the basic idea in this comedy and there is a tramp, a farmer, a baby and several others who create much laughter.

Joe's Partner Bill—Navajo—Della, a gambler's wife, is informed that her husband has been shot for cheating. She goes away to start a new life and meets Joe, a young mining prospector. A short time after the meeting they are married and Della does not tell him of her past. After a few months of happiness Della's husband comes to the town in which they live, sees Della and demands the bag of gold which they have saved. She, stunned, wonders how he escaped death. He tells her he played a ruse on the posse, threw his hat on the water and swam under water to safety. She gives him the money, when Joe's partner, Bill, enters and makes him return the gold. He also gives him one hour to leave the state. Joe, returning home, overhears Bill tell Della that he won't say anything about the matter. Joe, suspicious, turns Bill out of the house. Bill goes to the saloon and there meets Della's former husband. There is a terrific fight between them. Bill is victor. At home Della explains matters to Joe and Bill is welcomed back.

It is our aim to make this department as complete as possible, although to do this, we must have the co-operation of all the manufacturers of film in the United States. Beating Father to It—Alhambra.—This farce shows the antics of a widower, his son, a widow and her daughter. The widower and widow get married and are more than surprised to learn that their children have put one over on them and are also married.

Paramount

Young Romance — Lasky — (Five Reels).—Nellie Nolan, who works at the notion counter, wants to be a lady and determines to gratify her ambition for one week, during her yearly vacation, by visiting a fashionable Maine seaside resort. Tom Clancy, also a clerk, has the same longing for society and riches and also determines to gratify his desire. They both put up at a "swell" hotel and become acquainted, each thinking that the other is really a member of the elite set. Tom saves Nellie from the schemes of a fake count, who plans to secure the fortune she is supposed to get and they fall in love. After the glorious week has passed both return to work in the same department store and are dumbfounded when they are brought face to face one day. However, they decide that their social position makes no difference as long as they can have each other.

It's No Laughing Matter—Bosworth—(Four Reels).—Hi Judd, village postmaster, poet, and philosopher, is liked by all but Jim Skinner, who covets his government position. Bess, Hi's daughter, casts off her country sweetheart, Hal, for Sam, the new ticket agent with a habit of playing sentimental airs on a banjo. Hi does not trust Sam, and suspects him of being the husband of Belle Wilkins, the long missing daughter of Widow Wilkins. One day Bess sends a number of her father's verses to a newspaper for acceptance. Not long afterwards the Judd family is placed in desperate straits by the bank's failing and Hi's receiving a notice that his term as postmaster is up. Skinner attempts to foreclose his mortgage on Hi's home, but is prevented by the timely arrival of a check for $1,000 from the newspaper for the verses. Hi sends Belle money to return home, brings about a reunion between her and Sam, and heals up the breach between Bess and Hal. A review appears on page 162 of this issue.

Pathe Daily News No. 5—Pathe—January 18.—In this issue of the weekly, Japanese war nurses are seen en route from Japan to London; the opening of the New Orleans race track is shown, and at Garden City, N. Y., a device to prevent railroad wrecks is demonstrated; while from Pasadena, Cal., comes pictures of the rose tournament; from Sea Bright, N. J., views of the damage caused by the recent gale; and in the war section views taken near Chambley and Verdun, France, together with pictures snapped at Jemeppe, Andenne, Furnes and Ypres, Belgium, are shown.

Queen and Adventurer—Pathe—(Four Reels).—The story is based on an incident in the life of Mary Tudor, daughter of Henry VIII of England, who was exiled and afterward succeeded her father on the throne of England. Her favorite was Fabiano Fabiani who secretly made love to the adopted daughter, of Gilbert, an artisan, and who was in truth the daughter of Lord Talbot. In the course of the story Queen Mary (Mary Tudor) gives the Talbot estates to Fabiani, much to the disgust of the populace, who immediately plan an uprising. Through the offices of Simon Renard Jane is identified and the queen is told of Fabiani's love for her. Gilbert and Fabiani now become accomplices, as the anger of the queen waxes against Fabiani and Jane. Later the two lovers are sentenced to death. The queen relents and decides to use Jane in order to free Fabiani but the girl releases Gilbert instead. Gilbert is caught however and in order to pacify the mob the queen promises the head of Fabiani. Through a clever scheme she arranges that the head of Gilbert shall fall instead of Fabiani's, but as cunning a scheme is plotted in opposition to hers, and the two women await the death signal. The latter plan succeeds and the head of Fabiani falls in place of that of Gilbert.

The Old Thespian—Pathe—(Three Reels).—Dr. Delmont attends a theater with his fiancee, Clary Dorney to see the great actor, Talby starring. Clary becomes infatuated with Talby and receives Delmont's permission to send a note to him. The actor suggests that she meet him in the park the next day; both of them to wear a rose. The next day Clary is in the park but does not see the young actor. An elderly man wearing a rose approaches her and tells her that he is Talby. Her dream is shattered but she nevertheless parts friends with the man who has gained success through the art of make-up. Years pass and Clary and Dr. Delmont have married and are happy together with their little child. Talby has gone down grade and is a clown with a circus. At a performance he recognizes Clary and fears that she will see him. He is injured by a fall and taken care of by Dr. Delmont. The doctor finds a portrait of his wife in the man's coat and calls Clary to his bedside. When Talby recovers he is offered a home with Dr. and Mrs. Delmont and becomes the idol of their child.

Shot in the Fracas—Pathe.—This is a farce comedy which is filled with laughable incidents. A junkman moves into the house next to that occupied by Murphy. Rastus, a coon, mistakes, the junkman's home for his own one evening and strolls into it. What happens to him is better pictured than told All is peaceful after he has been disposed of until the junkman's wife appropriates Murphy's clothes-line in the absence of her own. A general riot ensues and the ending furnishes much fun, in which bullets from the pistols of the rival families, plus a squad of police, play an important part.

Nick Winter and the Mysterious Bank—PATHE — (THREE REELS). — Richard Maury, a wealthy depositor at a certain bank, asks Nick Winter, the detective, to investigate the stability of the bank. Winter interviews the manager, Mr. Merserau, and later receives a note from him saying he has fled with the money and that if he is followed he will kill Winter. Winter hurries to the bank and traps Merserau in a secret hiding place, but the latter escapes after drugging the detective. When Winter recovers, he learns that the crook is Maury himself, who has been disguised as the manager. He learns that Maury has left for another city and follows him by means of an aeroplane and automobile. Maury is captured and sent to prison, but later escapes by a clever ruse. Winter again takes up the trail and once more falls into a trap. He is bound before an automatic clock with a pistol attached, but manages to grasp a nearby telephone with his toes and call the police. He is rescued and when Maury and his wife later return to see if he has been killed they are arrested. On the last part of the third reel is:

The Birth of Plants—PATHE.—An educational offering showing the manner in which peas, beans, trees and cherry blossoms, etc. develop.

Romiet and Julio—PATHE.—An animated comedy cartoon relating the adventures of Julio, a masculine cat, and Romiet, the object of his affections. Julio, on a back fence, howls a love song to Romiet, who is sitting on the lap of an old maid in a nearby window. When he discovers that Romiet cannot come out he searches for something to eat and takes a bone away from a magpie, who swears vengeance on him. Julio gets an idea and clings to a string attached to a bunch of ballooons, which he snatches from a peddler, thus being carried towards Romiet, who is still in the window. The magpie, however, punctures the balloons with his bill and Julio is sent sprawling down to earth, where the angry peddler awaits him. On the same reel is:

Malaga—Southern Spain—PATHE.—An interesting scenic, showing several wonderful views of this ancient Spanish city and giving an insight to the sugar-cane industry and the working of the sardine fisheries.

A Scratch of the Pen—PATHE—(TWO REELS).—Harvey Abbot, the nephew of Squire Thornton, is in the power of Jim Roycroft, a blackmailer. He plans to marry Elenor, his uncle's ward, and thus secure enough money to clear his debts. The girl, however, loves his cousin, Frank, and gives Harvey no encouragement. When Jim presses him for more money he attacks the blackmailer and leaves him for dead. Jim is found by Frank and the latter is accused of the crime and sent to prison. Jim's memory has been made a blank by the blows he received and when Harvey again meets him he hurls him into the river. Frank, who has escaped from prison, again rescues him and as a result of the shock Jim's memory is restored. He proves Frank's innocence, hunts up his assailant and recognizes him by the scratch of a pen. A terrific fight ensues, in which both their lives are taken. Frank claims Elenor as his bride.

Zudora in the Twenty Million Dollar Mystery — (TENTH EPISODE) — THANHOUSER—(TWO REELS).—Mr. Bruce, a smuggler, arrives in America with some stolen jewels and is told of the plan to rob Zudora of the mines which belong to her by his fellow conspirators, of whom Madame Duval is chief. Zudora learns through some papers which have been left her by the dead Hassam Ali that she owns the mine and with the assistance of Jim Baird and Hunt, a detective, plans to regain her fortune. Jim is captured, tortured and threatened with death, but finally escapes. In the closing scenes Bruce returns to Europe after having succeeded in smuggling the jewels into port. A review will be found on page 155 of this issue.

The Wolf's Prey—Warner's.—Estelle Barclay has been in the habit of "using" men to further her own interests. She infatuates Count Ermond, who has a wife and child, and plans to secure his fortune. Morton, her accomplice, is in love with her and counterplots to have her secure the fortune without marrying the count. He arranges to have the count and his child killed, and to then prove, through Estelle's relations with the nobleman, that she is his heiress. Estelle, however, overthrows Morton's plot and the count is merely wounded. His child is given to a sailor to dispose of by Morton. Estelle cares for the count and manages to throw Morton off the track. Years pass and Morton has become known as the "wolf." He meets an equestrienne named Germaine, but she will have nothing to do with him, as she is engaged to another performer. He manages to steal into her taxi, however, and kidnaps her, taking her to his room. Gruber, the circus manager, follows them and rescues Germaine. Morton recognizes in Gruber the sailor to whom he entrusted the count's child. In a duel, Gruber kills the "wolf." A letter in the dead man's pocket establishes Germaine's relationship as Ermond's child, and when the count is notified, Estelle, who has grown to love him, pays her penalty. The father and daughter are reunited, and the girl stays with the circus, where her lover, Gruber, and the count tenderly care for her.

The Master Key—(Episode Ten)—January 24.—Conditions at the mine grow steadily worse, and at last the governor of the state sends a troop of cavalry to quell the disturbance, and places the camp under martial law. Dore comes to the conclusion that circumstances warrant his opening the letter left him by Gallon, and which was not to be opened until Ruth's eighteenth birthday. Reading it he learns that the key worn by Ruth has engraved on it the exact latitude and longtitude of where the vessel, on board of which was the correct chart of the Master Key mine, went down. Wilkerson learns of the letter's contents, steals the key, hires a diver, and sets out to find the chart. Accompanied by Ruth and a diver Dore, also, sets out to find the sunken vessel. The two parties arrive at the location at the same time and lower their divers. Wilkerson's diver finds the chest and it is hauled upward just as Dore's man approaches it.

World

Mignon—California—(Five Reels).—The picture opens with the meeting of Lothario, who has a wife and little girl at home, and Musette, a gypsy. He deceives her and when she learns the truth she kills herself. Lothario's wife, who is an invalid, dies upon hearing the news and the gypsies steal his daughter. He loses his mind and becomes a wandering minstrel, continually searching for his daughter. Several years later Wilhelm, a gentleman of leisure, finds Mignon and buys her from the gypsies. An interest in Hamlet prompts him to make friends with a troupe of players and he becomes their guest. A petty princeling invites the players to act at a fete, which he gives, and Wilhelm, Mignon and the wandering minstrel, her real father, are all present at the event. The incidents which follow, lead to the crazy minstrel setting fire to the house and he and Mignon run away together. They at last come to his castle, where he is recognized. His mind is restored and he realizes that Mignon is his daughter. The picture has a happy ending.

Miscellaneous

The Victoria Cross—Cosmofotofilm—(Three Parts).—Shortly after mortgaging his home for $10,000 Colonel Oldwood dies. His son, Charles, contracts to work for the mortgagee. Mr. Bilson, until the entire sum is paid off. War breaks out. Charles' desire to enlist is checked by the thought that if he should be killed his mother would lose her home. One day he accidentally finds a secret drawer in his father's writing table, and in it a note to himself telling him that the Victoria Cross which he and his mother revered so much does not rightfully belong to his father as he was given credit for another's brave act. Determined to make the family worthy of the Victoria Cross, Charles enlists in the army and is killed in the first battle in the performance of a brave act that saves the regiment. Among the boy's effects sent home to his mother is Colonel Oldwood's confession, but she does not learn the truth as the boy's blood has obliterated the words. A review appears on page 160 of this issue.

In the Land of the Head Hunters—Curtis—(Multiple Reel Educational).—A high class film that is different than the general run of pictures on the screen today, showing the life of Indians in a realistic way, this effect being gained only through the efforts of Edward S. Curtis, an authority on the race of red men, who produced the picture. The numerous customs and actions of the Indians are true to life and the scenery is beautiful. While no attempt at acting, in the theatrical sense of the word, is attempted by the Indians, every movement breathes the primitive life in which their people were raised. It is a correct historical portrayal of the American Indians.

The Treasure of the Louzats—Itala—(Four Reels).—Lydia, daughter of the younger branch of the ancient family of Louzat, on her eighteenth birthday, receives a message telling of a super-important secret hidden in an unnamed volume. Count Gerard, her uncle, feigns to pay no heed to the communication but secretly searches in the library. Failing, he decides that it must be in the castle of Count Jules of the older branch of the family. Count Jules receives Gerard and Lydia courteously. He finds that his interest in his sweet kinswoman melts the rancor of the years. Returning from the garden with her, they confront Count Gerard in futile and furious quest. Gerard slinks away under Jule's fiery denunciation. To get Lydia out of his way, Gerard sends her to convent confinement. Here fate blindly leads to the solving of the secret. She is apprehended and her guardians, informing Gerard, lock her in her rom but in the struggle Lydia tears from the page the few lines whose knowledge would have saved Gerard his life, when, with masked accomplices he attacks Jules in his castle and finds in the subterranean shrine a treasure enormous, for he is buried amid the mass of jewels and gold. Lydia and Jules find him and find comfort in their love.

The Exposition of Fort B 2—Picture Playhouse—The Italian government has been hesitating for a long time whether to enter the world conflict for supremacy or to remain neutral. Carl Ranke, an Italian inventor, discovers a new high explosive which gives the Italian government the assurance necessary to enter the great conflict. At the reception Ranke falls in love with the daughter of Colonel Colonna, and in keeping an appointment with her, is kidnapped by the Austrian spy, Captain Otto Senza, who is serving in the Italian army. He is imprisoned in the little magazine, Fort B 2, and is given the choice of revealing his secret of the formula or death. He prefers to sacrifice his life rather than betray his country. He is saved from the very jaws of death by his faithful dog, and the despicable Austrian meets the death intended for his captive. Sylvia tries to save him but only succeeds in getting into the toils of the spy and sees from her cell window, as she thinks, the death of her lover. After a series of adventures, Ranke succeeds in getting back to his own country just in time to marry the girl who has been faithful to him all through his trying experiences.

The Avalanche—Life Photo—(Five Parts).—Clara Benson jilts John Grey, whom she really loves, for Peter Vaughan, a millionaire whose wealth assures her social prominence. Later she grows to dislike her husband, and turns again to Grey who has since become married. Finding that he pays no attention to her Clara determines shortly after Vaughan's death, to force him to love her by secretly sweeping away his money on the stock exchange and then contributing generously towards his efforts to recover his footing. Helen, Grey's wife, misunderstands the meaning of his association with Clara, and, thinking that his former sweetheart has won him back, applies for a divorce. An incident occurs which reveals Grey's great love for his wife and they become reconciled. A comedy runs parallel to the drama, ending in the culmination of the romance between Rose Grey, John's sister, and Philip Carlton.

"June" Continues To Run Away

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

THE third episode of "Runaway June's" thrilling experiences proves Gilbert Blye to be a clever as well as a villainous "man with a black Vandyke." He seems to have endless resources for placing June in embarrassing situations, and has the knack of appearing at just the right moment to offer his assistance in a way which dispels June's suspicions. Thus, in this installment, she places herself in a compromising position without realizing it.

Nothing of an unusually thrilling nature transpires in this release, but it is full of good, lively action and shows the handiwork of a past-master of technique in its staging. The first few scenes present a flock of automobiles with several suspense-prolonging tire accidents and some fast driving, but after these the story settles down and allows itself to be propelled by Blye and his schemes. Each time June does exactly the thing that Blye has predicted and arranged for, but does it because to her, under the circumstances, it seems the only logical thing to do. There is but a trace of comedy in the story, that is supplied by Mrs. Blye's treatment of her domestic troubles. This at times borders on burlesque.

Gilbert Blye's limousine passes June's taxi and continues at break-neck speed towards the city in the first few scenes. When far enough ahead of the girl's machine, Blye breaks a bottle which he has in the car and scatters the sharp-edged fragments along the road. The taxi passes over them, and suffers a punctured tire. Blye returns and gallantly offers June the use of his car to continue her journey. After some hesitation she accepts, transfers her things to the limousine and with Marie, her maid, climbs into the big car.

As the machine starts off Blye turns to her, feigns surprise, and asks if she is not the girl he met in the train. She answers in the affirmative, but offers him no encouragement for further conversation. She is greatly relieved when he alights at his club, placing the car at her service. June does not like the gay appearance of a boarding-house in front of which Scatti, the driver, stops, and orders him to take them to an obscure little place with which Marie is familiar.

June loses her position as a model.

Scatti makes a note of the street and number as instructed by Blye, and hastens back to the club where Blye and Cunningham are trying to decide on the best course to take to draw June into their net without openly involving either of them. Their solution is to enlist the aid of Tommy Thomas, and have her call on June the next morning and offer to obtain a position for her as a model in a department store.

Tommy consents after a few weak objections, and June gladly accepts her kind offer. Blye has everything arranged at the store before the girls arrive, and June is employed immediately. About an hour later Cunningham enters the gown department, and, on the pretext of receiving discourteous treatment from June, has her discharged. Discouraged, she returns to her boarding-house.

In the meantime Ned's machine has also been delayed by running over the broken glass in the suburban road, and, by the time that help arrives, the trail is so cold that he gives it up entirely. Arriving in the city Ned hires private detectives to locate June's whereabouts. Mrs. Blye has also employed detectives, and becomes greatly excited when one of them reports that he has found her husband. Her hopes are blasted, however, when he leads her to Ned's apartment and points out one of the latter's detectives who resembles Blye.

While out walking Ned spies Marie, June's maid, and follows her. Blye also goes to June's room and follows her when she flees. Ned does not join in the chase, however.

J. A. Berst, New Selig General Manager

All filmdom was surprised to learn the past week that J. A. Berst who, as everyone knows, established Pathe in its desirable position in American film circles, and who has long been an officer of the General Film Company, has been made vice president and general manager of the Selig Polyscope Company with headquarters in Chicago, and will assume his new duties immediately.

Mr. Selig has been steadily active in the affairs of the Selig Polyscope Company since its establishment way back in the olden days when it consisted of but one small studio and a printing and developing plant. He has seen it grow out of the old quarters, which became wholly inadequate, and superintended the erection of the mammoth studio on Chicago's west side, in addition to purchasing the ground and establishing three large studios in Los Angeles, where the famous Selig jungle zoo has become one of the most famous sight-seeing spots on the Pacific Coast.

Since Mr. Selig has personally supervised and given his own attention to all the infinite details of the various plants, studios and departments, those who are intimate with him have long been expecting that he would, sooner or later, make arrangements to relieve himself of part, at least, of the heavy burden resting on his shoulders. His selection of Mr. Berst to take over the management of all the Selig interests is one that will be heartily approved by everyone who knows Mr. Berst, and it is self evident that no better man could have been chosen for such an important post, for Mr. Berst is undoubtedly a tried and proven executive, and one who on account of his intimate knowledge of all film conditions will be able to aid the Selig Polyscope Company in a thousand ways and bring it to an even higher pinnacle than it occupies today.

An Invitation to Exhibitors

With the throwing open of the gates of Universal City, Calif., on March 15, 1915, a short course in the making of moving pictures is offered to every one in the film business who takes advantage of the broad invitation of the Universal Company to visit the studios and see how pictures are made.

Of the thousands who are directly connected with the film business in one or the other of its many branches, but few have even a surface knowledge of some of the fundamentals of the trade. They do not know some of the simplest things concerning the business and are often embarrassed by the questions of outsiders.

This trip to Universal City for the people in the moving picture business will be an efficiency exhibition of moving picture art and will be decidedly educational. The advancement that has been made will be explained by the heads of the various departments,

Mina Lands Great Invention

By special arrangement with David Horsley the new duplex double exposure camera recently invented by him will be used exclusively in the production of Mina films. This means primarily that a new element of mystery and wonder will be added to an already excellent product. With the use of Mr. Horsley's "wonder box," effects and illusions heretofore impossible can be secured. So great, indeed, is said to be the advance in photographic accomplishment that a completely different system of scenario construction and play building has already developed.

There is seemingly no limit to the usages to which the new camera may be put, and its application removes every conceivable restriction from the imaginations of the script writer. No matter how weird and fantastical his dream, the wonder box is capable of turning it into a realistic picture. In order to take full advantage of the possibilities thus opened up, the Mina people are negotiating with one of the best known newspaper humorists and successful photoplaywrights in America to furnish special manuscripts.

To Open New Offices

The Picture Playhouse Film Company has ten branch offices now open and showing good returns. The board of directors has six more offices in different centers now under negotiation, and as soon as suitable quarters and branch managers can be selected, will be ready to open under the direct management of the home office.

The offices will probably be located in Boston, Minneapolis, St. Louis, Kansas City, Atlanta and Indianapolis. The Picture Playhouse has extended its territory in Canada to Winnipeg and Vancouver and now covers the entire Dominion with its feature releases.

There has just been received from abroad the first installment of a wonderful war film taken actually on the battlefields, which will be released together with the regular program of feature releases.

Raver's New Stunt

Harry R. Raver's idea to assist territorial buyers of Itala features by supplying complete plates for the printing of heralds has met with instant approval. Sol Lesser of San Francisco, whose initial order for heralds is always fifty thousand, has been obliged to pay at the rate of a dollar and a half per thousand in express charges alone, as the rate is over two dollars per hundred pounds. Other territories suffer in proportion to the distance from New York.

By the new plan, buyers may take the Itala plates to a local printer and have heralds run off as needed at a figure in many cases as low, if not lower, than New York prices. The Itala herald plates are mortised for the insertion of local theater dating.

American Enlarging Studio and Laboratories

Under the personal direction of President S. S. Hutchinson, the American Film Manufacturing Company is making many additions to its studios at Santa Barbara, Calif., and also extensive alterations in the laboratories at Chicago. When these alterations are completed the total capacity will exceed 500,000 feet of positives per week, and the negative output will be approximately twice what it is at present.

Clutching Hand Hatches Crafty Scheme

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

THOSE who are following the crafty operations of that notorious criminal, the Clutching Hand, as depicted in the Pathe serial, "The Exploits of Elaine," have even a greater treat in store for them in episode five of the series, which is entited, "The Poisoned Room," for the much-sought master criminal makes use of new and still more scientific apparatus and knowledge in an endeavor to foil those who are on his trail.

In episode five, the Clutching Hand appears in a new guise, for his gloves, worn in all previous episodes, have been discarded and the bandanna handkerchief, with which he has been wont in the past to hide his features, has given place to a luxuriant crop of false whiskers, while his clothing in the latest episode is that of a telephone lineman.

Craig Kennedy, the inimitable, is still on his trail, though the further he pursues it the more dangerous seems to become his work, for the Clutching Hand has sworn to kill not only Eaine and Craig, but any others who may seek to interrupt his work.

Passing near Kennedy and Elaine Dodge, as they leave Miss Dodge's home, the Clutching Hand, representing himself as a telephone lineman, is admitted to the house by Michael, the butler, and is introduced into the boudoir of Elaine, where he proceeds to spray the walls, the carpets, the window curtains and in fact every article in the room with arsenic.

Descending then into the basement, the Clutching Hand so arranges some wires, that he attaches to the electric meter, that the current passing through these wires will run into the waterpan of the furnace, the action of the electricity releasing the hydrogen in the water and permitting the gas to pass up through the furnace pipes into Elaine's boudoir.

Michael, who has ventured to peer within Elaine's room while his master is at work, is discovered by the Clutching Hand and threatened with death, after being knocked down for his curiosity. Michael, in revenge, offers to give Kennedy information regarding the Clutching Hand.

Elaine and her collie dog are both sickened by the arsenic and when Craig and the physician are summoned, the doctor finds he is unable to diagnose the symptoms, while Kennedy suspects the Clutching Hand is at the bottom of it all.

When Michael's message, offering to reveal the secrets of the Clutching Hand, is received, Kennedy arranges to meet Michael in an obscure apartment house and, going there, engages a room directly beneath the one taken by Michael. By means of a periscope which Kennedy uses through the open window of his room, he is able to discover that Michael, in the room above, is alone, and then goes above to meet the assistant of the Clutching Hand.

Ere Michael can confess anything to Kennedy, a noise outside attracts his attention to the door and, as he stoops near the keyhole, he is killed by a poisoned dart blown through the keyhole by one of the Clutching Hand's band.

Kennedy discovers next day that Elaine is much worse and in the meanwhile she receives a message which informs her that she will surely die and Kennedy will be the next victim. Craig accidentally discovers that the wall of the room is covered with arsenic and is then only puzzled as to why its fumes are so deadly. Going to the basement he discovers the electric wires arranged by the Clutching Hand and notes that the hydrogen conveyed through the furnace pipes, after being withdrawn from the water by the action of the electricity, acting upon the arsenic forms the most deadly fumes.

He promptly disconnects the wires and opens the windows in Elaine's chamber, thereby saving her life. Even while he is explaining to her the method taken by the Clutching Hand to cause her death another of the poisoned darts is hurled through the window in an effort to frighten him off the case, though, as the picture closes, he tells Elaine he will pursue the Clutching Hand to the bitter end.

Is Funkhouser a German?

Due to his recent action as relates to the three-reel Pathe release, "It's a Long Long Way to Tipperary," the esteemed, so to speak, Major Funkhouser, head of the Chicago Censorship Board, may almost be suspected of being a German.

The major, or his minions, after viewing the picture refused to approve it or to issue a permit for its showing in the city of Chicago, alleging that the picture was essentially a war drama, and therefore, liable to arouse other than a neutral feeling on the part of those who witnessed its screening. At the request of the local manager of the Pathe exchange, the representatives of several trade journals viewed the picture and their unanimous opinion was that it was unobjectionable.

The story is decidedly a romantic one, dealing with the lives of two Irishmen, Mike and Paddy, for a little colleen named Molly. Mike is a Nationalist and Paddy a Unionist, and as a result they frequently clash, though upon the outbreak of war, when England calls for an Irish regiment, the two forget their quarrels and immediately go to the front side by side, as the best of friends and loyal subjects of the ruler of Great Britain. Surely this loyalty and patriotic feeling on the part of the Irishmen who had been at odds with each other is most laudable, and would serve a peaceful purpose rather than a warlike one.

As to the scenes of battle or conflict, there is not a sub-title on the screen which would indicate that Great Britain was at war with Germany. In every case the opponents of the fighting Irish regiment are referred to as "the foe" or "the enemy," and so far as actual statements as to who the conflicting parties are, it might be considered a war picture showing a conflict between Switzerland and Iceland. Major Funkhouser seems to have stretched his point a good ways in order to cover this particular film, and there is a serious question as to whether President Wilson's mere request for neutrality in films could be legally upheld should the Pathe people decide to take the matter into court, a thing which, of course, they will not even consider.

It is understood, however, that the film is to be shown to several Washington diplomats and among others the American representatives of the powers now at war in Europe, and the Pathe people expect to have the picture heartily endorsed by not only the Americans, but the Englishmen, Irishmen, Germans and all of the nationalities.

The further injustice of Major Funkhouser's decision is clearly seen, when it is stated that the picture passed the National Board of Censorship without a cut, and is now being displayed in practically every state in the union except Illinois, and will, of course, be shown in cities of Illinois which are not under the thumb of the Chicago Board of Censorship. This being true, it seems that Major Funkhouser is decidedly in the wrong, and that if the picture is proper to be run in New York and California, Louisiana and Minnesota, it surely should be entitled to a showing in Illinois and the city of Chicago.

Jean Dumar a New Edison Star

The story of Jean Dumar, one of the latest—and one of the prettiest—actresses to be selected by Edison for stellar honors in the stock company, reads much like the characters so often seen in plays but seldom in real life. For less than a year ago, Miss Dumar, still in her teens and with the courage born of unsophisticated innocence came to New York to make her name and fortune. She went to the metropolis to learn a profession. Without friends and soon without money she by some chance applied at the Vitagraph studio for employment. Though without any stage or motion picture experience, the director was quick to see in her unusual beauty extraordinary material when blended with a sweetness of nature and emotional depth of sincerity. With large brown eyes sympathetically expressive and a wealth of hair framing her oval face, Miss Dumar's girlish beauty has added charm to all pictures in which she has appeared. For her type is one that registers on the screen with astonishing fidelity. Her serious nature has imparted the ring of sincerity to all parts entrusted to her and the Edison studio expects much from this pretty and capable miss. Miss Dumar, in a short year, has been with the Vitagraph, under D. W. Griffith, with the Reliance and also the Famous Players, and her selection to the Edison stock is a distinctive honor as she has been with the Edison forces but about two months.

Jean Dumar.

Mutual Weekly Cameraman Under Fire

Lawrence Darmour, cameraman for the Mutual Weekly, had his "baptism of fire" recently when forty deputy sheriffs fired upon 400 unarmed strikers at the Carteret, N. J., fertilizer plant labor troubles. Darmour had set up his camera preparatory to making a "panoram" of the immense works, with the strikers standing about in the rear, when the deputy sheriffs came rushing through the big gates and opened fire on the crowd. The strikers being unarmed, everyone fled at the first shot, Darmour lugging his heavy outfit the best he could. Bullets were whistling all about and one cut a clean hole through a new derby hat Mr. Darmour was wearing. He is keeping the hat as a souvenir of the occasion and says that he won't relish getting any more strike-riot assignments.

How "The Clansman" Was Produced

BY W. E. KEEFE

REALISM, atmosphere and a broad grasp of big ideas. These are the keynotes of the artistry of D. W. Griffith. The infinite care paid to seemingly minor details, the efforts to make each trifling incident stand out as an artistic situation in itself, and a commanding comprehension of large subjects are among the principal reasons why Mr. Griffith has earned the sobriquet of the world's foremost motion picture producer. "We must have realism no matter what the expense" is one of his mottoes.

D. W. Griffith directing.

Perhaps no better illustration can be drawn showing the genius of Mr. Griffith than in the production of his latest great picture. "The Clansman," adapted from the novel of Thos Dixon, Jr. Probably no other motion picture ever staged received the same care and forethought from the producer as was accorded by Mr. Griffith to this half-million dollar production. No general on the European battlefields has made better use of the modern appurtenances of war in planning and directing his military maneuvers than did Mr. Griffith in staging the big battle scenes for "The Clansman," Couriers, field telephones, signal towers, rockets, flag signals and signals by mirrors were all employed in directing "The Clansman."

These modern war instruments were not used in the battle scenes as part of the army equipment shown in the picture, but were simply utilized by Mr. Griffith to assist in directing the movements of the troops and players during the filming of the spectacle.

The battlefields show the struggles between the federal and southern troops during the Civil War. Two weeks were required for the selection of a battlefield to show the siege of Petersburg.

With the battlefield selected, the work of building the trenches was then started. The trenches were built according to government war records. Before the work of laying out the trenches was started, six old Civil War veterans, who fought in the original battle, went over the battlefield with Mr. Griffith and assisted in laying out the trenches. Two of these veterans were commissioned officers and they remained with Mr. Griffith during all battle scenes, advising him of numerous incidents in connection with the original battles.

Modern cannon could not be used in the battle scenes. It was necessary to get guns of the Civil War period. Modern guns in a Civil War picture would have been a farce. "We must have Civil War cannon or none at all" said Mr. Griffith. These were finally borrowed from the War Department for the occasion. The guns included a number of the huge shell-throwing mortars that were used during the conflict between the North and the South. These guns were placed in the same position as during the original battle.

Mr. Griffith insisted on using the shell fire in the battle scenes. An expert fireworks manufacturer was engaged to make specially constructed explosive shells to be used in the mortars during the artillery duel. Each of these shells cost $80. In "The Clansman" explosive shells were used for the first time in the history of motion pictures.

Platform from which "The Clansman" was directed.

G. A. R. veterans gave many suggestions.

Aside from the Civil War veterans, Mr. Griffith also engaged two West Point army officers to supervise the military tactics of the two armies. These were augmented by several national guard officers and a regiment of state militia.

The soldiers in the picture were thoroughly drilled in military tactics before taking part in the battle scenes. This resulted in the soldiers acting like real soldiers during the battle, instead of resembling the movements of a raw mob simply dressed in soldiers' uniforms. The battlefield was two miles in length. Mr. Griffith stood on a tower 100 feet in height, directing the vast armies consisting of 20,000 soldiers, including two regiments of cavalry and 50 batteries. This platform was erected at one end of the field. With a pair of powerful field glasses he watched every movement of the troops.

It was here that the field telephone came into service. At every fifty yards, directly in the rear of the opposing battle lines and out of sight of the camera, was stationed one of the army officers. Each of these officers carried a field telephone and each had two assistants. Telephone wires were strung along to the rear of the battle lines connecting with the tower.

With Mr. Griffith was an army officer also equipped with field glasses. When Mr. Griffith desired a company of artillery to fire, the cavalry to charge, or the infantry to advance or fall back, he gave his command to the army officer at his elbow. This army officer immediately telephoned to the proper officer located along the battlefield. The message was then transmitted to the officer in charge of the troops in that location, with the result that there was no confusion whatever in executing the director's commands. With the noise from the roar of the guns, it would have been impossible to direct the movements of the armies without the aid of the field telephone. One regiment of infantry fought in a swampy piece of ground. It was impossible to stretch a telephone wire there. The wire was stretched to the nearest available point and there a signal tower was placed. An officer was stationed on this tower and as soon as an order was received for the troops in the marsh to execute a movement, the officer on the tower signalled with flags to the officer in charge of the soldiers in the swamp. The order was then carried out within a few seconds after leaving the mouth of Mr. Griffith. Signals by mirror and flags were used in transmitting orders to the soldiers located out of the zone of the telephone.

The same systematic care of details used in the battle scenes is also shown in all other scenes. A well known professor of history in a California college was engaged three months in delving through Civil War history to secure exact data for the staging of the picture. The State Senate Chamber of Columbia, S. C., at the close of the Civil War was to be shown in "The Clansman." Mr. Griffith telegraphed a newspaper at Columbia and secured photographs of the interior of the House and Senate Chambers. The scene showing the House Chamber was then constructed according to the photographs.

The assassination of President Lincoln in Ford's theater in Washington is one of the features of "The Clansman." The theater was built from exact paintings of the interior of Ford's theater, with the same characters on the stage as were gathered there at the time Lincoln was assassinated. It was an exact replica of the original opera house, in size and furnishings. The old fashioned footlights and theater chairs are identical with the style used during this period.

In the assassination scene R. A. Walsh portrayed the role of Wilkes Booth. He had to go through this scene twenty-six times before it was done to the satisfaction of Mr. Griffith. Walsh was compelled to jump from the second box to the stage below, a distance of 13 feet, twenty-six times, alighting on his hands and knees each time, before Mr. Griffith expressed himself as satisfied.

For the scenes on a southern plantation, an entire negro cabin village was erected. Here the negro dancers and banjo players gathered for a jubilee.

He also built a southern city for "The Clansman." This shows the old fashioned southern homes with brick sidewalks, hitching posts, lamp posts and big street drinking pumps that were in use during the Civil War period. At the beginning of the war the city was bright and cheerful. It was necessary to show this city at the close of the war. Blades of grass were transplanted and placed between the bricks on the sidewalk. The fences were partially blackened by charcoal. Sections of the town were burned. No opportunity was overlooked to give the town a desolate appearance. In looking at the scenes showing this southern town, there will be no question but what the town had tasted the ravages of war, regardless of whether or not troops are seen in the streets.

Mr. Griffith never works from a scenario. He studies and rehearses the story he is going to stage and then produces it altogether from memory. He works without pencil, scenario or notes. Mr. Griffith read the book of "The Clansman" carefully. He then started to rehearse. He picked his characters for their parts with infinite care. "Each player must be a distinct type" is Mr. Griffith's motto.

Mr. Griffith always instructs his principal players during the scenes to go ahead and play their parts the way they think they should be portrayed. This is during rehearsal. Mr. Griffith has his own ideas but he wants to get the views of his players. He then adds his interpretation to his players' ideas, with the result that no incident is passed without getting the maximum dramatic situation out of it. He goes through each incident himself. He shows each player the motions he wishes carried out. This results in naturalness of acting—acting that is so natural that it does not appear to be acting.

He accepts suggestions from anyone—from the cameraman to the stars. This advice is applied scientifically. That's why he is considered by many the greatest of all motion picture producers.

"Springtime" A Delightful Release

Booth Tarkington's story of the valiant struggle for supremacy between a romance and a pre-arranged marriage entitled "Springtime" has been filmed by the Life Photo Corporation and is now being released by them. The action takes place in the chivalrous South in the days when Andrew Jackson's call for volunteers was heard and answered by every citizen within reach of New Orleans. The exterior scenes taken in the South, are rich in the verdure and architectural characteristics of that section of the country.

Florence Nash plays the leading role as Madeline De Valette, and her name and reputation are immediate assurance that every dramatic situation is played with irresistible force and personality. William H. Tooker is seen as Madeline's stern, unrelenting father, and he fairly absorbs the role so strong and convincing is his impersonation. The characterizations of the old priest and Madeline's mother are so perfectly natural that the spectator feels drawn towards them instinctively as does Madeline, when her father's love is overcome by his anger at her disobedience. The supporting cast is fairly good, and earnest in its efforts, but lacking in punch if its work be taken individually.

The photography is clear and restful, and beautifully tinted in shades of green and red in the night and battle scenes. The beauty of the outdoor locations is worthy of special comment, as is the baled-cotton bulwark raised by Jackson's men to withstand the enemy's raid. In a few places the action is impeded by unnecessary sub-titles, but these cases are few and will probably be eliminated before the picture's distribution.

Madeline De Valette is betrothed to her father's cousin, Raoul De Valette, arrangements having been made when she was but a child. Valette invites Raoul to visit him, and, on his arrival, presents him to Madeline as the man she is to marry. The girl, wholly inexperienced in the ways of the world accepts her father's wish as law, though she instinctively dislikes Raoul. Gilbert Steele, a neighbor, visits Valette on business one day, and meets Madeline. They fall in love at first sight, and later, when Gilbert leaves to answer Andrew Jackson's call for volunteers, Madeline follows and begs him to take her with him. This, of course, is impossible, but the girl accompanies her lover to the boats, and then wanders about in the woods all night.

Valette is almost out of his mind in his grief at his daughter's absence. When she returns home, and he learns that she has been with young Steele, he flies in a frenzy, denouncing her for defiling the family name, and shrinking from her as she attempts to embrace him. Madeline's mother and Father O'Mara implore Valette to listen to the girl's explanation, but in vain. According to the custom of praying for the dead, Valette lights seventeen candles in the chapel in his home, and prays for his daughter, declaring her soul dead.

Crawley, a coward who enlisted with Jackson's men, deserts at the first battle; and, to explain his return, spreads the news that the entire company was massacred. Madeline loses her mind on being told that Gilbert is dead, and becomes seriously ill. Valette softens at this, and prays for his daughter's recovery. Wolf's sharpshooters, to which company Gilbert belongs, return home victorious, and Crawley the deserter receives a just punishment. Gilbert calls at the Valette home, and, at sight of him, Madeline's memory is restored. On being told the real facts of his daughter's meeting with young Steele, Valette sanctions their betrothal. Ruth Shepley Engaged By World

Ruth Shepley, one of the most beautiful women on the American stage, has been engaged by the World Film Corporation to appear opposite Robert Warwick in the film version of the great Paul Armstrong success, "Alias Jimmy Valentine." This feature will be released on the World Film schedule February 22. from all indications it will be one of the most striking successes on the program. Miss Shepley's experience on the stage has been of comparatively recent history. She made her debut under the management of William A. Brady in Rupert Hughes' comedy, "All for a Girl," in which Douglas Fairbanks was featured. When that play was withdrawn Miss Shepley was secured for the part of Hope Langdon, the senator's daughter, in "A Gentleman from Mississippi." Then she appeared in other Brady plays, and has had the good fortune to play opposite Mr. Fairbanks in "A Gentleman of Leisure." Last year Miss Shepley had the major female role in the Selwyn comedy, "Nearly Married," in which Bruce MacRae was featured.

"The Treasure of the Louzats"

The Itala Film Company is now releasing its first production since "Cabiria." It is entitled "The Treasure of the Louzats," and while in its four reels of action there is no direct suggestion of adventure, the situations have a distinct flavor of mysterious conquest in them that heightens the interest and puts punch into the climax.

Lydia Quaranta, who played the part of "Cabiria" in the picture of that name, has the leading role as Lydia Louzat, and is ably supported by two finished artists whose names are not made known. The story is a little above the average multiple-reel plot, but the film's greatest merit lies in its beatuiful photography and the graphic manner in which the play is staged. When a castle is mentioned in the sub-titles a person can feel absolutely safe in saying that the scene which follows will look like a castle. If a scene is supposed to represent the interior of a titled man's mansion the setting is built and furnished as one would expect such a place to be. The doors are big, massive, and studded, and the chairs and tables are heavy oak. Such details as these, when conscientiously regarded as they are here, cannot fail to have their effect upon the spectator in driving home the developments of the story.

On her eighteenth birthday, Lydia receives a letter from a mysterious stranger who hurries away before she can question him about his identity or about the letter's origin. Opening it, she finds a faded sheet of paper on which is a message written by her deceased father, telling her of the existence of a hidden fortune, the location of which is told in a certain massive volume bearing the Louzat ancestral arms. Lydia shows the message to her uncle, Count Gerard, who laughs at the idea and throws the paper away.

After his niece leaves the room Gerard re-reads the note and starts to search through the library, but fails to find the book. Thinking that it might be in the castle of a neighboring relative with whom this branch of the Louzats has been at enmity for years, Gerard pays Count Jules a visit and introduces Lydia. Mutual affection springs up between them at first sight. While walking about the estate Lydia tells Jules of the mysterious message, and they return to the castle to find Gerard looking through the books in the library.

Jules orders him to leave at once, and from then on the search for the treasure becomes a race between Gerard and the young couple. The uncle has Lydia placed in a boarding school, and there the girl accidentally finds the old volume mentioned in the letter. Gerard secures the book and locates the treasure, but in his blind haste to uncover the money he fails to follow the note's instructions, and is killed. On arriving at the hiding-place Jules and Lydia find Gerard and his assistant buried under the heavy bags and boxes containing the treasure. C. R. C.

The Louzat treasure proves fatal to Count Gerard.

Fielding Builds Collapsible Studio

On the fair grounds at Phoenix, Arizona, where temporary headquarters have been made by Romaine Fielding's round-the-world company, a collapsible studio was erected in six hours, shortly after the arrival of the players.

Romaine Fielding's new collapsible studio in erection.

The plans for the studio, which can be torn down and packed within three hours, were drawn up by the Lubin's star prior to his leaving Philadelphia. His idea was to create a sectional studio of sufficient proportions to accommodate any kind of an interior setting but which could be torn down and transported with the least possible labor and expense. In the undertaking he brought to bear all his experience, both in the legitimate and moving picture fields, and the result was more than satisfying.

The first scenes to be taken on this stage will be several in "West, Two Thousand Miles," a two reel comedy drama in which Mr. Fielding plays the leading role. He is also the author and director of the piece.

Cameramen Off to South America

An extensive trip that will require eight months' time to complete has been planned by the Paramount Pictures Corporation. It sent four expert cameramen via Florida last week to South America. In brief, their itinerary will be Cuba, Jamaica, Panama; down the west coast with stops in Ecuador, Peru, Chili, and Bolivia; across the heights of the Andes, with visits in Argentine, Paraguay and Uraguay; the Strait of Magellan, Falkland Islands; up the east coast to Brazil, with stops at the principal ports, Rio de Janeiro, etc., into the interior of Brazil, via the Amazon Valley, Guiana, and home.

This Paramount plan was instituted because it is the belief of this organization that the American people are greatly interested in the Americans, and few know of the wonderful cities, the great scenic attractions, the marvelous industrial enterprises, the life of the varied peoples, etc. that make up our great neighboring continent.

There will be one release of one reel every week and each release will comprise two different subjects that will harmonize—these will not be travel pictures with views of historic cathedrals and uninteresting landscape views. The idea is not to educate but to entertain, and every subject it is claimed will be as full of "action" as the dramatic or comedy pictures.

"The Glory of Clementina Wing"

REVIEWED BY CHARLES R. CONDON

WILLIAM J. LOCKE'S well-known novel, "The Glory of Clementina Wing," has been dramatized and filmed by the Edison Company, and will be released by it on February 12. The picture is two reels in length, and concerns principally the fortunes of eccentric Clementina Wing, a successful portrait painter, who is utterly immune to the demands of convention, neglecting her personal appearance almost to the point of slovenliness and paying no attention whatever to meaningless courtesy.

Miriam Nesbitt plays the leading role as Clementina Wing, and Marc MacDermott plays opposite her as the much imposed upon philanthropist, Ephraim Quixtus. Others among the cast are Duncan McRae as the slovenly looking George; Margaret Plussing as Mrs. Fontaine; Pat O'Malley as Tom, a relative of Clementina's and about the only person who can understand her queer ways; and Viola Dana as Etta Concanna.

The opening of the story explains to the spectators a situation which later causes Ephraim Quixtus to doubt the faithfulness of the woman he worshiped during her life. Will Hammerstey, an elderly bachelor, is deeply in love with Mrs. Duglade, a widow and a friend of Mrs. Quixtus. Though having good reasons to believe that his love is returned, Hammerstey is shy about making appointments with the widow, and makes his arrangements for meeting her through Mrs. Quixtus.

One day Hammerstey brings the mutual friend a love letter which he wishes her to deliver to Mrs. Duglade. As he is handing it to Mrs. Quixtus her husband enters the room. To avoid the embarrassment of explaining the note's contents, Hammerstey slips it in the top drawer of the dresser in front of which he is standing. Circumstances prevent his recovering the note, and it stays there, the incident having slipped from Mrs. Quixtus' mind.

Much against his will Quixtus is prevailed upon to sit for a portrait. Clementina Wing is the painter chosen, and she and the wealthy philanthropist become well acquainted. Shortly afterwards Mrs. Quixtus is taken ill and dies, and her husband gives his time to philanthropy in an effort to forget his sorrow. His generosity is often imposed upon by the people he helps. Three men in particular call regularly at his house for dinner in the evening, leaving their coats hanging in the hall in such a way that Quixtus, looking at them, is greeted by a gaping pocket, and depart after the meal without a thought of the gratitude they owe the philanthropist.

He tires of this in time, and forbids their coming again. One of them, a fellow named George, returns one night and in an impulsive moment Quixtus offers to take him to Paris with him. George's first act is to call on Mrs. Fontaine, an adventuress, and enlist her aid in his scheme to secure possession of Quixtus' money. The next day Mrs. Fontaine sails for Paris, and some time later meets the philanthropist and his companion there in a cafe.

At about the time that Quixtus is summoned to Paris by a society in which he holds an office, Clementina Wing also decides to go abroad, and by a lucky turn of Fate, occupies the table next to Mrs. Fontaine's in the cafe on the night on which Quixtus falls a victim to the woman's charms. Shaking off her cousin Tom and his fiancee, Etta Concanna, who attempt to restrain her, Clementina stalks to the next table, grasps the bewildered Quixtus by the sleeve and almost drags him out of the cafe with her.

The settings of the following scenes are back in America, but the trend of the action is the same, Clementina striving to protect Quixtus from the worldly woman's deadly charms and intent. All of this time the painter has been fixed up and clad in her usual careless fashion. Suddenly the idea comes to her to fight Mrs. Fontaine with her own weapons. At a reception to which all three are invited Clementina's entrance is greeted with a gasp from all. She seems transformed into a different person by a becoming hair-dress and a stylish gown. Quixtus' attention is riveted upon her all evening, and a few days later he calls upon her and proposes. Her acceptance is strongly suggested by the manner in which the couple embrace.

Despite his new happiness Quixtus is worried about a note which he found in the dresser some time before, and which causes him to doubt his wife's faithfulness to him. Clementina dispels this doubt by learning of the relations between Hammerstey and Mrs. Duglade and proving to Quixtus that the note was meant for the widow.

$1,000,000 Mystery Solutions Fill Room

with the $10,000 prize offer as the incentive. The Thanhouser studio at New Rochelle has been literally swamped with mail carrying solutions of eager fans. If New Rochelle is ever raised out of the third class postal rank it will be due to "The Million Dollar Mystery."

The name of the winner of the $10,000 will not be disclosed until the twenty-third episode is completed. In this episode, which will be released about February 22, the successful contestant will be shown, together with the principals in the great serial and Harold McGrath the famous author. That "The Million Dollar Mystery" was the most successful of serials is admitted even by producers of subsequent continued stories. Every man, woman and child who followed the exciting career of Florence Gray, so marvelously portrayed by Florence La Badie, the machinations of Marguerite Snow and Frank Farrington, and the heroism of James Cruze and Sidney Bracy will want to see the final happenings, marking the end of the famous serial.

Edison Program Announcement

Beginning Monday, March 1, the Edison program will contain each week, in the regular service, a three-reel feature and a strong two-reel drama. The first three-reel feature will appear on Monday and the two-reel subject on Friday of the same week. The week following, this order will be reversed,—the two reel coming on Monday and the three-reel on Friday. Each week the order will thus be alternated, as to Mondays and Fridays, allowing better service.

Edison has been putting out a three-reel feature, in the past about once a month, the rest of the features being in the masterpiece service of the General Film Company. It is likely now that Edison will put all its features through its regular service program, instead of through the feature service. Edison was the first manufacturer to place a three-reel feature in its regular program, and this weekly event will mark the beginning of new life at the Edison studio where new directors are being added, the scenario department enlarged and improved that this new speed and high standard be maintained. Another innovation that is proving a great success is the featuring, for every week, of William Wadsworth and Arthur Housman in a string of comedies more farcical and step-lively than Edison comedies have been in the past. Both Wadsworth and Housman have been popular comedians as individuals, but the reception given them as a team has surprised even the most hopeful in that organization.

Ramo Joins United

Ramo Films, Inc. which has attained no little reputation as the producer of feature films, announces that in the future it will manufacture one and two reel photoplays which will be released through the United Motion Pictures, Inc. which handles the output of the United Film Service. The Ramo Company seeks to establish a reputation for society dramas and comedies of a de luxe nature and will release its product under the brand name of Regent. The title of the initial production is "Her Lesson" and it is scheduled for release on Monday, January 25. Work at the new Ramo studio at Flushing, Long Island is progressing satisfactorily, so Regent releases will follow regularly on the United Service.

Flamingo to Release Through World

Announcement is made by the Flamingo Film Company, which formerly released through A. H. Sawyer, Inc., that contracts have been entered into by which the Flamingo brand of film will be released through the World Film Corporation. Among the early releases of the Flamingo Company will be "A Jay in Peacock Alley," the winning photoplay of Roy. L. McCardell in the Morning Telegraph—Chartered Theaters Corporation national scenario contest. Work on this comedy has already begun and its release date will probably be announced the latter part of February.

American Produces Drama of the West

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

SEVERAL wonderful panoramic views of the mountain peaks in Southern California and careful tinting and photography throughout, make the two-reel picture to be released by the American Film Manufacturing Company on February 1, entitled, "The Law of the Wilds," one which will attract more than passing attention.

The entire atmosphere of the production suggests the rugged West and the character drawing of the two principal male leads, Jack Richardson and Harry Von Meter, coupled with the impressive work of Vivian Rich, who is thoroughly at home as the girl-wife of a primitive trapper, perfectly suggests the primitive life of the frontier people.

The story itself is interesting and is constructed in such a manner that many sharply-focused dramatic effects are obtained. The climax especially stands out in prominence, as it removes the husband of the woman, who has been the obstacle between her and the man who really deserves her love, when everything points to an unpleasant ending. While certain portions of the film appear to be slightly padded, nevertheless, the "high spots," where the interest is kept wide-awake, are not in the least diminished.

The prospectors leave for the gold fields.

As the films begin, the primitive trapper is seen searching for furs. Luck is against him and his traps are empty when he visits them. His wife and child at home suffer from want of food and the sight of them irritates him. Two prospectors arrive from civilization to try their luck in the new gold field, which is located about 100 miles from the trapper's home. Just as they enter the settlement they see a man being led off to prison for having stolen the contents of a cache.

The prospectors secure supplies at a store in the settlement and travel by pack horse to the end of the trail, where they cache their food and proceed into the heart of the mining district. The trapper, driven to desperation, steals their supplies and brings them to his wife. Later he leaves for the mining district himself, despite his wife's protests.

One of the prospectors is injured in a landslide and the food they have with them is buried. They make their way back to the cache and find that it has been rifled. The trapper's wife rescues them and cares for the injured man. Later the two decide to become trappers and pitch their tent near the cabin in which the woman and her child live. Both fall in love with her and one forces his attentions upon her despite the fact that she does not encourage him; the other sends him away after he has insulted the trapper's wife and, fearing that he, himself, will fall in love with her, plans to leave also.

The worthless prospector, by means of a flour sack which has been burned while in his possession, learns that the food was stolen by someone in the cabin and decides to accuse the trapper's wife. At the climax the trapper returns, just as the worthy prospector is leaving, and is about to kill him when the worthless prospector and the sheriff rush in and accuse the wife of stealing the contents of the cache. The trapper cannot see his wife blamed for his deed and admits the crime. When he attempts to escape he is shot down and dies a short time later, leaving the worthy prospector and his wife free to love.

"The Last Chapter"

A soldier of fortune can always find an audience among all classes, and so for the same reason the visualization of Donald Gordon's adventures in "The Last Chapter" should hold the average spectator in a firm and magnetic grip. Romance and love with their little human-interest setbacks and stirring adventure with its gasps and thrills, are the principal factors in the story, which is from the pen of Richard Harding Davis, and has been picturized by the Favorite Players Film Company.

Carlyle Blackwell plays the leading part as Donald Gordon, the adventurous and essentially clean-cut and business-like young American, and puts into the characterization the likeable qualities and forceful personality for which his work is noted. If trifling details were to be criticised his golf might come under the ban, but, as stated above, this is but a small error and worth no more than a comment. William D. Taylor, who is entitled to much praise for the direction of the picture, also comes in for a share of the histrionic honors through the medium of one of the small but important parts.

Ruth Hartman takes the feminine lead as Alice Egerton, and John J. Sheehan characterizes the despicable, self-centered dude, Reggy Trevor. Jack Hilton, Gordon's best friend, is impersonated by Victor Rottman. The balance of the cast is composed of Scence from "The Last Chapter," a Favorite Players release.

William Benton as Roy Arbuthnot, Henry Kernan as Mr. Egerton, and Olive Kirkby as Mary Brown.

The exterior tropical scenes and light effects are wonderful. In one scene Gordon's exploring party is seen passing over a distant hill at daybreak. The rising sun is seen reflected in a pinkish glow in the sky, and a very faint tint of green represents the hazy darkness in which the earth is still wrapped. It is a scene that one has to see to appreciate its full artistic value. The tropical scenes are suggestive enough to carry the story without trouble, due partly to the employment of a large number of transplanted Africans, and partly to the carefully built and well located African villages. The story has already been given in Motography's synopsis department.

Gaby Deslys Makes Screen Debut

Gaby Deslys, the illustrious international star, will make her first and exclusive appearance in motion pictures in an original story of the theater, entitled "Her Triumph," produced in Paris by the Famous Players Film Co., to be released on the Paramount program February 8. The subject was written expressly for the distinguished star, and is so constructed as to display to the utmost advantage Mlle. Deslys' versatile and astonishing talents. The production introduces many novelties, such as the Dance Deslys, an original terpsichorean creation, and other features that have won fame for the star throughout the civilized world. Of no little importance, also, is the presence in the cast of Harry Pilcer, who has until recently been associated with Mlle. Deslys as her dancing partner, since her first visit to this country, and who appears in her chief support in this notable film production.

Gaby Deslys in Famous Players "Her Triumph."

The wonderful and beautiful Gaby is said to be even more bewitching on the screen than she has been in all her previous stage performances, and the fascinating star's famed beauty and charm can be appreciated to even better advantage on the film than from across the footlights. The subject offers many striking effects, including an impressive reproduction of the stage upon which "Her Triumph" is attained, one of the most unique settings ever conceived for a screen production.

New Vitagraph Bill

The program beginning Sunday, January 24, at the Vitagraph theater is composed of a three-part drama of the far Northwest, "O'Garry of the Royal Mounted," written and produced by Ned Finley and featuring Edith Storey, S. Rankin Drew, Logan Paul, Jack Brawn, and Mr. Finley; a Sidney Drew comedy, "The Home-Coming of Henry;" a single-reel drama, "The Barrier of Faith;" "The Chief's Goat," a reel of mirth; and a two-part drama by the Western Vitagraph Company, "Life's Game."

Essanay Film Has Big Surprise at Finish

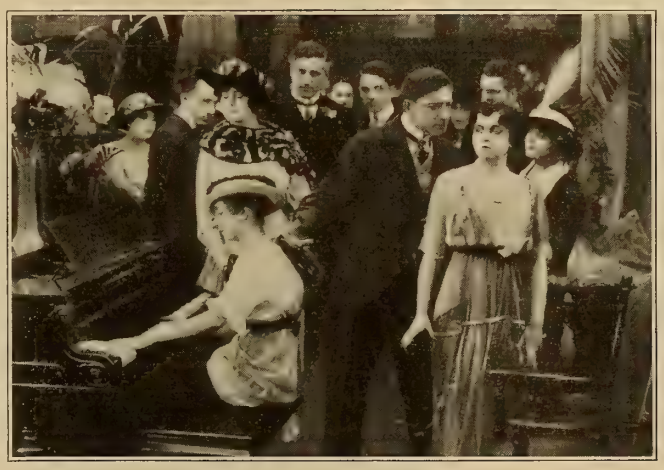
REVIEWED BY NEIL G. CAWARD

INTERNATIONAL intrigue as the basis of a clever story, beautiful photography to put the story over in film form, and a tremendous surprise at the end, all serve to make Essanay's two-reel feature, "Thirteen Down," the release of February 12, a feature well worth booking.

The surprise element contained in the last hundred feet of the film alone would serve to put the picture over in a manner satisfactory to the exhibitor. Audiences dearly love to be amazed, and pictures of this nature are all too seldom to be found on the average theater program.

As the story runs, Dr. Lamarde, inventor of the Lamarde gun, has an argument with James Gordon, a publisher, one evening, Lamarde claiming there is nothing in luck but everything in environment, and offering to back his theory by a wager. And as proof of his point, the two men visit the slums and by mutual consent, pick out the thirteenth man in the bread line, bundle him into their automobile and convey him to the palatial home of Dr. Lamarde, where he is informed that he has been selected to foil a plot to steal the plans for the Lamarde gun.

Austin explains how he overpowered the intruders.



Jeanne Lamarde doubts Austin.

The vagabond is further told that in order to effectually foil this plot, he must doff his rags and tatters and don a splendid business suit to be provided for him, and he is then to appear as Dr. Lamarde's secretary while secretly guarding the plans of Lamarde's gun. Francis X. Bushman, who plays the role of Arnold Austin, the vagabond in the bread line, is indeed a ragged and tattered wayfarer, who in the cold gray dawn of the morning can be found in the bread line of the slums. Incidentally, it may be said at this point that the Essanay people film in this section of the story a real bread line in Chicago's underworld.

Austin, the vagabond, finds added zest in the new role, when he discovers Jeanne Lamarde, the beautiful daughter of his employer, for he is instantly attracted by her winsome manner and looks forward with pleasure to residing under the same roof with her.

Dr. Lamarde shows his new secretary the hiding place of the plans in a wall safe concealed behind a picture frame, and one day when Jeanne accidently discovers the vagabond twirling the combination lock of the wall safe, she grows suspicious that he, himself, is attempting to rob her father of his invention, but though she orders him to leave the place immediately, she does not expose him to her father.

In the meantime, Robert Orson, one of Jeanne's most frequent callers, is seen several times confering privately with the butler, who acts most suspiciously, and apparently there is something in the wind between this handsomely dressed young suitor of Jeanne's and the lowly butler.

One evening while Jeanne and her father are attending the opera, the vagabond-secretary discovers two men about to open the wall safe. He rises from his chair beside the fireplace and attacks them, and after a terrible battle succeeds in overpowering both of them just as Jeanne and her father return home. As the lights flash up the two intruders are discovered to be Baron Schoman and his secretary, two of the guests of honor at Miss Lamarde's reception, a society affair which took place the day before.

When Dr. Lamarde and Jeanne both shower praises upon the vagabond secretary for his valiant defense of the plans and his ultimate exposure of the plotters, the man announces that he is none other than Arnold Austin, chief of the United States secret service, and that Orson, Jeanne's lover, and the butler are both his assistants, and that they have been on the trail of the baron for many months, Austin having been working on the case when found in the bread line by Dr. Lamarde.

Rita Jolivet Engaged by Jesse L. Lasky

Samuel Goldfish announces on behalf of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company the completion of a contract with Miss Rita Jolivet, whereby this distinguished international star will make her first film appearance under the Lasky management in a picturization of Eleanor M. Ingram's successful novel, "The Unafraid." Miss Jolivet will play the title part of Delight Warren, a rich New York girl who is engaged to a Montenegran of noble birth and who experiences, in the wild mountains of that country, many romantic adventures, culminating in a marriage not to her betrothed but to his brother. Miss Jolivet was born in Paris and has played in Paris, London and New York as well as in all the other leading French, English and American cities. Her mother was a celebrated pianist before her marriage to Miss Jolivet's father and her sister, Mlle. Inez Jolivet, is one of the foremost women violinists of the European continent. The Jolivet family has an English home at Kew Gardens near London.

Change in Edison Monthly

The Edison Kinetogram, which for some time has been issued monthly, will be issued twice a month, beginning February 15. The first issue will include all the releases for the first part of the month, while the other issue the releases for the balance of the month. The change is made with the idea of bettering this branch of the service and making the advance notes more timely for the far western exhibitors. The book will also contain a new department devoted to the players and sidelights on plays and studio life.

First Chaplin Release

Charles Chaplin will appear in his first Essanay photo-comedy, "His New Job," on February 1. This comedy is declared by critics who have seen it to be the funniest comedy ever filmed. It is simply a riot of fun from start to finish.

"It is the very best comedy I ever produced," is what Mr. Chaplin says of it himself. "The new surroundings and the clever actors whom I had to work with enabled me to make the greatest comedy of my life. I couldn't help laughing at it myself, when I saw is on the screen."

This two reel comedy is just what its title indicates. Mr. Chaplin built it up on his coming to the Essanay Company, though he has instilled incidents into it that would make a Methodist deacon shriek with laughter. He produced the play without any scenario whatever, although he had carefully thought out the outlines of his plot beforehand. Most of the incidents and practically all of the little mirth producing tricks were extemporaneous, however, Mr. Chaplin originating them as the camera was clicking out the film.

Vitagraph Film for Panama Exposition

In the accompanying photograph one beholds the leap made from the upper deck of a ferry boat by Jeannette Ehrman for the Vitagraph Company for the purpose of demonstrating the efficiency of the life-saving service of the New York Harbor police. The film was taken at the foot of the statue of liberty in New York Harbor, the base of the statue being shown in the background, and will form part of an exhibit to be shown at the Panama Exposition.

Submarine Pictures Move

Owing to the tremendous attendance and the smallness of the house in which they have previously been installed, the Universal submarine motion pictures, which have been running for nearly a month at the Fine Arts theater on Michigan avenue, will move on Sunday, January 31, to the Studebaker theater, where they will be installed for an indefinite run. Since the opening of this attraction the S. R. O. sign has been in evidence at almost every performance and weeks ago an effort was made to secure a larger theater for continuing the run, but it was only on Wednesday of this week that final arrangements for securing the Studebaker theater were completed.

R. A. Walsh of Mutual has succumbed to the charm of directing.

Conspirators Plan to Rob Zudora

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

TO SAY that the new characters which have been added to "Zudora in the $20,000,000 Mystery" are the life of the film is undoubtedly putting into words the opinion of those who have seen the last few installments. In episode No. 11, Madame Duval, the woman of mystery; her band of conspirators; Detective Hunt and Jim Baird are the ones who perform the interest-holding deeds during the two reels.

The title of the latest issue of the serial is "A Message From the Heart," and it deals with the further plans of the conspirators to drive Zudora from the country and secure her fortune. Jim Baird is active throughout and is instrumental in putting Detective Hunt on the trail of the plotters, this eventually leading to the arrest of two of their number. Madame Duval and Captain Radcliffe, the characters played by Elizabeth Forbes and Frank Farrington, adopt a novel method to frighten Zudora, the scheming woman masquerading as a ghost.

The work of the players appearing in various roles is good. Harry Benham, Marguerite Snow and James Cruze do all that is required with skill, the latter being especially at ease in his former role, that of a reporter-hero. The struggle between Sidney Bracy, who portrays the character of Detective Hunt, and the two men impersonating the conspirators, who are captured at the end, is most realistic and considerable suspense is aroused during it.

The opening scenes show John Storm visiting Zudora, who is staying at the home of a kind-hearted woman friend. The lovers appear to be very devoted to each other and when John leaves he takes the part of the burned will which tells that Zudora is the heiress to the mine. This he delivers to Detective Hunt, who finds a mysterious message on it which the others failed to notice.

In the palatial home of Madame Duval the leaders of the conspirators are gathered discussing the best means to employ in securing Zudora's fortune. Three of the rougher members of the band enter a house in a vacant lot and then pass through a tunnel to the basement of Madame Duval's home. By means of shutting off and turning on the water in a fountain which is situated in the center of the ball room, they let the leaders know they have arrived. They then are carried to the main floor in a secret elevator and given the diamonds, which were smuggled into the country, to have them priced.

They go to the house of an old diamond cutter and Jim Baird, who has been spying on them, follows. They lock themselves in the den, after securing an entrance by showing a pass from the "heart," and Jim, by climbing to the roof and letting himself down with a rope, looks in the window and sees what they are doing. He then hurries to Detective Hunt and tells him of their workings, and the detective plans their capture.

Meantime, Radcliffe and Madame Duval hit upon a plan to drive Zudora from the country and the latter dresses entirely in white. Radcliffe gets a huge heart shield with a sword piercing it, on which is written the words of a warning to Zudora, telling her that unless she flees at once her life will be taken. They then hurry to Zudora's room, and in the quiet of the night the ghost appears to the girl and she collapses. About this same time Hunt has trapped two of the conspirators in their hut and, after a fierce struggle, places them under arrest.

Goldberg Sees Bright Future

Jesse Goldburg, secretary and general manager of the Life Photo Film Corporation, who, as announced in a prior issue of this publication, left New York the week of January 18 on his way to the coast, for the purpose of ascertaining the condition of the film market, for purchase of features on state right basis, reports in Chicago unbounded success. Mr. Goldburg states that there is a decided healthy air about conditions in the film industry in general, and that the exchange men in the territory already traversed by him are decidedly optimistic with respect to the future as far as high-class feature films are concerned.

Mr. Goldburg found little or no difficulty in disposing of the output for the next eleven months of the Life Photo Film Corporation's features, including "The Avalanche," "A Modern Magdalene," and "The Curious Conduct of Judge LeGarde." The contracts entered into provide for an initial release of one feature a month for six months and two five-part features a month for a further period of five months.

The exchanges contracted with are as follows: Electric Theater & Supply Company of Philadelphia for the territory of eastern Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, District of Columbia and Virginia; the Northern Film Company of Pittsburgh for western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio and Kentucky; the Casino Feature Film Company of Detroit for Michigan and Wisconsin; the Celebrated Players' Film Exchange of Chicago for Illinois and Indiana.

Leaving Chicago, Mr. Goldburg will proceed to Minneapolis, Duluth, Wichita, Kansas, Denver, St. Paul, Butte, Mont., Kansas City, San Francisco, Los Angeles and Seattle. On his way east he will stop off at Boston, and last close the territory of New York.

The factory of the Commercial Motion Picture Company at Grantwood, N. J., an allied company of the Life Photo Film Corporation, which company develops the negatives and manufactures the prints of the Life Photo Company in addition to those of various other producing concerns, has been compelled to work twenty-four hours out of the day on three shifts in order to make delivery of prints under the contracts being sent into the home office by Mr. Goldburg. Mr. Goldburg, it is expected, will return to New York about February 15.

New Universal Serial

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company announces its next serial to follow the "Master Key," beginning March 8, will be called "The Black Box." It will be released as a special feature outside of the regular program in fifteen installments of two reels each. The story has been written by E. Phillips Oppenheim, the famous English novelist, produced by Otis Turner, and will feature Herbert Rawlinson, Anna Little and William Worthington.

Augustus Phillips of Edison has secured the Crescent theater, New York, for a benefit performance for the Actor's Fund of America.

"The Hypocrites" Screened

The Longacre theater on Jan. 20, was rescued from the half-hearted attendance of a legitimate play and given capacity, afternoon and evening house by the sweeping in of the Bosworth Company's "Hypocrites."

Broadway, play-satiated, forgot to yawn. Instead, it added to the box-office line and paid from twenty-five cents to one dollar for the privilege of viewing "Hypocrites"—and Truth. It was rumored that if you did not see this Bosworth film on the night of its first showing, you might not have an opportunity thereafter, as Anthony Comstock was to be one of the evening's guests and after that—who knows? Mr. Comstock was one of the guests, but the film is still showing and will continue to do so until New York and commuters from Jersey will all have come and seen.

This popularity of the film might be described as "the triumph of Truth"; this, despite the fact that it is the story itself, its fine photography and direction, its symbolism and its realism that make for the standard of the film. Yet—there is Truth. And Truth we have not always with us. But right now she is showing Broadway just what hypocrites are, its church-people, its politicians, its society-followers, its fun-loving people.

It was the "O. K." of the entire membership of the censor board that sent the film into the Longacre theater uncensored. And it was the nude figure of "Truth," a young woman by the name of Margaret Edwards, who was the cause of bringing the entire board into session. Truth, if enshrouded in a cloud of tulle, would cease to be the naked truth—and for the sake of the story and its morality lesson, it was necessary that Truth be absolutely truthful; hence Miss Edward's lack of raiment. Hence, also, the vehemence of the exclamation "The idea!" as vented by a matronly lady in Row "H," on opening night, and the leading out of her husband during what was probably the third reel.

"But of course she's wearing tights," one girl consoled another, in Row "G." "Of couse!" agreed her companion and they enjoyed the film through.

Lois Weber's introduction of the nude figure into photoplay while daring, is its own vindication. It could easily have repulsed; instead its presence is an artistic one.

The presentation of the multiple-reeled offering does credit to Harry Reichenbach, manager and press representative of the Bosworth Company, and to S. L. Rothapfel, the splendor of whose productions at the Strand theater, makes his services highly desirable at such special showings as that of "Hypocrites." Music, the cries of the mob as it rushes forward to destroy the statue of "Truth" given the people by a monk, as the result of a life of patient work, are features of the film's presentation.

Then there is a reader, in the garb of a vested clergyman, who appears at the opening of the picture and again at its close with his declamation—"Hypocrites! Hypocrites!—Follow Truth!" There is no panic amongst the audience, only a complimentary silence as the curtain falls and every-day hypocrites reach under the seats for their hats and other every-day hypocrites feel for their hat-pins and register the wish that there might be mirrors on the backs of the seat in front of them.

Getting the Right Kind of "Juice"

EXHIBITORS who have a smattering of electrical knowledge know that the projection arc requires current at less than fifty volts, while the electric light companies usually supply it at one hundred and ten volts, and the difference, over fifty per cent, is a total loss where a rheostat is used. This loss, of course, falls on the exhibitor, because he pays for all that comes through his meter. A theatrical man in Albany, N. Y., recently applied to the state public service commission, asking that it order the electric light company to supply him with direct current at the voltage he really used, claiming that there was a sufficient demand for this type of service to warrant establishing the new classification.

The commission has refused this exhibitor's petition. It claims that the company does not refuse to supply several kinds of current, namely 500 volt direct current for power, and four kinds of alternating current for lighting and power. The company is willing to supply all of these standard kinds and sizes if the theater will install its own apparatus for transforming or stepping down the current to the kind or voltage it requires. It is pointed out that if, in response to this complaint, the company were to be compelled to install the special apparatus needed either at its plant thence to be transmitted over special lines, or on the premises, any consumer desiring any special variation of current might compel the company to furnish it or else be subject to a charge of discrimination. This policy would obviously involve a ruinous duplication of plant and lines throughout the city. The reason that the theater complained of the alternating current was that this current generally produces a sharp buzz in the arc. The lights have to be watched very closely to minimize this sound, which cannot be entirely eliminated.

This note would be more interesting if the commission had granted the exhibitor's petition. We cannot avoid the conclusion that public demand should have something to do with the kind of current supplied by an electric lighting company. Every big city has enough motion picture theaters (which are large users of electricity) to create a considerable demand for a certain type of service. Possibly if they all got together and insisted, the service company would feel inclined to supply the demand without any court or commission order.

Of course in this day of general use of step-down transformers and rotary converters there is not nearly the loss of current there was with the rheostat. But a good many rheostats are still used on 110 volt circuits, and a few on 220 volts. In these cases the loss is very large, and a fifty-volt supply of direct current would be a welcome economy.

Another Slam at the Educationals

ONLY a few weeks ago we had occasion to comment on the statement of a Bostonian lecturer that educational films tax the brains of children, while all other kinds tax their morals. Now Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, superintendent of Chicago schools, comes forward with another attack on the highbrow stuff.

Mrs. Young, it seems, had been invited to attend an exhibition of educational pictures given by the Woman's City Club at Orchestra Hall, Chicago. She was asked to speak, in the belief that she would say a good word for the type of subjects shown. But she upset expectations somewhat. She said that the extensive use of the film is endangering the proper use of the English language. She said she believed that the strident tones ascribed to the American woman's voice is due to the overuse of the eye to the neglect of the ear. She said she would be sorry to see the moving picture used to teach history, as she felt certain that the battlefield would be overplayed.

"We must be careful," said she, "not to cultivate the eye too much and the ear not enough. I believe that one reason why the moving picture is supplanting the drama is because our ears are getting dull, and we don't understand what the actors are saying.

"While I believe the moving picture can be used to show children a certain moral lesson, you can't force a moral lesson on children all the time. They like to see something that is human and dramatic. They used to have the yellow-backed novel. That is bad, but if all reading is going out, that is much worse."

She did admit that the greatest value of the educational film in the school is in the study of the earth, including the study of geography, zoology and botany.

And after this scientific analysis of the biological effects of the picture on the ears and voice, Mrs. Young proudly stated that she had attended a grand total of two (2) picture shows—one of which she was ashamed of. She is, therefore, an ideal critic, being unhampered by any knowledge of the subject. Not knowing the pictures, she is free to dislike them. Charles Lamb (who stuttered) once heard a name mentioned and exclaimed, "I h-hate that m-m-man!" Someone said, "Why, Charles! I didn't think you knew him." "I d-don't," replied Lamb; "I c-c-can't h-hate a m-man I know." Of course, if Mrs. Young knew pictures she would have a kindlier feeling for them, and would understand why everybody else likes them. She would not be inclined to blame them for the alleged prevalence of dull ears and harsh voices—two crimes entirely new, so far as we know, in the catalog of charges against the films.

There is, however, at least one encouraging clause in Mrs. Young's testimony. "You can't, she says, "force a moral on children all the time. They like to see something human and dramatic." Is it possible that Chicago's great educator favors those dramas and comedies which are supposed to be tabooed by Chicago's feminine highbrow element? Perhaps a little small-time vaudeville on the side would remove that objectionable feature of dull ears; though we must confess the harsh voice is a harder problem. Listening to vaudeville voices would not, we fear, remedy it—at least not by example. We suspect that Mrs. Young would be glad to see the talking pictures made practical, that the ear might be soothed, the voice given a lesson in dulcification, and the eye pleased and instructed in a single operation.

As to the teaching of history, our recollection of that absorbing study is that it was just one battlefield after another—including current history. The only question raised by Mrs. Young's remarks, then, is whether it is better to make the children read the dry description of each battlefield and its results, and then forget it all; or to see the actual occurences as though they were present, and never forget any of it—running the risk of acquiring a belligerent and warlike spirit.

Mrs. Young's attack on the pictures is in gentle spirit and without virulence or malice. Induce her to attend a few selected programs, and she would become a friend instead of a critic. We can only hope that she will, by accident or otherwise, get better acquainted with the pictures before she makes another analysis of their peculiar shortcomings.

Exclusive Homes Used in "Mignon"

The palatial homes of four wealthy Californians were recently used by the California Motion Picture Corporation to get the scenic effects needed in producing the filmed version of the famous old grand opera, "Mignon." The story of the romance carries the hero and heroine through Italy, France and southern Germany, takes them to the ocean cliff, dence forest, village, castle and palace and requires scenery which was difficult to find.

Just A Moment Please

Why all this fuss, we wonder, and these press bulletins about Paul Scardon and his impersonation of the Sulphurous Monarch in the Vitagraph film "Miss Jekyll and Mme. Hyde"? We know a lot of actors who look like the devil both off and on the screen. That doesn't mean any insinuation whatever, Paul; it merely happens to be an easily-thought-of wheeze.

For pure, unadulterated persistence, we have to hand it to Dick Willis, the indomitable free lance press agent of the Pacific Coast. Other press agents would, perhaps, have grown peeved or melancholy because the pics they sent in didn't "make the book." But not so Dick. Ah, far from it. Instead, he got busy with his trusty camera, and with MOTOGRAPHY as a "drop," produced the accompanying "still" of Henry Otto and Irving Cummings reading the—(But why go on? Everyone knows the de luxe trade journal of the industry to which we of course refer)—in Otto's garden at Santa Barbara. "The Passer-by" a Civil War Story

A STIRRING story of Civil War days, beautifully photographed and clearly told, is the Selig two-reel release of Monday, February 8. Its title is "The Passer-by."

In the cast are such stars as Stella Razeto, Guy Oliver and Jack McDonald, all of whom have roles worthy of their ability. The production was staged by Edward LeSaint and is skillfully handled in all its details, the war scenes, both in camp and on the actual field of battle, being worthy of particular mention.

As the story runs, Fay Thompson, the village belle, is besieged by a host of lovers, though Wallace Richards, a young villager, is generally accepted as her chosen sweetheart. The war between the North and South has just broken out, and Jamie, Fay's brother, who has been left as the only support of the family by the death of his father, is drafted by Colonel Morrison, who refuses to release him, despite the pleas of his invalid mother and beautiful sister. Jamie's family is too poor to buy him a substitute and they therefore face the terror of hunger and poverty. Fay pleads with Wallace Richards, her sweetheart, to take Jamie's place in the army, but he refuses. Fay then calls together all her admirers, takes a tiny gold cross from her neck and announces that the man who will act as substitute for her brother, Jamie, shall be entitled to wear the cross and claim her for his bride upon his return from the war.

All her admirers declare their love and admiration for Fay, but none of them is man enough to accept her offer, and one after another they depart, leaving the cross still in her possession. She hangs it to the limb of a tree under which she has been accustomed to hold trysts with her lovers, in the hope that some of them may be manly enough to return later and claim it by joining the army in Jamie's place.

The "passer-by" falls in battle

It happens that Frank Coakley, a manly young fellow of good appearance and genuine integrity, arrives in the village that day, and having learned of Fay's offer and the conduct of her various lovers, together with the alarming prospect ahead of Fay's family, visits the tree, removes the cross, goes to the headquarters of Colonel Morrison and announces that he has come to act as a substitute for Jamie.

Fay in search of the unknown volunteer

Later that night, as the troops march for the front, Fay discovers that the cross is missing from the tree, and on watching the departure of the troops, to her great astonishment sees it worn by a man whose face is unknown to her.

On the battlefield Coakley distinguishes himself and wins promotion, though one day in a desperate charge he is wounded and removed to a field hospital. There he is divested of all his valuables, among which is the gold cross which he so carefully guarded. This cross falls into the hands of Colonel Morrison, who, of course, does not know who gave it to Coakley.

After the war is over Coakley returns to the village to claim his bride, but upon making love to the girl, is told that she has promised to marry the man who took her brother's place. Coakley insists that he is that man, but upon her request that he produce the cross which is the token of his service, Coakley can only explain that it was taken from him at the hospital and that it had not been returned to him. Meanwhile Colonel Morrison appears and, by chance, Fay learns that he brings with him her cross. Fay offers her hand in marriage to him because he possesses the emblem which she has agreed to recognize, but when Morrison and Coakley are brought face to face, Colonel Morrison recognizes at once the hero of the battlefield, from whose neck the cross had been removed.

Fay is delighted to find that her impulsive compact is wholly in accord with the desires of her heart, so she and Coakley at last are united in marriage and the hero comes to his reward.

New Method of Securing Tinted Scenes

EXPERIMENTS MADE AT CLUNE'S

THAT the exhibition of moving pictures in theaters may soon be attended by many new, wonderful and beautiful effects, by casting multi-hued lights on the screen, was demonstrated in a series of scientific experiments made by a group of experts in cinematography, assembled Friday forenoon, January 8, in Clune's Broadway Theater, Los Angeles, California, to test the possibilities of color effects in conjunction with the regular projection of films. The experiments lasted two hours, during which time the auditorium occasionally was flooded with prismatic, rainbow lights that would have delighted the soul of a cubist, Rembrandt, Belasco or Maxfield Parrish.

Many experts in the manufacture of moving picture films object to the present method of tinting the sensitive, celluloid prints, maintaining that the system of immersing the films in colored liquids develops defects of static, fogginess, shrinkage of the celluloid and blurring of high lights in the images of persons and artistic scenery. These wiseacres of the cinema art claim that no liquids should touch the delicate positive prints of the negative films, but that the color effects for moonlight, sunrise and other hues should be applied from special, highpowered color-lighting machines in the projection rooms of theaters.

The tests were therefore made to learn whether colors could successfully be applied to theater screens during the regular projection of dramas and comedies. Clune's Broadway Theater was chosen for the tests because it is one of the best equipped cinema showhouses in the world, with a most commodius projection room, in which are installed many large and costly machines of great lighting power.

All possible aid in the making of the tests was given by William H. Clune, president of the Clune Theaters Company, his manager, Theodore M. Newman, and J. W. Anderson, manager of the Broadway. The two operators of the lighting machines, Morton Sands and Clarence Christensen, were kept busy during the experiments in projecting the films and in working the great arc lights, two of which machines are of forty-five amperage power each.

The first test made involved the projection on the big screen of an ordinary "still" photograph of the Golden Gate at the entrance of San Francisco Bay. The photograph had been taken from a point near where the exposition buildings are located and showed a bank of clouds low down on the ocean horizon outside the Gate. While this photograph was on the screen a high-powered spot light was brought into action to cast a reddish disk in the clouds, to simulate a sunset, while at the same time another lighting machine cast a roseate glow over the ocean, clouds and hills, a wondrously beautiful effect being obtained. Added beauty was given the scene by slowly moving the spot light up and down in the fleecy clouds, this work giving action to the setting sun and making it appear to be moving gloriously in the rose-colored, shifting clouds. By the use of pale blue light the scene was given a pretty moonlight aspect, the spot light "moon" meanwhile wearing a bright silver hue. This test showed that an artful moving picture maker could subtly introduce a rising "moon" into a scene taken to depict an exterior view at night.

One of the most important developments of the experiments was the discovery that the casting of a pale pink color on somewhat obscurely-lighted films covered up the defects and made the actors and actresses appear more natural, the reddish hue lightening the countenances of the players and otherwise removing the shadows on their faces, the chalky color of their "makeup" and the somberness of the scene throughout. Pale amber color also brightened the naturalness of some of the moving picture scenes showing interiors of buildings, the screen views wearing a hue akin to that cast by a lamp or an electric light. Light green hue was cast on forest views and afforded a more natural aspect of the foliage than the color ordinarily shown in the films.

Another interesting discovery was that an effect of fog on an ocean or bay could easily be gotten by the application of bluish, clouded glass in front of the moving picture machine, the colored shaft of light making moving vessels appear to be shrouded in a ghostly haze of surprising naturalness to actual conditions of mist. This method would, of course, allow a moving picture producer to make animated views of vessels in a harbor in sunshine and then obtain all the "fog" he desired by the use of misted glass in a theater projection room.

The tests were originated by F. M. Wiltermood, a photoplay writer and zealous student of cinema art. He claims to have recently submitted his theory of color lightings to David W. Griffith, the famous producer, and received much encouragement. Wiltermood then enlisted the aid of Mr. Clune to make a series of tests and the theater owner cheerfully consented to the use of his Broadway play-house during an entire forenoon, placing two machine operatives at work and allowing free use of all the theater equipment.

"It is my contention," said Wiltermood, following the experiments, "that the regulation method of dipping moving picture films in tinted liquids, to obtain moonlight and other hues, is greatly harmful to the high lights in the scenes, destroys much of the beauty of the faces of the women players, shrinks the sensitive films, produces static, the bane of all cinematographers, and otherwise damages the delicate images in the films. As a result of the tests I am positive that the projection rooms of theaters several years in the future will be supplied with scores of wonderful color machines, which devices doubtless will flood the auditorium and screens of theatres with all desired hues, and thus make the harmful tinting of films unnecessary.

"One of the largest film-making companies re- rently found that the ice-cold temperature of the liquids in the tinting rooms created a large amount of static, or streakly light in the films immersed in the staining tanks, and this company now heats the tinting fluids before putting in the films. This action, in a way, upholds my contention, that the wetting of the prints of films is harmful and that the better way would be to color the theater lights."

Brinsley Shaw, the Universal star, directed and played the leading role in "The Law of Love," a Victor drama.

House of Pathe Discribed

The house of Pathe Freres has issued an eighty-four page booklet, printed on paper of the highest quality and illustrated with halftones and engravings of a de luxe nature, in which every branch of the concern is fully described and pictured, together with a number of interior views of the various Pathe studios, plants and agencies scattered throughout the world.

The average reader will be amazed to discover how wide are the activities of this internationally famous film concern and receive a totally new conception of the enormous wealth and resources at the command of the Pathe brothers.

In the section devoted to the Parisian plants of the concern, thousands of employees are shown assembled in the yard of the main plant; while numerous halftones show in detail the developing and printing rooms; the studios; the tinting, toning and assembling departments; the refrigeration plant; the engine rooms; the executive offices; the shipping departments and rooms devoted exclusively to the taking of the famous Pathe scientific and educational films.

To still further illustrate the extent of the Pathe concern's business, views are given of the offices and distribution plants in Berlin, Budapest, London, Moscow, Stockholm, Milan, Barcelona and the American plant at Jersey City, N. J.

letter of congratulation from Governor Whitman of New York State to Governor Hiram Johnson of California.

Grace Darling sailed from New York City on the Steamship Almiranti for Colon, Panama, on January 20 and after passing through the Canal she will board the steamship Great Northern bound for the "Golden Gate."

She is accompanied by a Hearst-Selig camera man, who will photograph various scenes and incidents of interest for reproduction in motion pictures throughout the United States. She will stop off at various places of interest during her voyage and interview public personages who may be available.

Finds Pony Contest Profitable

Motography presents to its readers herewith an illustration of the front of the Royal Theater, Bellevue, Ohio, which picture show has been in operation for the past seven or eight years. At the left is seen Manager North G. Osborn, while in the middle is the handsome Shetland pony, called "Royal," recently given away by the house management and on the pony's back is Master Harold Kistler, who won the pony in the contest. The picture was taken Christmas morning following the presentation of the pony to the successful candidate, and the thermometer was hovering around the zero mark. Mr. Osborn has been proprietor of the Royal since July, 1914, and plays the best features on the General Film Company service, together with occasional outside feature films. Mrs. Osborn assists her husband in the management of the theater and the two have made the Royal one of the most successful houses in the state of Ohio. The theater seats 240, lighted by semi-indirect system, projects with a Motiograph machine, at a distance of 85 feet, on a white stain screen 12x15 feet in size. The pony contest which was one of the most successful business getters ever staged by Manager Osborn was arranged by the Pony Contest Company of Fremont, Ohio, of which "Uncle Bill" Schooler is manager.

Bright House Organ

Motography is in receipt of a bright and newsy little periodical called Facts, which is published weekly at Lawrence, Kansas by Clair M. Patee, of the Patee theater. It is printed on good stock, carries some splendid editorials and news matter relating to coming productions which will be seen at the Patee theater, and has two whole pages devoted to the story of "The Master Key," a serial which the Patee theater is featuring at the present time. The organ looks like a live wire from cover to cover and will undoubtedly result in additional business for the exhibitor whose house it represents.

Assaying Feature Films

By ALBERT C. SPROUL

THROUGH the instrumentality of the manager of an exchange, for which Tabor had previously worked as a solicitor, he was placed in charge of a theater in an exclusive part of the city. Success depended entirely upon his initiative and ability to educate those to whom he was forced to turn for patronage.

They, accustomed to pay one or two dollars for an evening's entertainment, sniffed at the low fee of ten cents which he charged at first. An ordinary program, moreover, was not sufficiently startling to unsettle their patrician convictions.

These two facts caused him to modify his initial policy. He raised his regular fee to twenty-five cents and turned to feature films as the logical solution.

The first essential, according to Tabor's lights, was to weigh the appeal of a feature film and decide whether or not his clientele would enthuse over it. He clung tenaciously to the accepted definition of the word "feature" as legitimately coupled with the motion-picture industry—a photoplay so superior in merit as to warrant special exploitation.

The method of ascertaining the value of such a photoplay, which he finally hit upon, was complex. The initial step was to class the magazine in which the advertisement appeared. Was it reputable? Did it print extravagant copy? Did it try to barter the interests of the exhibitor for the sake of a few dollars?

The next step was to pick the advertisement to pieces. What was the subject of the feature? For instance, take the war film that Tabor selected. It portrayed a battle of a century past. That made it frankly play-acting and not a patched-up fake parading under the guise of the real thing.

The subject was one of tremendous historical interest, such as would appeal to his clientele. It fitted in aptly with modern tendencies, for war clouds were hovering darkly over the nation. Such a photoplay, he felt sure, would readily receive the sanction of the cultured and discriminating patrons of his theater.

The choice of the next feature which I have selected from among those which Tabor projected, was made after a still different line of approach. The six-reel photoplay visualizing the utter destruction of an Italian city, using as the foundation for its scenario an English classic, went through the same severe scrutiny as did its predecessor.

The subject was again one of absorbing interest of a past still more remote. A careful examination of the book, coupled with a painstaking perusal of the review, convinced him that the feature was available. In contradistinction to the first film, this struggle was one against the awful forces of nature.

The lyrical element, woven through the sombre parts of the photoplay, was like a vein of pure gold laid bare by a miner's pick. The appeal of the blind flower girl was undeniable. Any adequate presentation would grip the heartstrings of an audience.

With historical films, such as those just mentioned, one is on fairly safe ground, provided the reviews in the legitimate trade journals are favorable. The significance of such happenings in the light of history will do much to arouse the public. The patrons at once become receptive and are eager to view in miniature form a mimic representation of the events.

The third feature again appealed to that unconscious yet insatiable desire for knowledge, taken in sugared doses. A "series of motion pictures, showing the birth, growth and daily life of foreign and domestic fauna, feathered, furred and scaled inhabitants of the land, the water and the air, photographed in their native haunts and natural surroundings," quoting verbatim, caused considerable favorable comment.

The value of educationals and scenics is a much mooted question. When painstaking skill is combined with an honest desire to serve and benefit the public, the result is bound to appeal and the interest thus awakened will redound in the favor of the producers. Many a person who would reluctantly read a printed page of natural history, assimilated with unfeigned pleasure the mysteries of the lower animal life. When they left the theater, they felt that they had added definitely to their store of information and naturally glowed with satisfaction and appreciation. A worth-while educational, properly projected, is a sure-fire drawing card.

The problem that arose with the selection of the next feature concerned the filming of legitimate dramas. Do photoplays, based on the dramatic successes of yesterday, pay?

Tabor reasons in this wise: There is enough dissimilarity in the photoplay to prevent an actual duplication. The four acts of the drama are expanded into possibly a hundred and twenty scenes in the feature film. That suggests an infinite variety of interiors and exteriors which adds a decidedly new element to the photoplay. New twists are often necessary to pantomime the idea adequately, all of which connote originality. A desire on the part of those who have witnessed the stage version to contrast the different methods, their enthusiasm in recommending the play to their friends, and the bargain instinct of others to witness a widely advertised success for a minimum fee are contributing factors to the promotion of such a photoplay.

Feature Number Five was selected because of a Shakespearian society that held forth in the neighborhood. High-brows of their ilk, ardent devotees of all that appertains to the immortal bard, feel in duty bound to support anything that appreciates the master.

But there is a pitfall in running a Shakespearian classic in film form. Should it so happen that the feature does not approximate the worth of the play—and as much of the value of Shakespeare's works lies in the beauty of the diction, pantomimic expression becomes dangerous—woe be unto the unfortunate exhibitor. He had better take a vacation and leave a substitute to placate the offended patrons.

Considerable caution should be exercised in choosing biblical features. Tabor saw to it that the one he selected offended neither creed nor good taste and had sufficient merit from all standpoints to warrant its existence. Reverential subjects require a delicate treatment. Careless slips in the production of such films are inexcusable.

The seventh feature on my list is a dramatized version of an American novel. Tabor chose this with an "encourage-the-home-productions" attitude, a silent recommendation to probe one's own literature for worthwhile stuff. It was standard material, conned by students in preparatory grades and pushed by the educational systems. All this gave the photoplay the publicity that novelized versions give the legitimate dramas. Tabor was reaching out after all the free advertising he could possibly get.

I can dismiss the last two films with a few words. Tabor chose the first because it fitted in well with a local event and gave him a chance to try a costuming scheme that he had shelved for some time. The latter film was built on a Russian novel for which Tabor had always had a decided predilection. It promised, moreover, abundant action of the right kind.

Lasky's "The Goose Girl"

A pleasure-giving film is "The Goose-Girl," a Lasky production featured this week at the Strand. Marguerite Clark, loaned for this production by the Famous Players Film Co., gives an added charm to the dainty, likeable character of Gretchen, who tends geese unmindful of her royal birth and the throne that waits her. Pretty, restful scenes are unfolded to "Goose-Girl" spectators Those who make the story live on the screen are: Gretchen, the Goose Girl, Marguerite Clark; King Frederick, Monroe Salisbury; Prince Regent of Jugendheit, Sidney Dean; Grand Duke of Ehrenstein, E. N. Dunbar; Count von Herbeck, James Neill; Von Wallenstein, L. Payton; Carmichael, P. E. Peters; Torpete, H. B. C. Carpenter; Hans, Ernest Joy; Gottfried, J. M. Cassidy; Princess Hildegarde, Miss Johnson; Irma, Jane Darwell.

The story of this film appears in the synopsis department of this issue. M. C.

New Brass and Metal Sign Catalog

The Newman Manufacturing Company, 717 Sycamore Street, Cincinnati, Ohio, 108 West Lake Street, Chicago, Ill., and 101 Fourth Avenue, New York City, has just issued a large and complete catalog showing a great variety of the very latest brass poster frames, easels, and railings, interchangeable metal letter signs, brass and bronze tablets, and mechanical window attractions. In it are some of the very latest and most novel display signs, and it will pay every interested party to immediately get into communication with this concern and obtain its catalog, which is free for the asking.

This firm was established in 1882, has been more than 32 years in the production of brass and metal goods and display fixtures, and is in a position to manufacture almost anything in the way of metal signs, metal stands, racks, railings, grilles and fixtures.

Book Review

Unit Photography, by F. M. Steadman, is a book for all who are interested in the theory or practice of photography. It handles the subject along entirely new lines, representing the desire of its author to establish a rational scientific foundation for the study of light as it affects photographic practice. That such a foundation is now lacking is obvious. Mr. Steadman has developed a new science, based on the two physical units of actinometry and sensitometry. This new science he calls unit photography. He shows that the time of photographic exposure (for there can be but one correct timing in any one case) is a simple function of the three quantities of the active property of the light emitted by the photographed surface, the relative aperture of the lens, and the sensitiveness of the emulsion.

In spite of its technical sound, the book is entertainingly written and the scientific points made perfectly clear and understandable. There is no question that a careful study of it will make better photographers.

The book is beautifully illustrated, bound in brown cloth with gold letters, 160 pages, and sells for $2.00. D. Van Nostrand Company, New York, publisher.

Germans Destroyed This Theater

Everyone vividly recalls the recent bombardment of the eastern English coast by the German battleship fleet and also the fact that among the towns wrecked by the huge shells hurled from the warships was the city of Scarborough. aters in Scarborough, which was struck by four of the German shells and so badly damaged that it had to be temporarily closed. It is understood that the manager arranged with another house to take care of his patrons and staged his regular show in new quarters the night following the bombardment. He immediately began the reconstruction of the theater and expects within a week or two to again be entertaining his regular patrons in the rebuilt theater.

Film Exchange Moves

The attention of the exhibitors in Utah and vicinity is called to the fact that the Notable Film Company of 201-205 Boston Building, Salt Lake City, is moving on February 1 to 133 Second South street of the same city, where it will occupy new and beautiful offices.

House of Pathe Honored

The house of Pathè has been appointed official cinematographers to the Czar of Russia. Such a privilege means a good deal in Russia, since the throne is hedged around with so many restrictions.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

Brevities of the Business

Claire McDowell, a Biograph star for four years, has joined the ranks of the Universal Company, where she will be leading woman for King Baggot.

Elberton C. Taylor has been promoted from assistant stage manager to stage manager of the Edison studio, to succeed Mr. Sauer. Mr. Taylor has been with Edison but a year.

Billy Sunday, the dynamic evangelist, has been unconsciously giving lessons to George Soule Spencer, who with Miss Gladys Hanson, is to be featured in Lubin's photodrama from Henry Arthur Jones' "The Evangelist." The actor has been sitting in one of the front seats of the big tabernacle in Philadelphia during the last week and watching closely every method used by the famous preacher in swaying his audiences.

Jack Eaton, formerly advertising and publicity man for the Colonial Motion Picture Corporation, is now to be found in the offices of the Paramount Pictures Corporation busying himself with the affairs of Paramount Progress and the new scenic project which is being launched by this concern.

Adam Kessel and Charles O. Baumann, president and secretary of the New York Motion Picture Company, are in Los Angeles for a three weeks' visit with Mack Sennett and Thomas H. Ince.

Al Ray has been engaged to play a part in the coming six-reel dramatic feature to be put on by Walter McNamara, the man who produced "Ireland, A Nation."

Little Mildred Harris, formerly of the Broncho brand, has come to the Griffith-Mutual studios at Los Angeles, Calif., to work under the direction of D. W. Griffith.

Bliss Milford, leading woman with the Kinetophote Company, was unable to attend the exhibitors' ball at Trenton, N. J., where she was to have led the grand march with Edwin August, on account of the death of her father.

Two hundred exhibitors gathered in Loew's American theater in New York last Tuesday to witness a showing of Episodes 10, 11 and 12 of "Zudora in the $20,000,000 Mystery," Thanhouser's big serial.

The next photoplay upon which King Baggott of Universal, will commence work is a three-reel production of "The Corsican Brothers," taken from the famous novel and play by Alexander Dumas. On the stage it was never possible to combine the two characters of the Corsican brothers into one part, but by means of double exposure this part becomes a splendid one for any screen actor who is properly qualified to handle it. The company will go to the Adirondack Mountains to take the snow scenes.

During the week of January 18 to 24 the Cumberland theater of Brooklyn, N. Y., and the Crescent theater of the Bronx, New York City, both ran "Vitagraph Weeks," showing a straight Vitagraph program, including the Broadway Star Features.

The first "Cabiria" star to appear in the Itala Film Company's series of new features is Lydia Quaranta who played the titular role in the D'Annunzio production. Her latest appearance is in a four-act romantic drama, "The Treasure of the Louzats."

The new five-reel film feature adapted from Harold MacGrath's novel, "The Carpet from Bagdad," was sent from the Selig Polyscope Company in Chicago, to Indianapolis recently, where it was presented for private view to the officers and friends of the Bobbs-Merrill Publishing Company, who printed the original work.

Reginald Wright Kauffman, whose novel, "The House of Bondage," has just reached its tenth edition, has been placed under a long-term contract by the Humanology Film Producing Company to write plays for screen depiction.

Essanay is making elaborate preparations for the production of "The Lady of the Snows," dramatized from the novel of Edith Ogden Harrison, wife of Carter H. Harrison, mayor of Chicago. This is the first of Mrs. Harrison's novels to be dramatized for a photoplay, but others will be put into film form later.

Inceville, Calif., had the honor last week of playing host to William E. Wing, the photoplay author whose versatile pen is employed for the entertainment of the millions. Mr. Wing motored to the mammoth plant in his automobile.

George L. Sargent has been engaged by the Draco Film Company, Inc., as their chief director. The output of the Draco Company will be released through the Mutual program. Mr. Sargent has already organized a company and has started work.

Carrying out the plans for a program with two features on their weekly program, one two-reel and one three-reel, the Edison Company has enlarged the studio floor so as to include another stage larger than the average.

Workmen have just completed remodeling the exhibition room of the Chicago office of the Mutual Film Corporation, fourth floor, Mallers building. The walls and ceiling are neatly finished and no posters appear in the room. A new screen has also been installed.

Catherine Carr, chief scenario editor of the Kinetophote, left for Bermuda last Saturday for a stay of two or three weeks to recuperate from the stress of work which has been her lot during the past few months.

The Static Club held their second annual ball at the Rutherford hall, Los Angeles, Calif., January 20, and it was a delightful affair in every way. Margarita Fischer of American journeyed from Santa Barbara for the event and led the grand march with big Bob Leonard of Universal.

Charles S. Egan, General Manager of the Egan Film Company with offices at 703 Columbia Theater Building, New York, is recovering from a very serious operation. Mr. Egan was taken suddenly ill at his home and hurried to the Englewood Hospital where an operation was imperative to save his life. We are thankful to inform his friends that Mr. Egan is progressing nicely. Mr. Egan is a brother to Agnes Egan Cobb, manager of the Leading Players Film Corporation, and Features Ideal, Inc.

Mrs. Eugenie Engleton has been added to the Fort Lee, N. J., studio staff of the World Film Corporation as librarian of the reference department.

Regular dividends were declared by Mutual Film Corporation, which provides for 1 per cent a month for the next three months on the common and the preferred to July 1.

Syndicate Film Corporation.—The decline in quotations in this stock was due merely to the declaration of an extra 25 per cent January dividend on both the preferred and the common.

Biograph Film Company.—Shares in this company are now entering the group of "securities actively traded in," and the above quotation includes 50 per cent scrip.

There has been a persistent effort from three different and distinct channels to secure Thanhouser Film stock at its new level and several sales took place last week at between 63 and 68.

Majestic Film Company.—A recent sale has been reported above 170; transactions in this stock, however, in the course of a year are so decidedly infrequent that to quote a trading market is somewhat difficult.

American Film Manufacturing Company.—From their present ambitious program, they will become, in the next two or three months, one of the largest producers of film per week in the United States. It is practically impossible to secure stock, and we are assured higher than 125 will be paid, although this is the bid at present.

Bill Barry, who is the man to thank for your receipt of that new Nicholas Power catalog through the mail this week, has taken to the manly sport of ice hockey, and turned his broad back upon the frivols of the fox trot, the Pavlowa glide and the Castle polka.

Chester Beecroft, newly appointed general manager of the David Horsley interests, is brought forcibly, and pleasantly, to mind, on receipt of an invitation to attend the private viewing of "The Great Frank C. Bostock Arena and Jungle, Main and Washington streets, Los Angeles." David Horsley is the owner of this famed collection of trained animals, which are in the care of Harry E. Tudor, general manager of this arena and jungle exhibit, which will be one of the coast-city's attractions throughout the entire Panama exposition season. Mr. Beecroft went out to the coast more than a week ago to get out the publicity attendant upon the opening of the Jungle attraction.

The wonders of South America as seen by Captain J. Campbell Besley's camera were initially shown, under the direction of Robert W. Priest, at the Maxine Elliott theater on Monday, January 25. The subject is a most interesting and enlightening one for an evening's entertainment, depicting a twelve months' sojourn in the Andes; a wild ride on a raft down the tributaries of the famous Amazon, from the source to the sea; adventurous trips into the very heart of the jungle, revealing it in all of its wildness and beauty; the dead cities of the Incas; the wonderland of Peru; and Macchu Pijchu, an impregnable city built like an eagle's erie, three thousand feet above the surrounding river.

Harry Pollard of the American Company at Santa Barbara, Calif., is making preparations for the production of Harold McGrath's "The Lure of the Mask" which will follow his present four-reel feature. Margarita Fischer is making frequent trips to San Francisco and Los Angeles to visit the big costuming houses and select her gowns for the production.

Miss Beverly Bayne, the pretty Essanay actress, gave a sleighing and skating outing to a party of her Chicago friends last week.

Anna Little is dividing her interest between her new automobile and her parts in the "Black Box" series being produced at the Universal west coast studios.

The Chicago public library has paid a compliment to "The Adventures of Kathlyn," novelized by Harold McGrath, by ordering a special edition to be placed on the library shelves.

Henry Otto of the American, who was a Nestor and Selig actor before he took to directing took the part of a theatrical agent in his own production "Restitution."

George J. Boihoff, a special representative for the World Film Corporation, is engaged in doing some work for the Philadelphia branch, in association with Manager Etris.

Despite the fact that he looks unusually well fed for an actor, Harry Eytinge has not been cast for the part of a cook. But in that role he played to a select but small audience a few nights ago when he played host in his apartment to all the ladies in the Edison scenario and office departments. They say the food didn't taste bad either.

Charles Hirliman, superintendent and laboratory manager of the Life Photo Film Corporation, and the Commercial Motion Pictures Co., Inc., has devoted every spare moment of his time to experimental work in the art of tinting and toning of motion picture films. His contract of employment with the Commercial Motion Picture Company, Inc., has been renewed for two years at a large and substantial increase in Mr. Hirliman's salary and he has been placed on the board of executive managers of that company in an advisory capacity.

Randall Parrish, the author of "When Wilderness Was King," "Bob Hampton, of Placer," and "My Lady of the North," has notified his publishers that hereafter he will write but one novel a year. The remainder of the time will be devoted by Mr. Parrish to writing scenarios for the Selig Polyscope Company of Chicago.

Harry Scott, long and favorably known to film men in all parts of the country, has been made manager of the George Kleine office at Dallas, Texas. Mr. Scott has had a wide experience with the Kleine attractions, having been one of the original "Quo Vadis" company managers and later opened the Kleine office in Columbus, O.

Gail Kane, who appeared in the World Photoplay "The Pit," has never seen the film in which she appears. To make it possible for her to see herself, Special Representative Boihoff of the World has arranged to have her present at the Locust theater, Philadelphia, where "The Pit" is to be shown.

Denis Ward, who so often plays the part of captain of police in Edison plays, has only to "look natural" to look the part. For he was for the most of his life one of the best known police captains of the New York force before he was retired.

S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Company, after spending the holidays in Chicago and New York, has returned to California, where he will make the selection of an additional company for the production of multiple reel releases. One company has already been at work on special features for a period of three months under direction of Harry Pollard.

Every morning J. P. McGowan the injured Kalem director leaves the Sisters' hospital, Los Angeles, Calif., in an auto and returns when the work for the day is done. He is getting along capitally, but it will be some time before he can walk. Helen Holmes is glad to have him back on the field, even if he is in the automobile, for his brain is very active.

Andy Clarke, the clever Edison boy, appears for the first time as a "grown-up" little man in "A Weighty Matter for a Detective" and makes a grotesque little figure.

The waiters' quartette, who made New York howl with laughter when Lew Fields introduced them in "The Girl Behind the Counter," are to be seen again. This time they are to make their debut in motion pictures in the forthcoming World Film release "Old Dutch," in which Mr. Fields is being starred.

Al. E. Christie of the Nestor comedy company is undertaking the task of licking an entirely new aggregation in shape for his second comedy company. With Billie Rhodes, Johnny Dillon and Neill Burns as a nucleus, he is rapidly succeeding.

Frank E. Montgomery has been appointed managing director of the Liberty Film Company of San Mateo, Calif. He is now engaged upon his first picture, a western with Mona Darkfeather in the lead. The Liberty roster includes Emery Johnson, Marguerite Clayton, True Boardman, Virginia Ames, Clark Stockdale and Vera Hewitt. Feature films will be made, releasing on the Kriterion program.

Irving Cummings is an enthusiastic motorist, and has covered most of the surrounding country since his recent arrival in Santa Barbara, Calif., to work for the American Company. Mr. Cummings is making his home with Henry Otto, and Mr. Otto's mother is happy in looking after her two boys.

A comedy team happens once in a long time and it happened in the Edison studio almost by accident. Wadsworth and Houseman were making big hits individually in Edison comedies when they appeared in a few comedies together. Almost instantly came a big demand from the exhibitors for "Wadsworth and Houseman" comedies. In truth, the exhibitors themselves made these two a comedy team.

Ernest Van Pelt, with the Essanay company at Niles, Calif., recently spent a few days in the Rockies hunting for bear. He is said to have bagged a big grizzly after a hard battle.

Several shifts in directors have been made by Manager Julius Stern at the eastern Universal studios. William Garwood, who played leads in Lucius Henderson's Imp company, will hereafter direct his own company. Robert Hill will be his assistant, and Violet Mersereau will continue as his leading woman. Mr. Henderson will direct Mary Fuller.

To aspire to a professorship, to earn distinction as an opera singer and then find the real vocation of his life in the pictures, has been the fate of Tom Richards, the creator of "The Chocolate Soldier" in song and film story, the latter being now released through the Alliance Program.

Lionel Belmore, the Vitagraph director, accompanied by Ned Finley, Harry Northrup, Darwin Karr, Eleanor Woodruff, Eulalie Jensen and Marion Henry, is going to Fort Clark, Texas, to film several features.

Edna Maison of Universal is no longer connected with the "Powers" brand, for her pictures will now go out to exhibitors under the "Big U" banner.

Under the personal supervision of President S. S. Hutchinson, the American Film Manufacturing Company will produce the serial story for which the Chicago Tribune has awarded the $10,000 prize.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

General Program

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 7—Selig—January 25.—This issue of the weekly shows in detail the operation of the apparatus at the various weather bureaus scattered throughout the United States; Mrs. Harry Johansen of St. Louis, who recently won the championship for woman auto racing drivers of America; in the war section are shown numerous scenes taken in the trenches of the allies in Belgium and France.

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 8—Selig—January 27.—This issue of the weekly shows views of a new U. S. submarine taken in the navy yard at Quincy, Mass.; Miss Grace Darling, Selig-Hearst reporter, interviewing Edna May, actress; a close-up view of Marty O'Toole, the $22,500 pitcher of the Pittsburgh Nationals, working in the domestic league; also close-up views of the leaders of organized baseball, snapped at the recent baseball trial at the Federal building, Chicago, Ill.; and in the war section views of the palace at Versailles, France which has been made into a Red Cross hospital by the British troops.

Fate's Protecting Arm—Biograph—February 1.—Dick Foster and his companion, Ann Markham, enter a house to rob. They overpower an elderly man and when his wife telephones for the police, they bind and gag her, pose as the rightful occupants of the house, and when the police call explain that the burglar scare was a false alarm, and after the officers have gone, rob the premises and depart. Later Ann learns that her victims were a minister and his wife, and thereupon tells Dick that she is done with crime forever. She secures a post as governess to Robert Hall's daughter, and when Dick endeavors to locate her, she tries to throw him off the track by giving him a false address. Later he discovers her hiding place and visits the house at night. She chances upon him, as he is examining the safe, knocks him down with a heavy vase and secures his revolver. When he rushes at her she fires, and kills him, and later Mr. Hall, who has learned to love her, praises her for her bravery and offers her his heart and hand.

Found—A Flesh Reducer—Edison—February 1.—Arthur Houseman with his Chaplin-like make-up and demeanor and William Wadsworth as the man-who-would-be-thin, are a humorous pair in this film. Mabel Dwight as Roberts' wife, Frank A. Lyon as the doctor, Marjorie Ellison and Cora Williams complete a cast that add to the humor of the various scenes. Roberts is advised that an abnormal amount of exercise will reduce his weight. He purchases a load of flesh reducers in the form of fencing swords, boxing gloves, a punching dummy, etc. The dummy is the target for all of the well directed blows of the two but she (Roberts and his trainer have dressed it up in one of Mrs. Roberts' best dresses) always manages to regain her feet before the count of ten. The maid discovers it under the bed where the men have finally placed it and tells Mrs. Roberts that there is a strange girl in her husband's room. The dummy, dressed in feminine garb, is abducted and sold to a junk dealer. Mrs. Roberts finds out that her new waist containing a valuable diamond sunburst, is missing and the maid is discharged on circumstantial evidence. Roberts, after a hurried tour of the junk shops, locates the dummy, the waist and the sunburst. The maid is vindicated. After all this exercise, Roberts finds that his weight has dropped many pounds.

The New Teacher—Essanay—February 1.—About fifteen intelligent little children perform in this film, which is one of the "Sweedie" series. Two or three of them hold down individual scenes and at no time do they look at the camera, a fault common to juveniles. This, without a doubt, will create favorable comment among audiences of all classes. The plot is very simple. Sweedie is appointed teacher of a school and one of the members of the board becomes infatuated with her. Their love affair runs parallel with that of two of the boy pupils and one of the girls. In the end the member of the board is found in Sweedie's company by his associates and she is dismissed. The children, however, strike until Sweedie has been reappointed. The offering is a pleasing one.

The Swindler—Kalem—(Two Reels) February 1.—Totally ignorant of the man's business and blinded solely by his wealth, Bess marries Harris, thereby breaking the heart of Tom, who loves her. Harris and his wife go to the city and Tom later reaches there also and learns that Harris is conducting a get-rich-quick scheme which robs widows and orphans. Tom learns of a particular instance of a Mrs. Boyden, who has been swindled, and with her goes to Harris' office where he tells him exactly what he thinks of him. The conversation is overheard by Bess, who realizes her husband is a scoundrel, and as a result leaves him. Later Harris' office is stormed by victims of his scheme, and one of them, infuriated, kills him. Bess returns to the old farm and, later, there meets Tom, who she promises to wed. Alice Joyce featured.

Patsy on the Trolley Car (episode six of the "Patsy Bolivar" series)—Lubin—February 1.—Patsy arrives at the village of Springtown and an adventure with a lunch wagon man lands him in jail. He is released and secures a position as street car conductor with the trolley company of which Jack Prince is now the assistant superintendent. Patsy is amazed one day to have Tilly appear in Springtown to visit Mary, and his attentions to her almost cost him his position. Jack writes Patsy's parents of his whereabouts and meanwhile Mary receives a telegram calling her to a seminary in another city, where she has applied for a position. Patsy, thrown off his street car by a rough crowd whom Sykesy urges on, sees Mary on the way to the depot and, learning that his parents are following him, he gets aboard the train and departs with her, while Sykesy spreads the rumor that Mary has eloped with Patsy Bolivar.

The Vision of the Shepherd—Selig—(Two Reels)—February 1.—The picture is notable for its wonderful exteriors. Jacob, the shepherd, loses his only daughter, Nell, when Arthur Harding, a city man, induces her to elope with him. In the city, Harding plans to have Giles, his actor friend, perform a mock marriage ceremony, but at the last moment the actor warns the girl of her peril, and sends her away. Her father arrives in the city, finds her in the Salvation Army mission and takes her home. When a vision of the Christ appears to him, he is able to answer the query, "Are all of the sheep in the fold?" in the affirmative. Kathlyn Williams, Wheeler Oakman and Frank Clark featured. See review on page 165 of the issue of January 30.
N. G. C.

Cabman Kate—Vitagraph—February 1.—As a laundress Kate isn't much of a success, and when she finds herself unable to collect $13.13 that Tim McGrath owes her, she forcibly seizes his horse and cab. Samuel Rosenstein, a drummer, is anxious to catch a train, and when his taxicab breaks down he hires Kate to take him to the train. They experience a wild and thrilling ride in which numerous accidents happen, and as a result the whole party is pinched. The judge proves a good fellow and nearly laughs himself sick over an account of what has happened. He forces Samuel to pay all the damages and costs, makes Tim pay Kate what he owes her and later marries Tim and Kate, who are finally reconciled. Kate Price featured.

Three Hats—Biograph—(Two Reels)—Feruary 2.—Fred Bellamy, visits his friend, Sam Selwyn, and there meets Selwyn's wife and daughter Grace. Sam, when his wife and daughter depart for a few days, seeks the bright lights, while Fred goes to call on his sweetheart Lottie Blithers, whose father, Bosco Blithers, also has a fondness for the bright lights. Captain Katskill, who loves Grace, calls to see her father, and learning that he is out goes to the cabaret. Sam, Bosco and Captain Katskill chance to visit the same place and in the gay and hilarious time which results, get their hats all mixed up, which results in innumerable complications, in the midst of which, Mrs. Selwyn and Grace return home. Lottie, who has called to see Fred has been mistaken by Sam for the lady he flirted with the night before, while Bosco, who visits Sam to return his hat, mistakes Captain Katskill for Fred, and gives his consent to the marriage of his daughter, who of course, Katskill does not even know. After many complications, affairs are straightened out, and a double wedding occurs, Grace marrying Katskill and Lottie marrying Fred.

Olive and the Heirloom—EDISON—FEBRUARY 2.—A large part of this picture, which is one of the releases of the "Olive's Opportunities" series, is enacted in the parlor car, coach, and Pullman of a train, and the accuracy and atmosphere of the settings adds considerably to the realism of the action. The only real thrill in the picture is put there through the courtesy and daring of Vance Coleman (Edward Earle). A wire from Olive tells him that she is on her way to him with a valuable necklace and is being followed by Drew Martin. The train does not stop at the station at which Vance is waiting, so he decides to board it by way of the mailing device. Intimacy with government mail regulations would tell one that such a procedure is unlawful, but the film registers its full gasping value nevertheless. Vance is seen hanging from the cross-piece in the mail bag, the train sweeps by, and the next instant the mail bag and its occupant slides into the mail clerks' arms inside of the mail car. Vance then makes his way to the Pullman, and saves Olive and the necklace, an heirloom, from Martin.

The Creed of the Clan—ESSANAY—FEBRUARY 2.—Considerable interest is aroused by the element of romance in this picture and the sympathy of the audiences undoubtedly will be with the young man hero who because of a boss who befriended his mother and father at one time, refuses to expose him when the latter has committed murder. Bryant Washburn, Rapley Holmes and Ruth Stonehouse have the leads. A climax is reached when about three-fourths of the film has been run and from that point to the finish the interest peters out more or less, but it is the style of a story which supplies enough interest in the early part to gloss over this weakness. John Bradley is accused of murder but Sandy O'Connel, who loves Bradley's daughter, lies in order to shield him. When the alibi is wiped away, through the confession of an adventuress, Sandy himself takes the blame for the crime, so that the girl may have the love of her father to whom she is devoted, for he believes he is not worthy of her himself. Later he escapes, however, and in another country they learn that Bradley has been exonerated. The sets are richly furnished and the photographic and lighting effects add much to the film.

The Insurance Nightmare—KALEM—FEBRUARY 2.—Fosdick, who has been nearly knocked down by an automobile, informs his club mates that he intends to take out some life insurance. This news reaches the ears of Doyle and Drake, two insurance agents, also Bobby Brass, another insurance man, who is in love with Fosdick's daughter May. Doyle and Drake pursue Fosdick like grim death until he beats them both up, but Bobby is so persistent and succeeds in frightening Fosdick so thoroughly that, after awakening from a horrible nightmare, Fosdick dons his clothes and at midnight goes to the home of Bobby and signs an application for insurance. Charles Inslee and A. Munden featured.

The Belated Honeymoon — LUBIN — FEBRUARY 2.—John Roller, a scientist, at the age of thirty-five is urged by his friend, Professor Munger, to wed Agnes, his ward. Roller up to that time had been interested in study, and consents to the marriage only as a favor to his friend, Professor Munger. He does not love Agnes and makes no attempt to do so after their marriage. One day John's home is visited by Billie, his cousin, and he drags John and Agnes to a dance, where Agnes meets a lot of young people. As a result of the acquaintances thus formed, Agnes buys pretty clothes and attends parties. She meets a Frenchman named Gaston, who falls head over heels in love with her, but Agnes does not seriously encourage him. The man's attentions, however, open John's eyes and, later, when he fears Gaston is really winning Agnes' love, he returns home just as the Frenchman has the door slammed in his face by Agnes, he having become "too fresh." When John attempts to enter, Agnes mistakes him for the Frenchman and barricades the door. John bursts in and Agnes retreats from one room to another barricading the doors of each, though John bursts through one after another. At last the two discover each other in the kitchen and Agnes is amazed to find that she is loved by a real, red-blooded man, while John discovers for the first time that he really is in love. Their honeymoon begins at that moment. Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe featured.

Forked Trails — SELIG—FEBRUARY 2.—Moya Lantry, a belle of cattleland, has captured the hearts of two bold cowboys, Bob Davis and Frank Scott. They arrange a contest to decide which shall marry her and Scott wins out by a trick. Old man Lantry is suspicious of Scott, and tells him to earn a thousand dollars before he can marry Moya. Scott rides away and encounters Manuel Baca, a disreputable Mexican, who plans to hold up the stage. Scott joins him in the venture, which proves successful, but while escaping with his share of the plunder, Moya and Davis discover him. With Scott eliminated from the field through his own crooked acts, Bob and Moya obtain her father's consent to their marriage and ride down the trail of matrimonial bliss in happy contentment.

How Cissy Made Good—(BROADWAY STAR FEATURE) — VITAGRAPH — (THREE REELS)—FEBRUARY 2.—Cissy writes a story which the editor of a motion picture magazine refuses to accept, but he finally tells her to go to the Vitagraph studio and interview the stars there. Cissy does so, and sets out with Flora Finch to interview John Bunny. Bunny frightens Cissy and the latter later mistakes Kate Price for a scrubwoman, finds Julia Swayne Gordon can only speak French, Harry Morey is deaf-mute, and finally breaks into a picture that Lillian Walker and Maurice Costello are taking, just in time to fall into a tank of water. She is rescued and to make up for her grief all the players offer to give her a little autographed interview written by themselves. With these she secures a steady position with the motion picture magazine at a pleasing salary. Cissy Fitzgerald featured.

Seen From a Gallery—EDISON—FEBRUARY 3.—Here we see the stage and home life of three actors as from a gallery, the pictures being photographed from above instead of on the camera level. Blotz loses his salary playing poker, and instructs his pals to "muss him up" so that his story to his wife about being held up will appear feasible. The two actors hire a couple of gangsters to waylay Blotz, and they do their work conscientiously. His wife, however, becomes suspicious about his hold-up story, and straightway cures Blotz and his friends of their habit of playing poker until "broke." On the same reel is:

A Thorn Among Roses—February 3. Crabbed old Doctor Berry insists on his son's marrying his ward, May Hope, who will become an heiress when of age. Sam and May do not love each other, each having a sweetheart, so they fool the near-sighted old man by hiding his spectacles, and obtaining permission, separately to become married. The doctor, of course, thinks that they want to marry each other, and is hot with anger when he learns how he has been tricked. Sam informs him that Ellen Lucre, whom he has married, is worth more than May so the old man blesses the quartette of newly-weds. C. R. C.

The Fable of Elvira and Farina and the Meal Ticket—Essanay—February 3. —Rapley Holmes, as a small town man who is made the "goat" of his wife's and daughter's ambitions to break into society, will draw many laughs during the running of this picture. The sets throughout are pretty, the one representing a hotel being especially worthy of comment. The wife and daughter tire of the small town and persuade "the goat" to send them to Europe. At the end of a year they return filled with giddy notions and refuse to remain in the village, unless they can create a social set. Failing in this, they drag "the goat" to the city, where they attempt to break into the ranks of the elite. They find that there is no place for them, until they have invested a small fortune in a home of their own. Diamonds and theater parties further raise their possibilities and decrease the old man's bank account. Their life's ambition is at last gratified when they are invited to attend a reception given by the leader of the four hundred. Lillian Drew and Gloria Mae appear in the supporting roles. C.J.C.

The Apartment House Mystery—(Another Episode of the Girl Detective Series) — Kalem — (Two Reels)—February 3.—Appointed special investigator as a result of her work on another case, Ruth finds herself called on to solve the mystery concerning the death of a man found on the roof of the Heywood apartment. By a button attached to a piece of cloth clutched in the dead man's hand, Ruth learns that he is Rodger Hastings. Clever work by Ruth results in the discovery that Warren, who lives in the Heywood apartments, is conducting a gambling joint, and when his apartment is raided, Ruth finds a coat minus a piece of cloth and a button, which proves that the bit of cloth and the button found in Hastings' hand, came from Warren's coat. Warren breaks down and confesses that the man died of a heart attack in his apartment, and that, fearing he would be accused of the murder, he carried the body to the roof. Ruth Roland featured.

A Night's Adventure—(Two Reels)—Lubin—February 3.—George Heath, the son of a minister, has gone wrong and is discovered in the underworld of a great city. He receives a $2 bill from his parents together with a letter and, this arriving at a critical time, he is saved from suicide. With the $2 as the outside of a fake "roll" George visits a gambling game and acquires a real roll. Meanwhile, Grace Walton, the daughter of a minister, is sent to a department store to pay a long overdue bill and there spends part of the money for some fancy slippers. She expresses a wish to go to a dance and Arthur Lusk, her lover, takes her to a dance hall of low repute which her father is about to have raided by the police. When Arthur leaves her for a moment, George aids her in a spectacular escape when the raid occurs. Grace reaches home safely and George uses his newly acquired roll to buy a ticket for his own home. L. C. Shumway and Velma Whitman featured.

Just Like a Woman—Selig—February 3.—When Louis Dutton buys The Record and discovers Phyllis Darel as the assistant editor, he discharges her, since he does not approve of the employment of women. Howard Folsam, proprietor of a local department store, who loves Phyllis calls on the editor and threatens that unless Phyllis is re-instated he will cancel his advertising. Dutton orders Folsam from the room, and for revenge the latter starts a new publication called The Herald with Phyllis as the editor. A tramp printer employed by Dutton, one night accidently sets fire to the Record office, but Phyllis manages to save the property from destruction and later, when Dutton apologizes for discharging her, she agrees to consolidate the Herald with the Record, and later permits him to announce that the Record-Herald is to be issued by Louis and Phyllis Dutton. Bessie Eyton and Franklyn Hall featured. N. G. C.

The Combination — Vitagraph — February 3.—Mr. and Mrs. Carr, newlyweds, rent an apartment largely due to the fact that it has a wall safe in the bedroom. A burglar scare in the neighborhood results in Carr buying a revolver, but after he has departed for work, Mrs. Carr hides the revolver in the wall safe, and puts the combination in a vase on the side-board. Late that night Biggs and Boggs, two burglars, enter and ransack the house. Carr awakens and is told by Mrs. Carr the hiding place of the gun. The burglars carry away everything except the furniture, but later are caught by the police, and everything in returned. Carr then opens the wall safe and discovers his wife had hidden his pipe by mistake instead of his revolver. Sidney Drew and Jane Morrow featured.

The Borrowed Necklace—Biograph—February 4.—Florence Barlow borrows a necklace from her friend, Mrs. Morrison, and is so charmed with it, that she has a duplicate made of it by a jeweler, and by mistake returns the imitation to Mrs. Morrison. Morrison puts the necklace in the safe, and, later, getting some papers before leaving town, neglects to lock the safe, the butler seizing the opportunity to steal the necklace. Florence visits the Morrison home, notes the open safe and calls Morrison's attention to it. After his departure, Mrs. Morrison finds the necklace gone and suspicion is cast on Florence, resulting in her arrect. When the necklace is found in her possession, she is considered guilty and is tried. Later, Mrs. Morrison finds the imitation necklace in the book-case where the butler has hidden it, and is attacked by the butler, who believes himself discovered. Mr. Morrison arrives in time to rescue his wife, and learns the real story. As a result, Florence is freed and the butler is thrown into prison.

Sophie's Home Coming—Essanay—February 4.—Another of the Snakeville comedies, with a number of humorous incidents cleverly woven together. Slim receives a note from Sophie saying that she will be home the following morning and requesting that he meet her. He sets his alarm clock, but Mustang "double-crosses" him by planing another clock in his room and himself goes to meet Sophie. Mustang thus gets the inside track and, when he becomes Sophie's steady, Slim plans his revenge. He places some snuff in Mustang's handkerchief when the latter makes his first call on Sophie and when the so-far-successful suitor is taken with a violent fit of sneezing he is thrown from the house by Sophie's father. The subject is well handled from the comedy point of view and is tinted from start to finish, this giving it a distinctive touch. C.J.C.

The Regenerating Love — Lubin — (Three Reels) — February 4. — Henry Davidson leaves his wife, Julia, and baby daughter, Ethel, after a quarrel and goes West with his baby son, Bob. Years later Bob, unable to stand his father's ill temper, leaves to shift for himself, while Davidson returns East and after a reconciliation with his wife, dies, leaving a request that Bob be found and made the heir of his large estate. Bob has fallen in love with Belle of the vaudeville song and dance team of Belle and Hayden, and Hayden reads in the newspaper of the search for Bob. While Belle entertains Bob, Hayden goes East and represents himself as the missing heir. He is able to establish himself, but his love for Ethel finally leads him to leave a letter for her confessing all and he returns West to tell Bob everything. Bob has married Belle in the meanwhile and on Hayden's return consents to go home on condition that Hayden accompany him. Hayden, of course, agrees on account of his love for Ethel and all four are happy. Ormi Hawley and Earle Metcalfe featured.

In the Palmy Days—MINA—FEBRUARY 4.—O'Donoval McBluff, a tragedian of the old school, is engaged by a barn storming troupe who have found an angel to finance the Dainty Sisters. There being no part for Bennie Smith, the accepted suitor of the leading lady, Bennie masquerades as a woman in order to be near his sweetheart, and poses as another one of the Dainty Sisters. At the first theater they reach, the company finds that it is given over to motion pictures and has to play its engagement in a tent. The audience stands for the comedy, but when McBluff appears, he is bombarded with vegetables. In the confusion a lamp is overturned, and the tent takes fire. After all has been destroyed and the manager beaten by his wife for embracing Bennie, whom he mistakes for a woman, the stranded company yields to the inevitable, and joins a motion picture organization.

The Understudy — VITAGRAPH—FEBRUARY 4.—During rehearsals of "The Masked Mystery," Jack Boyle, an understudy, falls in love with Lolita, the heroine. Lolita loves, and is loved by, Jack Stewart, the hero. Devereaux, the villain, also loves her, though she loathes him. In the third act, the heroine discovers the villain robbing a safe, and in a struggle with him is killed. Later Devereaux tries to kiss Lolita, and Jack interferes, Stewart explaining that Lolita is to marry him. Devereaux goes to his club and becomes drunk. There he determines to make the third act real, that night, by really killing Lolita, but before the play begins, has a fight with Jack in the latter's dressing room and is rendered unconscious. Jack sees his chance to play the leading part and makes up as Devereaux. In the darkness no one knows it is Jack, and Stewart, who has discovered the revolver and knows it is loaded, interferes as the shot is fired, and Jack is mortally wounded. Ere he dies, the whole story comes out and Devereaux is punished while Jack dies in Lolita's arms. Maurice Costello featured.

It Doesn't Pay—BIOGRAPH—FEBRUARY 5.—Tom West is a ne'er-do-well, and one night when the boarder at their house, who is a night watchman at a factory, returns home ill, Tom takes the key from his coat, enters the factory and endeavors to rob it. He is surprised by the bookkepeer and in escaping leaves a piece of his coat behind. Detectives seek the watchman and from him discover Tom's guilt. Tom is arrested, tried, convicted and serves his sentence, though eager to return home to secure the money he stole, from the place in the cellar where he had concealed it. Later he is released and returns to find his mother dead, his sister gone, the house fallen into ruin and the money he had so carefully hidden gnawed away by rats.

The Hicksville Tragedy Troupe — KALEM—FEBRUARY 5.—Vincent, the ribbon counter salesman, is so het up over the approaching amateur theatricals in which he is to play the part of the hero opposite Ethel, the girl he loves, that he neglects his customers and is fired. Angered by the knowledge that Vincent is Ethel's favorite, Spike Hennessy, who also loves her, vows vengeance. Vincent, on the night of the performance, suffers numerous mishaps and winds up by having the curtain dropped on him, when Spike and his friends, who have been waiting for him, bombard him with eggs, tomatoes and custard pies. When Vincent is rescued, he looks so ludicrous that Ethel's love gives way to ridicule, and she goes home with Spike. Victor Rottman and Ethel Teare featured.

The Nameless Fear—LUBIN—FEBRUARY 5.—In a lonely old house lives Dulcene, a girl of twenty, with no other companions than Dr. Ferguson and Meg, an old servant. Ferguson has plotted with Meg to wreck Dulcene's mind, counting on the fact that he will then be made her permanent guardian and will not have to account for her fortune which he has so long controlled. In the house is a certain room the door of which has always been locked. One day Dulcene finds the door ajar and ventures in. At the opposite end of the room are closed heavy black curtains and as she approaches these Ferguson appears and declares that to look beyond them would be sure to ruin her reason. Dulcene shrinks away, but is still possessed with an insane desire to look beyond those curtains. That night, arising from her sleep, she enters the room and after peering behind the curtains falls senseless. Fred Raymond, a young engineer who has met Dulcene, hears her cry and breaks into the house. After overpowering Ferguson he rushes into the room and finds Dulcene who had been frightened by her own suggested fancies, for only an empty alcove was to be seen behind the curtains. Meg confesses the whole plot and Ferguson is discovered to be insane and is led away by the police. Louise Huff featured.

Cats —SELIG—FEBRUARY 5.—Mrs. Jinks loves cats, in fact she adores them. There are cats in the parlor, cats in the dining room, cats in the kitchen and wherever Jinks goes he finds cats. Cats on the piano, cats on the table, cats on the chairs, while the floor is covered with them. The limit is reached when he finds a half-dozen kittens in his new silk hat, and immediately Jinks picks up every cat he can find, packs them into a big trunk and with a wheelbarrow sets out for the river. The noise from the interior of the trunk creates suspicion, and Jinks is about to be arrested, when his wife arrives to explain matters, and the two effect a compromise by which it is agreed that only four cats are to be kept by the Jinks in the future.

The Green Cat—VITAGRAPH—FEBRUARY 5.—Bedelia, an old maid, loses her green cat and hires Boggs of the National Detective Agency to find it, offering a reward of $100. With the aid of a telescope, a waste paper basket and a bunch of catnip, Billy, Boggs' assistant, nabs a green kitten, who has had a bath in a can of green paint. Boggs tells his daughter, Constance, to get a stray cat, which he plans to paint green and claim the reward. Constance tells a small boy, who tells another bunch of youngsters, and soon Boggs' office is filled with squalling, mewing cats. Boggs selects one, paints it green, and sets out for Bedelia's home. There he meets Billy with a green cat which he has captured and the two are about to quarrel, when Constance appears with the real green kitten, she receiving the reward. Lee Beggs and Billy Quirk featured.

Winning the Old Man Over—BIOGRAPH FEBRUARY 6.—The doctor dislikes his daughter's sweetheart and in need of a corpse for experimental purposes, he sends his negro assistant to rob a graveyard. The negro makes known his mission to two friends of the lover and, as a joke, the lover himself agrees to get into the sack and be carried into the doctor's home. He frightens the negro by coming to life when laid out on the doctor's operating table, and when the doctor appears, he is furious over the hoax. The lover's friends, meanwhile, summon two policemen who appear and tell the doctor he will be arrested for grave robbing unless he gives his consent to the marriage. Realizing he is beaten, he consents. On the same reel is:

The Club Pest — BIOGRAPH—FEBRUARY 6.—Mr. Bore annoys his club-mates to such an extent, that they bet him $50 he will not stay in a haunted house alone all night. He enters the house and all sorts of mysterious things happen, caused, of course, by his club-mates. He gets wise to the trick and pretends to be scared to death. Finding him apparently dead, they rush out for the policemen, but on returning find he has disappeared. He succeeds in frightening them, and realizing they are beaten, they pay the bet.

The Stone Heart—Edison—February 6.—A prettily told story, with a human interest touch in the majority of its scenes. The cast comprises Augustus Phillips, Viola Dana, Helen Strickland, William Bice, Denis Ward and Jessie Stevens. Burnstine is known to the little waifs who work for him as "stone heart," on account of his grasping disposition. Nan Cowles is one of the waifs employed in his sweat-shop. Her mother is ill and Nan is late to work on a certain Monday morning. This lateness results in Burnstine's discharging her, and she steals five dollars that lies on his desk, so as to be able to pay for a physician. Burnstine notifies the police and in the company of an officer goes to her home. The doctor arrives with Nan, who, terrified, flees to the fire-escape from where she can watch the proceedings in the squalid room. The stone heart softens, dismisses the officer and takes his place at the bedside. Burnstine nurses the woman through the crisis and arranges that mother and daughter are going to be taken care of. M. C.

Broncho Billy's Greaser Deputy—Essanay—February 6.—This subject works up to the edge of the climax without disclosing its result. Broncho Billy, the sheriff, is in love with a girl who marries his rival. Later the rival holds up a stage coach and Broncho is sent to arrest him. Despite the pleading of the man's wife Broncho is about to lead him off to jail when his love for her overcomes his feeling of duty and he releases the outlaw. As the latter steps from the cabin, however, Broncho's greaser deputy, who is waiting outside, shoots and kills him, thus leaving the path clear for Broncho and the girl, for she realizes that he is the one who really deserves her love. The acting of G. M. Anderson and Marguerite Clayton hold one's interest strongly just previous to the release of the outlaw by the sheriff and their skill in handling this scene undoubtedly keeps the result from becoming obvious. C.J.C.

The Escape on the Fast Freight—(Another Episode of "The Hazards of Helen" Series)—Kalem—February 6.—Bill and Pete, two yeggmen, hold up Helen who is on night duty at Ferndale, as telegraph operator, and escape with a large sum of money, which has been left in her care. This robbery leads to a decision on the part of the railroad company to engage only men in the future, and Helen is discharged. Later, Helen, crossing a bridge which extends across a freight yard, sees Bill and Pete climbing aboard an outgoing freight, and in order to follow them drops from the bridge to the roof of the cars, as the train passes beneath. Helen hastens to the caboose and informs the train crew, who set out to capture Bill and Pete. Pete is captured, but Bill climbs over the roof of the cars pursued by Helen, and at last both roll off the edge of the car just as the freight crosses a river. Helen grimly hangs on and is finally given assistance in landing her prisoner. Her heroism, reported to headquarters, results in her being reinstated. Helen Holmes featured.

The Furnace Man—Lubin—February 6.—John Dayton, a young society man, rescues Marjory Gordon's dog from peril and thus meets the girl. He had just received a furnace man's card before meeting Marjory and unknowingly given her this card in introducing himself. Marjory, later, thinking John a real furnace man, sends for him to repair the furnace in her home. While there John discovers that Marjory's father is in serious business trouble and he deliberately proposes himself as Gordon's business partner and son-in-law, declaring his real identity, but Gordon will not barter his daughter and John is ordered from the house. Later, immaculately dressed, John returns and is invited to dine with Gordon and Marjory and finally it is decided that he may become a partner to both Marjory and her father. Joseph Kaufman and Ethel Clayton featured.

The Leopard's Lair—Selig—February 6.—One of the Selig jungle zoo one-reel pictures in which William Stowell and baby Lillian Wade are featured. The story has to do with the capture of a few months' old baby by a huge leopard, which bears the child away into the jungle. There is a stirring hand to hand fight between the father of the baby and the leopard, and thrills aplenty in other portions of the film. After a furious battle the baby is found uninjured and restored to its parents. N. G. C.

For Another's Crime—(Two Reels)—Vitagraph—February 6.—Steve Harney, deputy sheriff, orders Walker, a gambler out of town. Harney and Jack Brandon both love Sue, a mountain girl, and when she goes off to a dance with Harney, Jack visits Benson's saloon and plays cards with Walker. Harney returns from the dance and quarrels with Jack. Benson hurries to the sheriff's and Walker watches the fight from outside the door. When Harney is about to stab the half-drunken Jack, Walker snatches Jack's knife and kills Harney and flees. The sheriff arrives and finding the knife beside Jack, he is arrested and later sentenced to twenty years imprisonment. Walker helps Jack to escape from prison and both flee to the far west, where Walker opens a saloon with Jack as his partner. Jack meets Amy Green, daughter of the local justice of the peace and becomes engaged to her. Huggins, an old cell-mate of Jack's exposes him to Judge Green, who doubts the story until Jack confesses. When the justice places him under arrest. Walker is about to shoot Huggins, but the latter draws his gun and kills the gambler. Walker, dying, confesses all, and Jack is exonerated. Leo Delaney featured.

Kriterion Program

(The following synopsis covers the Kriterion releases from January 25 to 30).

Curse of the Black Pearl—Alhambra—(Two Reels). — DeLara, father of Maria and Mercedes, murders his friend in order to gain possession of a black pearl. Maria, the youngest daughter, witnessed the crime and the father, realizing this, repents the deed. DeLara, is suspicious of everyone, believing they have designs on the pearl. Alvarado, a castaway and Maria's sweetheart, tries to ascertain the father's uneasiness. One day while gloating over his treasure, Alvarado and Maria thinking he is ill and knowing that Maria is the favorite daughter, request that she go see what the trouble is. Maria, knowing the cause of his seeming illness, to allay suspicion goes to him. He thinking that it is someone desirous of stealing the pearl, shoots through the door and kills Maria. Grief stricken over this other crime of his favorite daughter he goes to the cliffs and plunges into the sea.

The Paris Hat—Alhambra.—This is a screaming comedy, showing the troubles caused by a milliner's assistant when she borrows a "Paree" model. The husband of the woman who has purchased the hat, sees it on the assistant and takes her for his wife. Then the trouble starts. After a series of side-splitting scenes the hat is returned to the rightful owner and all matters are straightened to the satisfaction of all except the "old man."

His Double Did It—C K.—This farce shows the mishaps of two brothers who look alike. One brother is married and he introduces his brother to a widow, hoping thereby to make a match. The brother, who has been introduced to the widow, is suddenly called out of town and his married brother visits the widow. She thinking it is the single one makes love to him. His wife catches them. After the brother's return from the road matters are straightened out to the satisfaction of all.

A Domestic Revolution—C K.—Mrs. Grouch on a shopping tour is followed home by a flirt. She goes for a policeman and he arrests her husband, who has returned home, by mistake. Her husband thinks the policeman is her lover. After a series of funny scenes we see the right man arrested and Mr. Grouch handing money to Mrs. Grouch for a much desired dress.

Falsely Accused — MONTY — (TWO REELS).—Jennie Lee, a shop girl is very romantic and spurns the love of Dave Clark, a carpenter. Brady, store detective and Myrtle co-worker in Jennie's department, are thieves. After taking an inventory of the stock the manager informs Brady that he must either find the thieves who are stealing much valuable lace or forfeit his position. Myrtle and Brady become worried and decide to put the blame on Jennie. They hide some of the lace in her coat pocket, and when the search is made the detectives find the lace there. She is arrested. Dave Clark does a little detective work on his own account to help vindicate Jennie, and discovers Myrtle and Brady selling lace to a "fence." When Myrtle realizes the game is up she "squeals" on Brady, hoping thereby to extricate herself. The crooks are arrested and Jennie is freed. She, realizing Clark's real worth agrees to marry him.

Nevada — NAVAJO — (TWO REELS).—Lamonte, an attorney, convicts Street, a crook and when the latter is released from prison he kidnaps the former's little child with the aid of a band of gypsies. They leave for the West and Lamonte and his wife are also forced to start for California, because of the woman's health. On the desert the gypsies become stranded and all die except the little child who is found by a band of Indians and named Nevada. Fifteen years later Lamonte is a derelict attorney. Lieutenant Harte is in love with Nevada, as is Gray Wolf, a member of her tribe. The chief of the tribe gives Nevada to Gray Wolf and later, when the girl shoots a man who has been annoying her, Gray Wolf fastens the crime upon Lieutenant Harte hoping to rid himself of his rival forever. Nevada, however, confesses that she committed the crime and when the chief secures Lamonte as lawyer for her, father and daughter are reunited. Lamonte takes her back to civilization and Lieutenant Harte secures her promise to marry him.

Winter Resorts—NOLEGE.—Some southern winter resorts, showing scenes from West Indies and Cuban cities, where summer weather and sports are relished all winter.

Prejudice Conquered—PARAGON—(TWO REELS). — Lionel Desmond marries against his father's wishes and he is disinherited. He sets up a law office, but meets with little success. The father calls his son, Donald, from college to comfort him in his loneliness, but the latter proves wild and is breaking the old man's heart. Marion, Lionel's wife hits upon a plan to bring about a reconciliation between her husband and his father. She masquerades as an actress and infatuates Donald and when the father learns this, he and Lionel follow her and the boy to Lionel's apartments. The husband at first thinks Marion is unfaithful to him, but Donald, who has been informed of the real facts by his brother's wife, explains what she has done and a reconciliation between all of them follows.

One Night — PYRAMID.—Martha and Ruben, living in the same house, have a "sneaky feelin'" for each other. Martha goes out one night followed a few minutes later by Ruben, who goes to mail a letter. As Ruben has no key he puts a broom against the front door. Martha returns and shuts the door, locking Ruben out. Ruben returns, not knowing Martha has gone out, and believes there are burglars. He calls the police and Martha, hearing them open a window, runs from the house to obtain police assistance. The two squads of police meet in Martha's room where matters are explained while Martha and Ruben give each other a "good night" kiss. On the same reel is:

Billy Studies Music—SANTA BARBARA.—Billy decides to take up the study of music. He buys a lot of second-hand instruments and after much difficult practice makes up his mind to visit his sweetheart Betty, and show her his proficiency in the musical line. Father seriously objects to this concert and finally breaks the fiddle over Billy's head. After many adventures showing Billy exhibiting his musical talent on various instruments with disastrous results, we see father forgiving him after he has quieted the "howls" of a visiting baby.

The Arm of the Law—SANTA BARBARA—(TWO REELS).—Mrs. Brooks has been led to her marriage with Mr. Brooks against her better judgment. He is a tyrant and treats her brutally. Her former lover, Joe Brown, shoots her husband in revenge. She is not aware of this fact and is accused of the murder. Brown confesses to the crime and she is acquitted.

Won by a Mustache—THISTLE.—Fred, in love with Rena, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Patrick Newrich meets with the disapproval of Mrs. Newrich though the father favors his suit. Father's influence does not help much and he is barred from the house by Mrs. Newrich. Mrs. Newrich favors Percy and Reginald who live in the apartment adjoining Freddy. One evening Freddy, with the aid of father and Rena, frames up a scheme on Mrs. Newrich, who is interested in clairvoyancy. Father and Rena persuade her to call on a famous clairvoyant and Freddy disguises as the mystic. During his supposed trance he tells her that the first stranger to pass her threshold that evening is her daughter's future husband. Percy and Reginald overhear this remark and each plan to beat Freddy to it. The resulting mixup leads to many complications, but Freddy eventually wins.

The New Sheriff — TRUMP — (TWO REELS).—John Gray, the new sheriff, loves Ellen Stone, a Quakeress. When he is called home by the death of his father, he leaves her in care of his friend Mitchell. She falls in love with the latter, but her father refuses to agree to their marriage and she marries Gray upon his return. At first she cares nothing for him, but in time she learns to love him. Mitchell quarrels with Ellen's father and kills him. He then flees to her for protection and when Gray finds them together he fears she has been untrue to him. Mitchell attempts to take Gray's life, but Ellen takes the bullet intended for him and the sheriff then realizes that his wife truly loves him. Mitchell escapes, but is shot down by his pursuers.

Mutual Program

The World Upstairs—RELIANCE—JANUARY 25.—Owing to their maid's illness Mrs. Waring and her daughter, Elizabeth, have no one to fasten their gowns so they send down to the basement for Janitor Madigan's daughter, Mary Ann. The poor girl is amazed by the lavishness and finery of "the world upstairs," and returns to her basement with glowing thoughts of beautiful things to wear. Mrs. Waring leaves the key with Madigan on going out, so that her brother, Gilbert, may get in should he come during her absence. Unable to overcome her curiosity, Mary Ann takes the key and lets herself into the Waring apartments, where she tries on some of Elizabeth's gowns. Gilbert, who is somewhat of a reprobate, finds her and is attracted by her beauty. The unexpected return of Mrs. Waring and Elizabeth makes matters worse, but Bobby, Mary Ann's sweetheart, restores her faith in life.

The Express Messenger—RELIANCE—JANUARY 27.—During her father's illness Milly Carter undertakes to run the station at the lonely town of Shance. Milly is loved by both Dave Snowden, a young engineer, and by Bill Mailey, an overland express messenger, but favors Dave. When Bill learns this he swears revenge on both Milly and her father. A package containing a large sum of money is brought by Bill to be forwarded from Shance to Poccima. Milly signs for it, and hides it in the station as it cannot go out until the next morning. Bill and his brother break into the station and force Milly and her father to tell them the combination of the safe. While they are working Milly telephones the sheriff, who arrives with his men, captures the hold-up men, and, to their surprise, takes the money from the cushion of the chair in which they had tied Milly.

Through the Murk—DOMINO—(TWO REELS)—JANUARY 28.—Old Mother Hudson is a confirmed drunkard and intolerably lazy. The latter trait is strongly reflected in her daughter, Ivy, whom Mother Hudson wants to trade to "Big" Anderson for a half-keg of rye. Anderson, however, will not trade as he doesn't think the girl worth it. "Missouri" Joe, a lazy, unkempt young fellow, drifts into the town in which Ivy lives, and obtains a place in Anderson's saloon. He and Ivy meet, are mutually attracted, and become firm friends. Later they decide to get married, and, for the first time in some years, they make a conscientious effort to look neat. When Anderson sees Ivy with her face and hands washed and her hair combed he puts a half-keg of rye in a wagon, and drives to the Hudson shack to trade it for the girl. After the marriage Ivy insists on bidding her mother goodby, and arrives at the shack just as Anderson is bargaining for her with her mother. The saloon-keeper attempts to take the girl by force, but Joe intervenes, chokes him into insensibility, and he and his bride leave town to set up a home for themselves.

The Famine—Domino—January 29.—Misao is in love with Yoshiro, but consents to marry Toyomo, who professes to love her, and offers her father a large sum of money as a dowry. Yoshiro receives a letter from the girl telling him that she feels it her duty to give him up for the wealthier man, and while brooding over it is accosted by Horisho, an old beggar. During the famine Misao divided her last piece of bread with Horisho, and to show his gratitude he now determines to help the lovers out. He calls on Toyomo to talk the matter over with him, but is literally kicked out of the house. That night Toyomo tells Misao that he does not intend to marry her, and Horisho, overhearing him, slips into the room and kills him. Misao and Yoshiro escape in a fisherman's boat, and Horisho remains behind to pay the penalty of his crime.

The Home of Silence—Princess—January 29.—Alice Parker's interest in Ralph Jenkins, a convict, is greatly increased when he saves her father, who is deputy warden in the prison, from the attack of a dangerous prisoner. Charles Sims, a politician, is appointed warden. Alice bears his repulsive advances to prevent her father losing his place, but resists when the warden attempts to kiss her. Jenkins comes upon the scene and knocks Sims down. For this he is placed in solitary confinement. The warden compels Parker to resign, and later succeeds in having Jenkins' sentence lengthened. Parker and his daughter make an appeal to the governor, and the case is granted a hearing. Sims journeys to the capitol with a bodyguard of supporters. Things look pretty bad for Parker's side of the case when Ralph Jenkins enters dressed in citizens' clothes. The governor then introduces him as his son, who had been committed to prison to study inside conditions. Sims is dismissed; Parker, reinstated; and Alice marries the governor's son.

The Love Pirate—Reliance—(Two Reels)—January 30.—Viola Marsh fascinates her employer, a railroad magnate, causing him to desert his wife and lose his social position. Feeling that Viola is slipping away from him, the magnate commits forgery to supply her with further luxury, but she leaves him, stripped of honor and wealth, and elopes with a new victim. Several years later the former magnate, now a valet, discovers that his master is under the influence of some adventuress, and that his neglect of his wife is breaking her heart. He accompanies the clubman to a house party given in the siren's honor, and is there brought face to face with the woman. It is Viola. That night, in a room remote from the festivities, her first victim carries out his revenge.

Ring Around Rosey—Royal—January 30.—The news that Myron Sawyer has fallen heir to two thousand dollars travels like lightning through the village, impressing all of the "marriageables." One old maid determines to marry him, and, after a whirlwind of ludicrous incidents, succeeds in her conquest which ends in a mill pond in which Myron thought to escape her.

Cupid and the Pest—Komic—January 31.—Tony, a printer, wishes to be a dashing young lover, but no one will listen to his pleas. Maryola, the boarding house cook, is too handy with pots and pans to permit his approaching within easy speaking distance. In a spiteful mood he changes the dates of the wedding ceremonies in the local paper. The grooms forget the hour of their weddings, refer to the paper, and are misled by its information. Each meets the wrong woman at the church, but marries her anyway. Tony is rewarded by being given the one good feed of his life. Strengthened, he returns to Maryola, braves her volley of missiles, and embraces her. She surrenders.

A Farewell Dinner—Majestic—(Two Reels)—January 31.—When Billy Ewing leaves for the west to make good on a surveying contract which he hopes will make possible his marriage with Eleanor Standish, the girl's step-mother tries to induce her to forget Billy, and marry Lessiter, a New York millionaire. Through a strange twist of fate Mrs. Standish and her step-daughter meet Gladys Ladeau, a woman of the world who is desperately ill. A warm friendship springs up between them. Mrs. Standish intercepts one of Billy's letters to Eleanor and takes from it the picture it contains, destroying the note. Gladys suddenly becomes worse, and Mrs. Standish, entering her room, finds her beyond all aid and with Lessiter's picture clutched in her hand. She exchanges it for Billy's picture, causing Eleanor to believe that her lover is faithless. Billy returns to New York, learns of Eleanor's engagement to Lessiter, and is one of the guests at the latter's farewell bachelor party. The two men come to an understanding, and Lessiter, realizing that Eleanor does not really love him, but is a victim of her step-mother's ambitions, gives way for Billy, whom Eleanor receives with open arms.

Helen Intervenes—Thanhouser—January 31.—Helen, the five-year old daughter of the wealthy Carltons, makes friends with everybody. Her friendship for Marion Carter, a salesgirl in a department store, receives a severe test—and survives it. Marion is about to be discharged when Helen intervenes, and saves her position upon which are depending her mother and little brother.

The Law of the Wilds—American—(Two Reels)—February 1.—Two prospectors cache their food before entering the mining district and a trapper steals the supplies. The prospectors lose their supplies in a landslide and are saved from starvation by the trapper's wife. Both fall in love with her, but one proves unworthy and the other sends him away. The worthy one, fearing he, too, will fall in love with her, decides to go, but the trapper returns before he leaves and is about to kill him when the worthless prospector returns with the sheriff to accuse the wife of stealing the cache. The trapper cannot see his wife blamed and confesses his crime. In trying to escape he is killed, leaving the path clear for the worthy prospector and the wife to love. A review will be found on page 199 of this issue.

At the Bottom of Things—Reliance—February 1.—Frank Ferris, a master crook, is a bitter enemy of Thomas, also a crook, and orders the latter from his house when he finds him calling on his attractive daughter, Celeste. Ferris favors Jack Leeds as his daughter's suitor. The master crook is captured and sent to prison under an alias. Celeste, who thinks that her father is a traveling man, mourns him as dead. Later, Thomas is sent to prison and becomes Ferris' cellmate. He threatens to expose him to his daughter if he does not agree to his suit. Ferris refuses, and, when Thomas is freed, determines to make his escape and prevent the other crook from betraying his profession to his daughter. Ferris arrives just in time to prevent Thomas' entering the house. As the marriage ceremony binding Celeste and Jack comes to a conclusion, Ferris turns away and returns to prison, guilty of murder, but happy in having saved his daughter from shame and grief.

Which Would You Rather Be?—Beauty—February 2.—A delightful comedy-drama in which Virginia Kirtley, Joseph Harris, Webster Campbell and a girl player, whose face is unfamiliar in Beauty films, appear. The setting is a country town into which two drummers come. The village belles meet and fall in love with them and, after a short courtship, both couples become engaged. On the eve of their wedding one of the drummers fears to leave bachelorhood and returns to the city, but the other one remains and is married, securing a position in the store of his wife's father. A year passes and the drummer who remained is the father of twins. His pal visits the village and when he sees him tied down he is glad that he escaped. Another day comes, however, when the bachelor loses his position and learns that the girl's father has died and left them a fortune. The face of the girl he was to marry appears to him and, thoroughly penitent, he returns to her and begs her to marry him. The girl still loves him and forgives his action; the wedding ceremony closes the film. The entire picture is one of great merit and on account of its abundance of human interest will attract almost any audience. C. J. C.

An Old Fashioned Girl—MAJESTIC—FEBRUARY 2.—Abigail, the pretty daughter of a village school teacher, and Jared Guild are lovers. Bertha comes from the city to visit in the little town. Her charms prove too much for Jared, who neglects Abigail to court the new belle. The country girl is broken-hearted, but conceals it from her erstwhile lover. A wealthy young planter cuts out Jared with Bertha and he, realizing that he has been fooled, turns again to Abigail and they are reunited.

In the Jury Room—THANHOUSER—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 2.—Caleb Green practices economy in his factory to the elimination of sanitary working conditions. On behalf of the employes, Dr. Middleton, a famous surgeon, calls on Green and threatens to expose his repeated violations of the health regulations, unless he improves conditions in his factory. Green refuses, and defies the surgeon to do his worst, holding as a club a letter which reflects upon the reputation of Middleton's daughter. A quarrel ensues. An hour later Green is found dead, and Middleton is accused of the crime. The jury is eleven to one against him. As a final plea the juror in favor of acquittal tells a touching story of how, in years past, Middleton was attending his sick wife when a call came that his own wife was critically ill. In spite of his love the surgeon stuck to his post and saved the woman's life, though his own wife died. As the jurors write their "Not Guilty" verdict the court officer informs them that one of Green's employes has confessed to the killing.

Imitations—AMERICAN—FEBRUARY 3.—Winnifred Greenwood, Ed Coxen and Edith Borella, assisted by three exceedingly clever child players, make this a thoroughly delightful film. It deals with the love affair of two girls and a man, starting when they were children and being continued when they grow to manhood and womanhood. At first they are playmates and the serious little girl is liked by the boy, but the other girl is bolder and claims most of the boy's attentions. Fifteen years later the boy believes he is in love with the other girl, but when the serious girl appears he is not so sure. As the days of her visit pass he learns that the other girl's love for him is only an imitation and sends her imitation flowers and an imitation ring. When she demands an explanation, he tells her they are just like her love for him and then claims the other girl as his bride. C. J. C.

Shorty's Adventures in the City—BRONCHO—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 3.—After the round-up Shorty is sent to the city by the ranchman to dispose of a shipment of cattle. Business over, Shorty turns himself to pleasure, and has some amusing experiences. Brady, a fight promoter, likes the way Shorty fights, and induces him to enter the ring with Kid Mason. During the first few rounds Shorty gets the worst of the fight, but, after the Kid is compelled to discard his "doctored" gloves and use new ones, Shorty knocks him out in no time. He flatly refuses Brady's offer to back him permanently, and hurries for the train that is to take him back to the ranch. As the train moves out of the station the Kid starts to jeer at Shorty. The latter ropes him from the observation platform, and the picture finishes with the Kid being dragged along the tracks after the speeding train.

A Modern Noble — DOMINO — (TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 4.—Ludwig Von Hoffman, son of a German nobleman, is disowned by his father for eloping with Gretchen, daughter of Schultz, an innkeeper near "Old Heidelberg" college. Ludwig, now a fisherman, writes his father with the hope of bringing about a reconciliation. The count's reply falls into Gretchen's hands, and she realizes that it is she who stands between Ludwig and his father. She leaves a note for her husband, stating her reasons for drowning herself. The count's driver frustrates the girl's attempt to commit suicide, and takes her to the nobleman's hotel. To restore his son's reason, for the sorrow of losing Gretchen has unbalanced the boy's mind, the nobleman returns Gretchen to him and promises to forgive and forget.

College Days—KAY BEE—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 5.—Nell Saunders, the daughter of an innkeeper in a college town, is courted by Jimmy Dale and Pierson, both members of the football squad. Dale does not appeal to Nell and she refuses to marry him, much against her father's wishes. An important game is about to be played with the Indians. Dale is found drinking, and is suspended from the team. In revenge he offers his services to the Indians. Jimmy Cripps, a great student of military strategy and a firm friend of Nell's, offers to coach the team, which has been somewhat crippled by Dale's suspension. Dale, disguised as an Indian, is injured in the game and his identity is discovered. The home team wins, thanks to Cripps' work, and Nell and Pierson are reunited. Dale and his Indian team mates are driven out of town.

Big Brother Bill — THANHOUSER — FEBRUARY 7.—The village bully was thoroughly hated but unmolested by the children. Numberless times he was threatened with "big brothers" but he had never met one that could whip him. Little Leland's threat, however, is followed up by a big brother who is over seven feet tall. He reforms the bully after whipping him. Being too big to thrust into jail for disturbing the peace, Big Brother Bill is freed.

The Story the Silk Hat Told—IMP—FEBRUARY 1.—The old proprietor of a second-hand store sits down near a section on the shelves of which are arranged six silk hats. While musing about what experiences they might have had when in their prime he falls asleep, and dreams that each of the hats tells him a story. At the conclusion of the last story he awakens and the picture fades out.

The Blank Note—JOKER—FEBRUARY 1.—While doing all in his power to prevent his daughter's marriage to Tom, Dad meets Pricilla Prim. She is charmed. Tom writes Betty a note, in invisible ink, arranging for a meeting. It is, by mistake, delivered to Dad. He throws away the blank sheet of paper, and it accidentally falls in front of Miss Prim's door. She starts to burn it, but changes her mind when she sees that the heat causes writing to appear on it. Thinking that it is from Dad, Pricilla veils herself heavily, according to the note's instructions and goes to the beach to meet her lover, who is to be dressed as a fisherman. When Tom learns that the note has been delivered to Dad he calls Betty on the 'phone, and tells her of its contents. Dad overhears, and decides to play a trick on the lovers by dressing up as a fisherman, and taking a stroll along the beach. When the smoke of the "fun" has cleared away Dad learns that he has been married to Pricilla Prim. Another marriage is then performed binding Tom and Betty.

Cards Never Lie — VICTOR — (TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 1.—Harry, a rover, wanders into a gypsy camp and is welcomed by Rosemary, the chief's daughter, who is impressed with his stately bearing and appearance. Miss Yerkes, an heiress, is thrown from her horse near the camp, and is made comfortable by the gypsies until the arrival of her groom. Rosemary tells Harry's fortune with cards, greatly amusing him and Miss Yerkes, who do not believe in her power to read the future. Later, in his wanderings, Harry meets an old hermit who leaves him his wealth on the condition that he adopt his name. He again meets Miss Yerkes and they become engaged, but, on Harry's informing her that the fortune has slipped through his fingers, the heiress promptly breaks the engagement. Harry returns to the gypsy camp, and he and Rosemary are married according to the gypsy tribal laws.

Seven and Seventy—BIG U—FEBRUARY 2.—Little Bobby Mortimer longs for a grandpa, and, on meeting old Captain John Brent at the Old Soldier's Home, he immediately adopts him as his grandpa. To satisfy the little fellow, Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer urge the captain to make his home with them. He consents, and stays with them for several months, returning to the home when the Mortimers depart for the mountains for the summer. Illness seizes the old veteran, and he dies in the hospital. In the autumn the Mortimers return home, and inquire for the captain at the home. The commander tells them of the old soldier's death, and gives Bobby a valor medal which "Seven and Seventy," as he was called, left for him.

All Over the Biscuits—Nestor—February 2.—Newlywed and his wife quarrel about the quality of her biscuits. Mrs. Newlywed packs up and leaves for her mother's. On the way she changes her mind, going to a hotel instead. Newlywed also decides to live at the hotel, and is assigned the room next to his wife's. They fall in love with each other's voices but, on coming face to face, denounce each other as flirts. Newlywed moves to another room, a young married couple taking his old room. His wife hears the couple making love and, thinking that her husband is involved, bursts in on them. Newlywed sees her enter the room and follows, thinking that she has gone in to see the other man. The end of the affair is that the Newlyweds decide to quit their foolishness and go back housekeeping again.

The Girl of the Secret Service—Gold Seal—(Two Reels)—February 2.—Langford, who has just invented a wonderful device for the country's defense, drops out of sight. Kawakami, a Japanese spy, kidnaps Mrs. Langford to force from her the secret of her husband's whereabouts. The secret service learns of the kidnapping, and Francis Gordon is put on the case. He is assisted by Barbara Ward, his sweetheart. Disguised as a Jap, Barbara obtains admittance to Kawakami's house, and succeeds in effecting Mrs. Langford's escape. She, however, is caught by Kawakami and his men. Seeing the car speed away with Mrs. Langford as its sole occupant Gordon forces his way into the Jap's house to rescue Barbara, but he is too late. She dies from the wounds received in her struggle with the spies.

The Lure of the West—Eclair—(Two Reels)—February 3.—When "Old Man" Morgan dies his three children, who have been working in the East, return to the ranch, and for a time find the life tiresome. Gradually the beauty of the West grows upon them, and it is with a feeling of reluctance that they return to the East. Jane, who is living on Riverside Drive in New York, is the first to return to the ranch having become irritated by a visitor's laughing at her attempts to bake a cake. Budd becomes involved in a fight with a crook, and, leaving him for dead, returns to the West. Jim tires of working in a saloon, and quits and heads for home. Once more reunited, the wanderers decide that home is the best place after all.

The Butcher's Bride—L-Ko—February 3.—The butcher's happy married life is disrupted by the appearance of the butcher boy and Mr. Peabody. The butcher's wife proves to be an awful flirt, and keeps her husband chasing away suitors continually. In the end the butcher boy and Peabody double-cross each other, and the butcher's wife promises to quit flirting.

Her Bargain—Big U—(Two Reels)—February 4.—Dorothy Whitney, an heiress and an orphan, is about to be married to Gordon Thorn when her former school chum, Evelyn Day, steals him from her. Prompted by a spirit of revenge, Dorothy offers Rodney Blake, a laborer, an allowance of twenty thousand dollars a year if he will become her husband—in name only. Instinctively a gentleman, Rodney refuses, but changes his mind when a vision comes to him of the poverty in which his mother is forced to live. He accepts, and is allotted a part of the house entirely separated from the part in which Dorothy lives. Gradually she comes to admire the man, but he loathes the part he plays. To date Rodney has received just a thousand dollars from Dorothy. He sees an ad in the paper offering a thousand dollars to the man who will give a portion of his blood to save an invalid's life and applies. The man is Gordon Thorn. The operation is unsuccessful, and Thorn dies. Dorothy and Rodney become reunited, not in name only but in love as well.

The Girl and the Spy—Rex—February 4.—Ben, a foreigner in New York, is unable to secure work, and is at a loss for a means of supporting his brother who is ill. Frances, the daughter of a foreign ambassador, visits the garret in which Ben lives while making her "good Samaritan" visits in the slums, and pays the rent which she learns is overdue. Ben is out at the time, but he meets Frances later, and is impressed by her generosity and beauty. War is declared between his native land and that of the girl's father, and Ben enrolls as a spy. His first task is to obtain certain important papers which are to be delivered at the ambassador's house that night. Not knowing that the man is Frances' father, Ben and the head spy enter the house, and overpower the ambassador and servants. The head spy is about to kill the ambassador when Frances runs into the room. Ben realizes that she is the man's daughter, and struggles with the head spy to regain the papers. The police are attracted by Frances' screams and, entering, arrest the head spy. At the ambassador's request Ben is freed.

Love and Dough—Sterling—February 4.—Heinze, appointed bakery foreman during his employer's absence, assumes the duties of clerk, and makes dates with three of the women customers, the meeting place to be on a nearby street corner. Unfortunately he makes the three dates for the same time, and is compelled to take refuge in the oven to avoid rough handling. The other bakers become involved in the affair, and empty a barrel of flour on the women.

The Awaited Hour—Imp—(Two Reels)—February 5.—Awaiting execution in the "Death House," Frank Colby tells his story to the prison chaplain. He describes how he was robbed of his wife by his employer, Stephen Farwell, and thrust into prison for a forgery committed by him. Thereafter his one object in life is revenge. In time he makes his escape from the penitentiary, surprises Farwell in his home, and hangs him from the chandlier in his own house. Colby burns the stocks, bonds and securities, that he finds in Farwell's desk, making his former wife a pauper, and then deliberately walks into the arms of a policeman who is passing the house. As Colby finishes his story the prison guards approach his cell, and lead him out to pay the penalty of his revenge.

Lizzie's Dizzy Career—Nestor—February 5.—Lizzie's voice is the pride of the village, and the banker sends her to the city to have it cultured. Discouraged by the vocal teacher she obtains an engagement with a musical comedy company. One night, Jed, her country lover, rushes out on the stage and embraces her. Both are ejected from the theater. Basement Jimmy, a crook for whose capture a five hundred dollar reward is offered, hides himself in a trunk in Lizzie's room. Jed learns of it, summons the police, and collects the reward. Lizzie is convinced that they had better return to the country when Jed starts a flirtation with two of her chorus girl friends.

The Bribe—Victor—February 5.—Through some stock deals Graham, a politician, gets a hold on Judge Whiting. Brady and Jones, Graham's friends, desire to know in advance a decision that is to be given out on a case by the judge, and Graham agrees to secure it for them. An Oriental in his employ hypnotizes Mary Whiting, the judge's daughter, and has her take the prepared decision from the safe. At his friends' request Graham has Whiting change certain parts of the decision. Graham also demands that Mary become his wife. At a stag Graham brags that he has Mary on his visiting list. Jones wagers that he is mistaken, and to prove it Graham sends his servant for the girl. Again the Oriental hypnotizes Mary and leads her to Graham's house. Charles, Mary's sweetheart, follows and rescues her. Mary sees the altered decision on the table and takes it with her. When Graham ushers his party into his room to prove that he is right the place is empty. Mary and Charles return home and save the judge from disgrace.

Ridgeway of Montana—101 BISON—(THREE REELS)—FEBRUARY 6.—Waring Ridgeway and Simon Harley are deadlocked in a financial battle. Harley and his young wife, Aline, are caught in a blizzard and separated. Ridgeway who is travelling the same way, finds Aline and revives her. The woman's husband offers Ridgeway a place at the head of a large copper concern, but the young engineer refuses, saying that there can be no compromise in their fight. Angered, Harley starts a campaign to crush his rival, beginning by paying one of his men to dynamite one of Ridgeway's mines. One of the miners is killed in the explosion, and Ridgeway has Harley brought to trial for the crime, but the millionaire is acquitted. When the jury brings in the verdict the miner's widow shoots Harley. A year later Ridgeway marries Aline Harley, and Virginia Balfour, a girl whose love for Ridgeway centered only on his wealth, consents to marry Hobart, once the manager of Harley's mines.

He Cured His Gout—JOKER—FEBRUARY 6.—The pain of Jones' gouty foot is not decreased any by the approach of Tom, a fellow whom Jones has never liked and who insists on marrying Jane, Jones' daughter. Dad knocks Tom into a plaster box in front of a building which is in the course of construction. Jane calms her father and wheels him away. Tom follows quietly behind, making love to the girl. At the top of a hill the spooning couple forget about the wheel chair and its occupant, and Dad is rolled down into a lake. He emerges wet and angry, but cured of gout.

Their Hobo Hero—ECLAIR—FEBRUARY 7.—A tramp begs at the house of one of the two village blacksmiths, but his request for food is met with a refusal. The wife of the other blacksmith gives him a loaf of bread. Later he finds the blacksmiths' children in the woods, and takes them to his shack where he builds a fire for them and feeds them. In the meantime the children's mothers have spread the alarm about their absence and the sheriff's posse finds them in the shack. The tramp they find out gathering wood. He is taken back to the village and locked up. The next morning when the children tell the whole story of how the tramp found and fed them he is released and is given employment in the blacksmith shop.

Zip and His Gang—L-KO—FEBRUARY 7.—Zip and his gang, over-confident under the protection of the ward boss, make game of the police department by waylaying every policeman they can catch and sending him back to his captain minus his uniform and dignity. The star policeman catches Zip and steals his sweetheart, but the ward boss obtains the crook's release and the girl leaves of her own accord. Thinking to draw the whole gang into a trap the policemen rig up a dummy and place it at the end of a narrow pier. The dummy draws the crooks as planned, but when they discover the policemen nearby they throw them into the ocean. The star policeman comes to the rescue by pushing Zip's whole gang into the water.

The Flash—REX—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 7.—Carl Brauer, a blind musician, has a daughter who is a nurse in the city hospital. Frank Hoag brings his wife to the hospital to be operated upon, and is brutally indifferent as to her condition or her chance of living. His manner undergoes a complete change, however, when Miss Brauer becomes Mrs. Hoag's nurse. To make an impression on the girl he pretends to be overburdened with sorrow because of his wife's illness. After Mrs. Hoag's death he continues his former way of living. One day he meets the nurse on the street, and asks to accompany her home. She consents. On arriving at the Brauer home Hoag attempts to make advances to the girl. She grabs a hypodermic needle lying on the table, and thrusts it into his arm. In the meantime her father has fallen into a trench. Dr. Harvey brings him home and, on hearing the girl's story, has the unconscious Hoag removed to a hospital. Miss Brauer induces Harvey to interest a specialist in her father's case. A short time later the old man's eyes are in a fair way to recover their sight. Hoag returns a few days later, and forces his way into the house. Old Brauer, hearing the sounds of the struggle, gets a revolver, prays that his sight be returned him just for a moment, tears off the bandage, and shoots Hoag. He loses his sight forever through the act, but he does not regret it. He has saved his daughter's honor.

The Vow—NEMO—(THREE REELS).—A party of American tourists, including Donald Hanford and Dexter Harrison, visit Sicily, and Hanford is attracted by Anetta, who is loved by Bernardo. Lorenzo, a treacherous native, loves Beatrice, sister of Bernardo, but her brother refuses to allow the marriage. A quarrel between Hanford and Bernardo results in a duel, in which Bernardo is killed, after Lorenzo has substituted real bullets for the blanks which Hanford had intended to use. Lorenzo urges Beatrice to vow over the dead body that she will be avenged upon the slayer. Lorenzo leaves for London to persuade the murderer to return, but as both men have the same initials, he follows Harrison. Hanford is wrecked off the Sicilian coast and is nursed back to health by Beatrice. Lorenzo returns, and as he is about to kill Hanford, falls from a cliff. His death unseals the lips of Hanford and he confesses the guilt of Bernardo's death to Beatrice and is forgiven by her.

A Great Secret—WHITE STAR—(THREE REELS).—Edwin and Neva Tremayne, worn out by ten years' struggle of poverty, visit Edwin's brother, Hal Tremayne, who lives in a rich mansion. When Hal's wife expresses great surprise at the condition of their relatives, Edwin tells the story of their downfall. Years before Hal's wife had loaned Neva a necklace valued at $10,000, and while at a ball it was stolen by some crooks who were operating there. Edwin and Neva secured another necklace and bound themselves to pay $1,000 a year for ten years, in order to replace the jewels which were taken from them. The suffering caused by this ordeal dragged them from happiness to their poverty-stricken condition. As they finish the story, Hal, aghast, tells his brother that the necklace his wife loaned Neva was only paste.

Through Fire and Water—NEMO—(TWO REELS).—Phillip, a clerk in Maxwell's office, is in love with Deane, his employer's daughter. She reciprocates his attentions, but there seems to be something between them which the girl can never understand. One night a fire breaks out in the orphan asylum, where Deane often goes to care for the children. With the assistance of Phillip, she rescues a little blind child, and when they bring the boy home, Phillip recognizes him as his own child. He then tells Deane the story of his former wife and how he neglected her, but how, when it was too late, he repented. He was at that time poor and, unable to care for his child, he placed him in the orphanage. The girl sympathizes with him and knows now that all obstacles between them have been removed and that happiness is in store for both of them, for she has decided to become a mother to his child.

Through Night to Light—WHITE STAR—(THREE REELS).—Returning from a dance hall, where she is forced to go to earn enough money to pay household expenses, Jack Green's young wife, Dorothy, finds her husband in a drunken stupor. Disgusted with life, she rushes to the river and hurls herself into the water. Tom Wright, a settlement worker, passing along the bank sees her and rescues her. He recognizes in her the daughter of the village judge of his home town and recalls how both he and Jack Green had loved her when Jack was studying law under her father and how Jack had won her. He had left town and gone to the city, where he took up the settlement work, but it had been different with Jack, who took to drink and neglected his wife. This led to poverty and eventually to Dorothy going to the dance hall. When the girl recovers she recognizes her former lover and is cared for by him. He searches for Jack and eventually finds him in a hospital, where he had been taken after being injured in a brawl. Tom leads Dorothy to Jack and effects their reconciliation. Through the influence of the worthy man Jack overcomes his fondness for liquor and again Dorothy and he live in happiness.

After Five—LASKY—(FIVE REELS).—Ted Ewing is the guardian of Nora Hildreth, with whom he is in love. He seeks to invest her money wisely, and on the advice of an old-time friend places all of her fortune in syndicate stock, known as Potash preferred. Potash preferred goes smash on the stock market and Ted plans to reimburse Nora by taking out a life insurance in her name and have himself killed "by accident." A band of blackmailers threaten to cause him to die "by accident" if he does not pay them a certain amount of money. This pleases him immensely, and he even begs them to cause his death any time "after five" that afternoon. The incidents which follow, however, prove that the smash of Potash preferred was only a ruse and that the stock has really doubled. Ted suffers many comical terrors in the moments "after five," but eventually he manages to pay off the blackmailers and escapes with his life. Later he marries Dora. Edward Abeles featured.

The Morals of Marcus—Famous Players—(Five Reels).—Carlotta, a little English baby, is brought up in the harem of Hamdi, her foster parent. She escapes through the aid of an American citizen and finds her way into the gardens of Marcus Ordeyne. Hamdi demands her return when he learns where she is, but Marcus, despite the protests of his aunt and cousin, announces his intention of marrying her, and remains firm in his determination, thus giving the film a happy ending. Marie Doro featured. A complete review will be found on page 172 of the January 30 issue.

The Goose Girl—Lasky—(Five Reels).—Of course, Gretchen, the goose girl, is not a goose girl at all, but the Princess of Ehrenstein, only child of the grand duke of that country, who has been stolen by gypsies in her infancy. This is all due to a plot conceived and executed by Von Herbeck, the chancellor to the grand duke, who seeks to put his own daughter in the place of the stolen princess. There is a king in the story and he is the ruler of the neighboring country of Jugendheit. In order to prevent war between the two principalities, he is betrothed to marry the false princess, whom he has never seen. But the king is young and romantic, and revolts at this procedure. In the events that follow the king rescues the little goose girl from insult and falls in love with her. However, it appears that it is impossible for him to marry a peasant girl, and he finally consents to marry the princess after all. But—by that time the little goose girl has been identified as the real scion of royalty and, in the Princess of Ehrenstein, the King of Jugendheit finds, to his surprise and joy, the woman of his choice. Marguerite Clark appears in the title role.

Pathe

The Price of Tyranny—Pathe—(Four Reels).—A. J. Wright, owner of immense cotton mills, has an ungovernable temper, which leads to his sending his son, Edward, to India for a slight disobedience. After six months in the torrid climate Edward's only joy is a young Hindoo maid, with whom he has fallen in love. Harold Wright, a nephew, plans to win his uncle's estate and manages to have Edward disinherited, when he marries the Hindoo girl. Four years pass and a little girl blesses the union of Edward and his wife. The young man is taken sick and dies, leaving a note to his father asking him to care for his loved ones. The wife and little girl start for the States, but before they arrive the wife is taken sick and also dies. The little girl secures work in the cotton mills, after reaching the home of her grandparent and later, when Wright's eyes are operated upon she nurses him. The old man's temper is abated and he now longs for his son. When he learns that the girl who cared for him during his suffering is his own grandchild he offers her the home that should have belonged to his son.

The Bomb Throwers—Pathe—(Three Reels).—A gang of bomb throwers decide to stop the district attorney's prosecutions and plan to induce Tony, a hard-working organ-grinder, to kill him. At first he flatly refuses to join their band. Later his wife dies and they convince him that District Attorney Mayne was to blame. He then joins them to wreak vengeance on the man whom he believes poisoned his wife. Tony places a bomb in the basement of the Mayne home, and is about to steal away when he sees Mrs. Mayne enter the house with his little girl. He hurries back into the basement, gets the bomb, and throws it into the midst of the rest of the gang who are hiding in the barn. Tony then enters the house, accuses Mayne of causing Maria's death, and is assured by the doctor that Maria died of natural causes, and not from poison. C.R.C.

The Call of the Child—Pathe—(Two Reels).—Asta Neilsen, famous throughout Europe and in this country as a wonderful emotional actress, has the leading role in this picture as Elena, a young girl who marries against her parents' wishes, and later learns that the proud, pretentious count whom she has chosen for a husband is a brute and a spendthrift. Elena bears her sorrows and regrets in silence, and, after the baby's birth, centers her whole interest in life in the little child. It becomes ill, and the young mother returns home for the first time since her marriage to ask for money. The funds which were to pay for the baby's treatment are misused by the count, and the child dies before another doctor is secured. The shock unbalances Elena's mind, and she commits suicide. C.R.C.

A Day on the Farm With the Boy Scouts—Pathe—(Split Reel).—A most interesting film. The scenes were taken in England, and show the boy scouts at work, plowing, milking the cows, shearing and dipping the sheep, and feeding the stock on the farm. On the same reel is:

Views of Southern California—Pathe—This picture is about four hundred feet in length, and is a pictured exploration of the mission section of this historical section of our country. C.R.C.

Pathe News No. 6—Pathe—Peace centennial at New Orleans, La.; the march of the unemployed to the city hall in New York City; the French war office purchasing 3,000 cow ponies in Seward, Okla.; joy riding in ice boats at Ogdensburg, N. Y.; the Loma auto race at San Diego, Cal.; numerous views of the earthquake in Italy and war views from Lauw, Furnes and Jambes, Belgium; Monthois, Souilly, Auvours and Verdun, France, and Scarborough, England, showing the latest views of the European conflict.

Pathe News No. 7—Pathe—Warship San Diego leaving its home town; 13th U. S. infantry, just back from Alaska, parading in New York; army aviators testing new flying machines at North Island, Cal.; new torpedo boat, Cushing, launched at Quincy, Mass.; a thirteen-year-old widow, resident of Pasadena, Cal.; deputies quieting a riot in Roosevelt, N. J.; war section, showing Norfolk, England, after raid by Zeppelins; views in Cambrai, Bologne and Ricori, France, and Tsarkoye Selo, Russia.

Queen Margaret—Pathe French Company—(Five Reels).—An adaptation of Alexander Dumas' novel, "Marguerite De Valois." Natural colored photography makes the offering a charming film. A number of prominent French players appear in the leading roles, and the costumes and settings are correct and artistic in every detail. While the story deals with a religious subject, it is handled in such a manner that it can easily be appreciated by the broad-minded. Queen Catherine's antagonism towards the Huguenots is the first point to be emphasized. King Henry, their leader, is married to the sister of King Charles of France, and when he refuses to change his faith, Catherine induces Charles to order a massacre. De La Mole and Cocomas, formerly bosom friends, meet as leaders of the opposing forces during the battle which follows. When the latter is injured, De La Mole takes him to his apartment, where their friendship is restored. De La Mole loves Henry's wife, Queen Margaret. Cocomas is in love with Duchess De Neveres. In an effort to poison Henry, Queen Catherine causes the death of King Charles, through a mistake. She then shifts the blame to the shoulders of De La Mole and Cocomas. They are condemned to torture and death, but just before their execution De La Mole receives an offer to escape. He decides to remain loyal to his friend, however, and is put to death with him, while the two women who love them grieve.

Happy's Mishaps—PATHE.—Happy is a tramp, not over-fond of work, but willing if the position is easy enough. He sees a moving picture company working and applies for a job as cameraman. After spoiling a number of pictures, he is sent to Mexico to get some fight pictures. This does not exactly suit his taste, as he has to change his position too often to keep from getting shot, so he makes haste for the neutral zone. On arriving in this country, he is greeted and lionized by all as an intrepid hero.

The Tip-Off—PATHE-BALBOA—(THREE PARTS).—Huntley Adams, chief of police, has every confidence in his secretary, Arthur Clarke, and in Charles Donnelly, detective chief. The two men are rivals for the chief's daughter, Blanche. Donnelly leads raid after raid on the hangouts of "Spike" Murray's gang, but each time the birds have flown before the police arrive. Donnelly is firm in his belief that they are being "tipped off" by someone, but cannot find out who it is. Clarke, who is secretly in league with the gangsters and is antagonistic towards Donnelly because the latter has succeeded in winning Blanche, is one day caught signaling Fannie, the gang's spy, from the chief's window, and is thrust into jail. A few moments later Fannie occupies the cell next to him. Events of the past few weeks have weakened Blanche's confidence in Donnelly, and now, when she sees him while coming out of her father's office she passes him by. He restrains her, begging her to listen to his side of the story, and takes her down to the cells in which are Clarke and Fannie. Blanche sees the injustice of her quick judgment and begs his forgiveness. The next raid upon Murray's gang results in the capture of all of the crooks.

Saved from Himself—PATHE-BALBOA—(THREE PARTS).—Jackie Saunders and

Henry King are featured in this drama, which tells of a youth who allows a fortune and a sound business to dribble through his fingers and is forced to resort to burglary as a means of obtaining life's necessities. There is nothing exceptionally striking about the story, but it is well acted and elaborately staged and tells the story entirely through its action. The picture was reviewed before the subtitles were placed in it, but the only points left in doubt were lapses of time and letters. The rest of the story was splendidly interpreted by the cast. Briefly, it deals with the reformation of John Macklyn, once a wealthy man, but now a common thief. While robbing the Merritt home he comes upon a girl in one of the darkened rooms, and, thinking her a thief, too, tells her his story. Mabel Merritt secures a position for him in her father's concern, helps him regain his former station in life, and later becomes his wife.

C. R. C.

Pete, the Pedal Polisher—PATHE—Pete tires of being a hostler to a no-account mule and accepts a friend's offer to take care of his shoe-shining stand for a while. Business comes with a rush. Pete becomes excited and does most unaccountable and ludicrous things. However, his dark cloud has a silver lining, and, happy in the possession of the contents of the bootblack's cash register, Pete wanders off to find his best girl and take her to the "movies." On the same reel:

The Valley of Chamouni—PATHE—Very picturesque are the winter scenes in this educational film. It shows persons skiing and illustrates the different modes of winter travel.

Runaway June—(THIRD EPISODE)—RELIANCE—(TWO REELS).—June secures a position as model in a store, through the concealed influence of Blye. She believes that her troubles are at an end, but Blye carries out his plan and has her discharged. He then offers her aid openly, but she refuses. Ned sees her and tries to reach her, but she again runs away. Blye takes up the chase. A complete review of the subject appears on page 189 of this issue.

A Message from the Heart—(ELEVENTH EPISODE, ZUDORA IN THE $20,000,000 MYSTERY)—THANHOUSER—(TWO REELS)—Jim Baird follows several of the conspirators to the den of a diamond cutter, where the smuggled diamonds are weighed. He then tells Detective Hunt, who plans to capture the men. Madame Duval masquerades as a ghost to frighten Zudora and cause her to leave the country, so that they may claim her fortune. She appears to succeed in her attempt, but her co-workers, who are implicated in the diamond deal, are arrested by Hunt. A review will be found on page 203 of this issue.

Universal Special

The Master Key—(EPISODE ELEVEN)—(UNIVERSAL)—JANUARY 25.—It will be remembered that in episode ten both Wilkerson and Dore hired boats and divers to hunt for the sunken chest in which are the papers telling of the secret of the Master Key mine. Wilkerson's party recovers the chest and returns to shore with it. They force open the lid, but hunt in vain for the papers. Among the chest's contents is an old Indian idol, which Wilkerson casts aside as worthless. One of the sailors appropriates the idol, and later sells it to a dealer in antiques. Dore, landing shortly after Wilkerson, learns that the latter was unsuccessful in his search for the papers and also hears of the idol. In the meantime a Hindu rug peddler sees the idol in the shop and buys it. As he gazes at the little image he sees a vision of the past in which he sees himself banished from his native land until he can recover the idol which was stolen while he was on guard at the temple. The Hindu's vision closes, and Ruth and Dore are seen entering the shop in search of the idol.

Wildfire—Schubert—(Five Reels).—Barrington owns a racing stable on Long Island, without his daughters, Henrietta and Myrtle, knowing it. He visits the West and is murdered by Keefe, a gambler, who steals a bill of sale to his racing stables and returns East, claiming that he bought them. John Garrison, a young sheriff, suspects foul play, and after securing the dead man's watch and the murderer's cigarette holder and a sheet of the inventory pertaining to the bill of sale, also goes East. Both fall in love with Henrietta, Garrison recognizing her by a picture which was in the dead man's watch. Keefe denies his identity, but when shown the cigarette holder, winces. Before he can confront Keefe with the dead man's watch, he loses it and it is found by a street beggar and pawned. Henrietta buys the watch and suspects Garrison. Other events lead her to also suspect Keefe, who has induced Ralph, Myrtle's fiance, to gamble. The day of the big handicap approaches, and Wildfire, the crack filly of Keefe's stables, is being backed to win. Keefe then bets on another horse and plans to have Wildfire lose the race. Henrietta and Garrison come to an understanding and secure conclusive evidence that Keefe murdered her father. A fierce struggle takes place in the office at the same time that Wildfire is circling the track ahead of the field. The horse crosses the line a winner and Keefe is placed under arrest, while Garrison turns to Henrietta and asks her to be his wife.

Miscellaneous

Time Lock No. 776—Photo Drama—(Six Reels).—Isaac Abrahams, an old pawnbroker, in addition to being an expert engraver, has invented time lock No. 776. An alliance is formed between a crooked broker, who wants to steal Isaac's patent, and an underworld gang, who wish to force him to engrave a plate for making counterfeit money, by which Isaac's life is endangered. Isaac's daughter, Helen, leaves home to become an actress and falls into the hands of the plotters. Isaac is abducted and told of his daughter's peril and also informed that if he makes the plate and surrenders the blue prints of his patent she will be freed. He insists that his daughter be brought before him as a guarantee that she is alive, but this is refused him. The girl is placed in a vault which has her father's time lock attached to it. Thrills follow in rapid order. The secret service men rush to the den of the crooks, rescue the father and then rush with him to the time lock vault, from which he frees his daughter a moment before she suffocates.

Springtime—Life Photo—(Five Reels). Madeline is bethrothed to her father's cousin when she is but a child, and the opening of the film shows her prepared for a visit from him. Neither favors the match, but both determine that they shall not be the one to break it. Gilbert Steele, the son of an enemy of Madeline's father, comes to their home to transact business with the old man and falls in love with Madeline. When he leaves the house Madeline follows him. He enlists in a company which is about to face the attacking British, and when Madeline is prevented from accompanying him, she wanders about all night. The father thinks she has disgraced the family and turns her away from their home. At the same time she hears a false report that Gilbert is dead, and the combined shock unbalances her mind. When Gilbert returns, however, and claims her as his bride, her mind is restored and her father forgives all when he sees he was in the wrong. The cousin arrives, but goes away at once, happy, for he is in love with another girl.

The Three Black Trumps—Picture Playhouse—(Four Reels).—Robert Clark, steeplejack, falls in love with the daughter of a rich merchant and saves her life by climbing up between two buildings when her home burns. Her father, however, objects to him on account of his work, and they are forced to elope. She is disowned, and a year later, when their child is born, they are in dire poverty. Robert later secures a position and undertakes to work on the tallest chimney in the city. An accident leaves him suspended in midair, with no means of escape. The chimney takes fire and the firemen fail to reach him. His wife, however, by a fearless feat of steeple climbing, manages to bring him in safety to the ground. The feat attracts considerable attention and they are offered a position in a circus. After trial they become regular members of the circus and, with their child, are known as "The Three Black Trumps." Five years pass and they have accumulated much fame and wealth. They visit the town in which the wife's parents live, and when her father sees his little grandchild he forgives all and takes them into his home.

PASSED BY THE NATIONAL BOARD OF CENSORSHIP

The films of all the companies are now being submitted to the National Board of Censorship and when approved by them bear official stamp which is shown above. Screen productions having been thus approved are certain to entertain an audience of any kind without offending even the most sensitive person present.

The Press Agent Says—

That True Boardman, who plays the role of "sheriff" and "bad man" in the western Essanay dramas, gave two highwaymen the scare of their lives the other night when they held him up in his machine when returning to Niles, Calif. from San Francisco. When they yelled "hands up" he pulled out two colts that looked like gatling guns and began a fusillade that quickly drove the robbers into the woods in fright.

That if Kate Price, Vitagraph comedienne, was given her choice between having a chance to play a joke and sitting down to a dinner of corned beef and cabbage, much as she likes C. B.—the joke would win out—first.

That during the production of the "Breath of Araby" in the Vitagraph studio, L. Roger Lytton, who played one of the leading parts opposite Helen Gardner, borrowed a dollar from Director Gaskill. A few days later, Mr. Lytton seeing Mr. Gaskill in the act of loaning some money to another actor, hastily said: "By the way, Mr. Gaskill, have I paid you that dollar you loaned me the other day?" "Mr. Lytton," replied Mr. Gaskill, "you are so very clever a man that I am sure you have. Had you not, you would not now ask me if you had."

That Mary Alden, one of the stars whom D. W. Griffith has made prominent in the Mutual program, has given up tight-rope walking, as she found that it was a somewhat precarious art. Details suppressed.

A crowd—a big crowd—an attentive crowd during a "rescue" is something which no director dares to dream of. But how to get it? Money cannot buy it sometimes. But Edison Director Charles J. Brabin knew human nature. He wanted a crowd and he wanted them to look up. He ran to the second story, brandished a stage "torch" and launched into a fiery harangue about socialism. While the mob gazed wonderingly upward, he dodged back into the window and the camera man spun away and got great "atmosphere."

That to Ray C. Smallwood falls the distinction of being one of the few directors in the motion picture industry who operate their own cameras. Not satisfied with this two-in-one combination, he insists upon driving his own automobile while making exteriors, writes most of his own stories, supervises the work of the factory, cuts up his own negatives and takes care of the other work that falls to his lot as vice-president and secretary of the Smallwood Film Corporation. At the present writing he has only to perfect a motor attachment to run his camera in order that he may equip himself to work in the pictures with Ethel Grandin, whose work he is directing.

That Captain Charles White, who commands the good ship Fremont, used by the New York Motion Picture Corporation for many a Mutual Movie, owns a bird which he picked up out of Los Angeles bay, and is training it to be an actor.

That her appearance in the Mutual program as Ethel the stenographer in the Mutual film adaptations of Paul West's "Bill" series demonstrates that as a gum chewer Fay Tincher, in the language of humanity, "has class." A New York admirer of the Griffith star, evidently impressed with her attention to the gentle art of jaw work, sent her a present, recently, of fifty assorted packages of chewing gum.

That Jack Richardson made a hit with a kid the other day, only it was the wrong kind, hit and kid both. In "The Law of the Wild" Richardson plays the no-account, brutal husband, and in rehearsing his director, Thomas Ricketts, yelled, "Be more realistic, Jack." Promptly Jack made a lunge at the unhappy child he was playing with, and indulged in a flow of language. The youngster took one horrified look at the countenance of his pseudo-father, and fled, yelling, breaking up the scene.

Selig Production a Sane Melodrama

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

"THE Van Thornton Diamonds," the two-reel production to be released by the Selig Polyscope Company on February 15, is a sane but exciting melodrama. Because it does not depend on any one thing to "get it over" this film will appeal to audiences of any class.

Acting, settings, photography, direction, and story are all nicely blended together, the result being more than satisfying. Edith Johnson, the leading lady who only recently made her first bid for popularity, is seen to splendid advantage in this film and indeed makes a charming heroine. Her role calls for several delicate bits of acting and at no time does she fail to take advantage of every opportunity offered her. Next to Miss Johnson, the work of Franklyn Hall, who has the heavy lead, deserves commendation. He is an ideal type of villain and will probably be very much

Thurston meets Mrs. Van Thornton

"disliked" by those who take the photodrama overseriously.

The plot of the story deals with the attempt of a society crook to secure the diamonds owned by a society leader. It holds the interest at all times and by clever scene arrangement works up to a strong climax. Besides the two players mentioned above Lamar Johnston and Catherine Henry also appear in important parts and their work, while not very conspicuous, is nevertheless pleasing.

The opening scenes of the story show Alan Thurston (Mr. Hall), a society crook, on a visit to a seaside resort, where he plans to meet Mrs. Van Thornton (Miss Henry), a society leader. Near the same resort Katherine Selwyn (Miss Johnson), an orphan, lives. She studies painting, and when Thurston sees her sketching one day he comments favorably upon her work. She is very pretty and the crook believes that she would be a valuable accomplice to him. Determined to secure her for this purpose he makes love to her and the girl finally agrees to marry him.

The Van Thornton ball gives Thurston the desired opportunity

As the social season at the resort nears its close and Thurston has made the acquaintance of Mrs. Van Thornton and her brother George Winthrop (Mr. Johnstone), he leaves for the city, taking Katherine with him and marrying her when they arrive at his home. It is not until some time after the ceremony has been performed that Thurston tells his wife of the part he wishes her to play. The girl is heartbroken and leaves him, renting a room in the tenement district and again taking up her painting.

Time passes and Thurston receives an invitation to Mrs. Van Thornton's week end party, at which the famous Van Thornton jewels are to be displayed. He knows that it will be difficult for him to secure the spoils without an assistant and is pleased when he accidentally meets his wife on the street one day. He follows her to her room and when the landlady threatens to put her out for not paying her rent he settles the affair for her. He then takes her to his home, where he tells her that she must help him secure the jewels at the coming social event.

While the motive for her being forced to agree to this is not made clear, it may be ascribed to fear of his brutality. At any rate she finally agrees and masquerades as a newspaper woman, interviewing Mrs. Van Thornton. She pretends to sprain her ankle as she is leaving and is taken into the house and given medical attention. That night the ball is given and Thurston, who is present, tells Katherine that she must locate the diamonds.

She does this and tells him, but after all the others in the house have retired she changes the hiding place of the jewels. George sees her act and also sees Thurston try to find the diamonds. When he sees that the girl has deceived him, Thurston attacks her but George comes to her rescue. In the struggle which follows Thurston draws a gun but in attempting to shoot George he is himself killed by the bullet. The death is made to appear to be suicide and George keeps Katherine's secret, for he has learned to love her.

New Distribution Medium

The Famous Players Film Company announces its stupendous photo-spectacle, "The Eternal City," by Hall Caine, with Pauline Frederick, for immediate release to legitimate theaters and motion picture houses, charging twenty-five cents as the minimum admission, that can house a long-run attraction such as this unusual film achievement.

A special booking agency has been organized by the Famous Players Film Company for the exploitation of "The Eternal City" and other special subjects too long for the regular program. This booking organization is to be called the Select Film Booking Agency, with offices at 110 West Fortieth street, New York City, under the management of George M. Welty, formerly connected in a similar capacity with Liebler and Company and other important theatrical concerns. The Famous Players future Mary Pickford releases will also be booked through this special agency.

When asked for an official explanation of the purpose and policy of the Select Film Booking Agency, Mr. Zukor, president of the Famous Players, said:

"For a long time we have been perplexed by the limitations of a definite four and five-reel program, which often militated against important subjects whose nature required longer and unusual treatment. The solution of this problem we found in the organization of a special booking agency for the distribution of a few selected subjects that were too long or expensive to be confined to the regular program. After these subjects have been booked in the theaters throughout the country that are equipped to house long-run, special attractions, they will be placed on the regular program, and when they are so released to the regular program exhibitors, they will possess a prestige similar to that which attaches to a theatrical production after a metropolitan run. The enormous cost of the forthcoming Mary Pickford releases make it imperative to distribute these subjects through the Select Film Booking Agency.

"The organization of this special attraction program will do more to enhance the dignity of the feature film, and the integrity of the industry at large than any other single or various steps ever before taken, as for the first time in the history of the motion picture business, it is absolutely and inseparably placed on the plane of legitimate theatrical offerings of the most serious type. The adoption of this policy will greatly dignify the public aspects of the trade, as it will now assume every iota of systematization associated with the business methods of the theater."

The mammoth film adaptation of Hall Caine's master-work, "The Eternal City," the first production to be distributed through the Select Film Booking Agency, has received unstinted praise from motion picture trade journals and daily newspapers throughout the country.

Coming as the crowning triumph of the Famous Players' producing activities, after three years of supreme leadership in feature production steadily maintained by this concern, and displaying to the utmost the transcendent genius of Edwin S. Porter, as a master of the higher principles of the silent art, it was accepted as peculiarly appropriate that the greatest distinction that was ever won by a subject filmed by American producers should accrue to the first concern in the world to present a regular feature program.

Final Episode $1,000,000 Mystery

The public which has so eagerly awaited the solution of "The Million Dollar Mystery," will have its curiosity satisfied on February 22, when the final episode (Number twenty-three) of "The Million Dollar Mystery" will be screened in theaters the country over. The entire Thanhouser cast which participated in the production of the long serial, appears again in this last installment, in which the story is finally completed. In addition pictures of the winner of the ten thousand dollar prize, together with the winner's identity, will be made known. Hundreds of exhibitors who showed the serial when it was being released, are clamoring for bookings on this final episode that solves the mystery.

The last scene in episode twenty-three of the "Million Dollar Mystery"

Owen Moore, having completed his work in the Elsie Janis pictures, will remain at the Bosworth-Morosco studios to appear with Fritzi Scheff in "Pretty Mrs. Smith."

Film Story Treats of Husband's Problem

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

THE unique situation of a man who realizes that he is too old for his wife and regrets, for her sake, having married her, but flies into a rage when he thinks that another is paying her attentions furnishes the theme for "Her Husband's Son," a two-reel Edison picture to be released February 19. In bare plot outline the story does not seem to be more than a single-reel subject, but under Director Brabin's treatment it not only reaches two reels in length, but does so without sacrificing quality, strength, or punch.

There are but three principals in the cast, and the pleasing manner in which they carry their parts, attempting nothing highly dramatic or startling, but just doing the little every day things of life under a characterization, speaks strongly for their personality and ability. The most difficult role falls to Robert Conness who is seen as the widower, Robert Willard. Gertrude McCoy takes the lead opposite him as "the girl across the street," Dorothy Druce. Robert Willard, Jr., college student, good fellow, and spendthrift, finds an able impersonator in Harry Beaumont. The photography, settings, and general handling of the picture are deserving of much praise.

On her deathbed Mrs. Willard reminds her husband of his obligations to their son, Robert, who is studying in college in a distant city. Willard promises to fulfill his duties, and it is his remembrance of this, often, that prompts him to comply with his son's requests for money with which to pay his gambling debts when his sterner sense of discipline tells him that he ought to cut off the boy's allowance unless he mends his ways.

As time goes on Willard's lonely existence becomes irksome, and he begins to long for company. Often when Dorothy Druce, who lives across the street, is entertaining he takes a position at the window listening to the young people play or sing, or watching them dance, and wishes that he could mingle with them. One night while he is thus occupied Dorothy is ushered in. With almost school-girl confusion and many blushes she invites him over to take part in the gaieties. His wish gratified at last, he remonstrates and pleads to be excused, but to no avail. Dorothy hushes his muttered complaints, hurries him into his coat, and in a few moments he is one of a whirling group of dancers in the house across the street.

Willard's affection for the generous, wholesome girl grows into love, and leads him to declare himself to her. Dorothy has always admired his engaging personality, strength of character, and clean-cut appearance, and for these reasons discounts the difference in their ages and accepts his proposal. When young Robert, who is home for a time on a vacation, is informed of his father's intentions he becomes angry, denounces his father for having forgotten his first wife so soon, and refuses to recognize Dorothy as his stepmother.

After the marriage Willard is troubled by the realization that he is too old for the girl, and, although she seems happy and showers attentions upon him, he notices that her greatest delight is in mixing in company of her own age. In spite of his father's warnings,

Robert continues to gamble. Willard determines to put a stop to it, and answers a recent request for more funds with a curt refusal. Dorothy slips a note into the letter before mailing it, promising to send Robert the money if he will notify her how or where to send it.

She receives an unsigned letter from him in reply, saying that he will meet her secretly. Willard becomes suspicious on her refusing to show him the letter and later, finding it on the floor, decides to be present at the meeting. Seeing his wife and a man embrace he shoots. Robert, only slightly wounded, is carried into the house. Willard repents his rashness, and begs forgiveness of his wife and son. The latter is loud in his praise of Dorothy, and the fade-out shows a happy and thankful trio in one embrace.

Hesser Heads New Company

Edwin Bower Hesser, who has been well known for years in filmdom, is to be the president of the new Hesser Motion Picture Corporation, capitalized at $50,000.00, which will have offices at 1600 Broadway.

Mr. Hesser, although still a young man, has had many years of experience in filmdom. He first came into prominence as general press representative of the Kinemacolor Company of America for which he handled the nation-wide publicity campaigns of the successful "Coronation in Kinemacolor," and "The Durbar in Kinemacolor." Independently he has given several seasons of Grand Opera, and produced several successful plays, beside controlling over thirty theaters in Canada as managing director of the Maritime Booking Association. Essentially a newspaper man, he gave up short story writing three years ago, and attained immediate standing as a photo play writer. Many of his scenarios have been produced both in this country and abroad. The object of the new corporation is to produce Mr. Hesser's own scenarios under his personal supervision. With his intimate knowledge of marketing conditions, and the essentials of making feature film productions profitable, Mr. Hesser should make his company a good proposition. To a representative of this paper he made the following statement:

"For months I have been studying the market, and have come to the conclusion that only two general types of feature pictures can be successful—modern society dramas, and productions of essentially spectacular character. Productions of these types will be the only effort of the new corporation, which will start work on March 1.

"I am leaving today for the South, and will specially look over the scenic conditions in the region of Atlanta, Georgia, where we propose to make our first production, "The Royal Pretender," a five-reeler of exceedingly unusual theme. We have arranged for the use of certain military organizations in Georgia, and the staging of some big scenes in which 2,000 people will appear at one time. There is great interest being taken throughout the region because a portion of our capital comes from business men of that section.

"'Cleo' will be the second production, and we hope to start work on this in Bermuda on April 10. This is to be a spectacular picture in which the singular beauties of the islands will be displayed. There are only six principal players in this cast, but several hundred supernumeraries are necessary. All of our productions will be five-reelers.

"The policy of the Hesser Film Corporation will be to employ no regular stock company, but to engage players specially for each picture. Starting on a conservative basis, with real cash behind us, we plan to make only one production a month in the beginning."

Preparing American Serial

Out of the 9,846 scenarios submitted in the "$10,000 Prize Photoplay" contest, the judges have selected the winner. The identity of the successful competitor will be revealed in the newspapers in their Sunday issue of May 2.

The picture of the fortunate author will be shown in conjunction with the first release of the films which will be in theaters throughout the country Monday, May 3.

Instead of the first episode of the new serial consisting of two reels, an entire additional reel of 1000 feet will be devoted to the winner of the contest, displaying his or her picture, environment and an interesting human angle connected with the award of $10,000.

The judges who have selected the $10,000 prize winner are Miss Mae Tinee, editor of the "Right off the Reel" page of the Chicago Sunday Tribune, J. R. Freuler, first vice-president of the Mutual Film Corporation, and R. R. Nehls, Chicago manager for the American Film Manufacturing Company.

The scenarios came from every state in the union. Some of the best known authors in filmdom, as well as thousands of unknown moving picture fans entered the contest. Assistant judges were kept busy for weeks reviewing the scenarios submitted and classifying them for final inspection.

The new serial will be produced by the American Film Manufacturing Company in its studios at Santa Barbara, California, and Chicago, Illinois. S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Company is now in California personally directing the selection of the cast and all the plans for the production of the serial. In addition to the stars of the American Film Manufacturing Company, Mr. Hutchinson will procure some of the best known people in filmdom to appear in this continued picture.

The distribution of this gigantic serial will be under the personal direction of J. R. Freuler with headquarters in Chicago and New York and branch offices in every city of importance. The American Company will have the assistance of the Mutual Film Corporation's offices everywhere.

Exhibitors, independent of their program affiliations, will be able to book up this new serial. Preliminary applications for bookings are now being received by the American Film Manufacturing Company at its Chicago office, 6225 Broadway.

Kleine Makes New Comedy

Director Fitzmaurice of the Kleine studio at 11 East Fourteenth street, New York City, announces the completion of a new comedy entitled, "Who's Who in Society." The production features a number of well known players including Kate Sargeant, who has been identified with many of the big Broadway successes of recent years; Della Connor, Dan Moyles and others.

Fundamental Principles

WE have seen how the photographic negative is produced by the action of light on the extremely sensitive chemicals with which the "negative film-stock" is coated. Let us now examine the instruments which are in everyday use for "taking" the negative films of the pictures which everybody sees on the screen.

Motion picture cameras differ from ordinary cameras which use films, only in being fitted to take a much larger number of very small pictures in rapid and regular succession. This means that there must be some kind of mechanism to "feed" the film at a uniform rate of speed, and also to stop it at frequent intervals long enough to take a picture. For ordinarily it is necessary that everything about the camera be perfectly still while each picture is being taken, although the film is flying through at the rate of a foot per second. This is accomplished by using some kind of a "claw," like N, figure 13, to pull the film down intermittently.

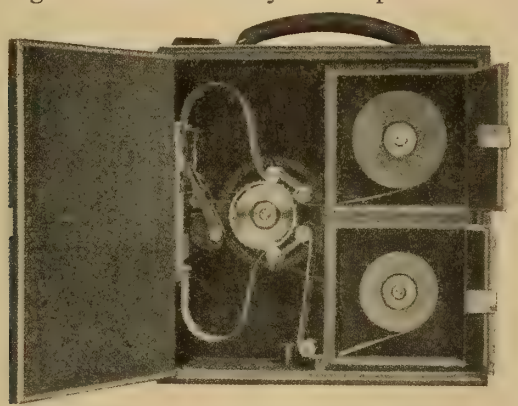

Fig. 12. Camera with "one sprocket feed."

Thus, while the camera-man turns the crank, the film is made to start and stop sixteen times each second, and each time it stops the lens is opened by the turning of the shutter, and just before it starts again, the dark part of the shutter comes opposite the lens, so that no light will strike the film while it is in motion.

The type of camera shown in figure 12, and as a sectional diagram in figure 13, is used mostly by amateurs, and sometimes by professionals where a very compact and portable outfit is desired, and when solidly mounted makes very good negatives. Extreme simplicity is its best quality, only one sprocket being required, and both magazines being inside the camera box.

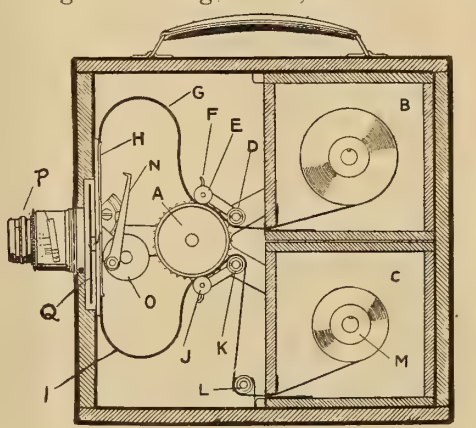

Fig. 13. Diagram of camera interior.

The sprocket, A, is turned directly by the handle, which is on the other side of the camera. The loaded film box, or magazine, B, is placed on top of the receiving magazine, C. The path the film takes, after leaving the top magazine, is under the fixed roller, D, then engaging with the teeth of the sprockekt under the spring roller, E, (which is lifted by the finger clip, F, while the film is being "threaded up"), forming the free "loop," G, then through the spring "gate" H, past the lens, P, forming another free loop, I; then back under the sprocket, A, being held in position by the spring roller, J, and the fixed roller, K, then under the fixed roller, L, through the velvet-lined slot into the receiving magazine, C, the end being made fast to the center bobbin, M. The claw, N, is shown in the "out" position, in which it must be put by turning the eccentric disc, O, before threading up the film. In figure 12 the claw is shown in the act of pulling down the film. In this diagram only the edge of the shutter, Q, is shown, it being of the type previously illustrated in figures 7, and 8.

The camera shown in figure 14 is a Pathe Professional. The magazine from which the film is drawn, and the one into which it is rewound appear to be arranged crosswise, outside and on top of the camera box. This arrangement permits the use of extra large magazines containing greater lengths of film than is possible with ordinary motion picture cameras like the one just described (figure 12), where the magazines are inside of the camera box.

The usual length of film in professional magazines is either 200 or 400 feet, or enough to last for somewhat over three minutes or six minutes, respectively, although some scenes are taken so slowly that 400 feet of film will last seven or eight minutes.

When taking scenes of considerable length, or of such a nature that it is uncertain just when they will end, or rather just where to make a good stopping place, it is customary to have two cameras side by side, so that one can be started just before the other runs out of film. In this way there need be no break at all in the record, as the two negatives can be joined to make a continuous story.

HOW TRICK PICTURES ARE MADE.

To the uninitiated, trick pictures are about the most wonderful thing in the world. And what indeed is more wonderful than to see flowers leaf and bloom in a few minutes that would require a whole season to grow and mature in the ordinary course of events. The matter-of-fact person to whom "seeing is believing" has had to change his philosophy quite a bit since he began taking in the "pics."

Pictures of growing flowers are made in a very simple manner. Suppose that it takes a tulip 30 days to bloom from the time the first green shoots break through the earth. Thirty times 24 hours equal 720 hours. Now suppose we desire to have a picture one minute long. There will be shown on the screen 16 pictures per second, which multiplied by 60 equals 960 pictures to the minute. Therefore in order to have a film showing the growth at a uniform rate with the actual growth of the plant we should make 960 exposures in 720 hours, or 1 1/3 pictures per hour, which means that every 45 minutes the shutter of the camera would be opened and a single exposure made.

But this is altogether too easy, and in practice it requires much more care than attaching an alarm clock to a camera. Let us consider the conditions. In the first place the natural rate of growth is not uniform enough to make a pleasing picture. Then, flowers need sunshine, which, unlike the alarm clock, is not at hand 24 hours of the day. This also upsets our camera plans, for the camera must have fairly uniform light for good results. So, as a matter of fact, during the above 30 day period exposures would be made every 10 or 15 minutes while the sun was shining or the plant growing fast, and much less frequently at other times, especially at night, when the necessity of artificial illumination complicates the problem.

Therefore while 960 exposures would be made during the 30 days, they would be made, not according to the actual growth rate of the plant, and not regularly according to the clock, but very carefully nevertheless, and just for the purpose of pleasing you, and making you gasp with astonishment as you view the living beauty on the screen.

Not only the time between exposures but the duration of each exposure must be varied. For if the light is good, as on a bright sunny day, the shutter and the lens must be opened less than on a dull day or late in the evening.

Most other trick pictures are made in the same general way, with modifications to suit the subject. For instance, in the picture where a pair of shoes travels about apparently unaccompanied, it is easy to imagine that in reality they were very much accompanied, and were most carefully placed in each of the thousands of positions, which when shown at the rate of a thousand per minute, convey to your mind the idea of smooth and independent motion.

You do not see the stage manager or director, nor the camera man nor the small crowd of hangers-on, who watched the original production as amusedly as you watch the reproduction on the screen, for the camera in good hands is very obliging, and only sees and records what is proper to be shown to you and the few million other people who will laugh at the blithesome antics of those most studiously placed shoes.

The black-board and other "lightning-artist" stunts are similarly made, and the hand that moves so quickly over the screen probably went very slowly and jerkily between the clicks of the camera. Likewise the animated letters that group themselves in myriad formations with such graceful speed and apparent ease, finally settling down into a "title," may be the outcome of many days of most arduous and painstaking labor. In fact, the strain upon the nerves of the geniuses who plan and carry out some of these wierd programs is great enough to drive them to the verge of insanity.

In figure 14 you will note a small black opening to the left and below the place where the crank is fastened to the box. It is through this opening that the crank is attached when trick pictures are to be made. Ordinarily the crank is turned twice per second, making eight exposures each time, but when trick pictures are made it is more convenient to make one exposure to each turn of the crank, hence the mechanism is so designed that it will move just one-eighth as fast when the crank is in "trick position."

Many other things can be done with a "professional" camera. The film can be run backwards, and then if the pictures are projected on the screen in the usual way, everything will seem to be going backwards. Divers will be seen coming out of the water feet first, etc., and in the case of the growing tulip, it would be seen to fold up its petals and shrink down into the earth.

DOUBLE EXPOSURES AND GHOST PICTURES.

Some cameras have a so-called "fade-away" attachment which permits two pictures to be taken on the same part of the film without doubling the time of exposure. This is accomplished by gradually closing the lens opening, and then, after the scene has been finished, turning the film back to the start (lens being capped meantime) and superimposing a different scene by gradually opening the lens while the already partly exposed film is run through again. Ghost pictures are readily made in this manner, for of course you can see the "ghost" and also see the things that were recorded on the negative before the ghost began to walk, and this gives the impression that you are looking right through the ghost.

In figure 15 is illustrated the kind of tripod which is used when panoramic pictures are taken, and also and more often when it is necessary to follow moving objects, as parades, automobiles, etc. The same figure also shows (in the upper right hand corner) an attachment known as a tilting top which may be placed directly on top of the panoram head by turning it so that the two handles will not interfere.

When using these devices it is customary to have the camera man's assistant operate the panoram and tilt. The need of this is very apparent from figure 16, where it will be seen that the operator would literally have his hands full with two, not to say three of the crank handles shown.

Lubin Produces "The District Attorney"

A DRAMA OF POLITICS

A PUBLIC official who "plays the game" from a high point of duty and honor against a gang of grafting politicians is the basis of "The District Attorney" one of the latest of the Lubin special features. This well known drama written by Charles Klein and Harrison Grey Fiske was adapted for the screen by Clay M. Greene and enacted by a special company of Lubin players under the direction of Barry O'Neil.

The play attracted wide interest on the legitimate stage because it depicted with such unswerving truth a phase of our American political life, familiar to almost everyone old enough to cast a vote, interwoven with the story of a woman's love and loyalty that was intensely interesting. As a photoplay "The District Attorney" has gained greatly in dramatic strength due to the wider latitude permitted screen plays and in its new form it should make a strong appeal to American audiences.

Matthews Brainerd (Charles Brandt), a wealthy contractor and the head of a gang of grafting politicians, with some of his henchmen, plan to fleece the city of $50,000. They persuade Frank Pierson (A. H. Van Buren) to stand trial for the crime, with the understanding that after serving a few months he will be pardoned and paid a large sum of money. Pierson, who needs the money in order that he may marry Helen Knight (Dorothy Bernard), becomes their stool pigeon and goes to the penitentiary. The politicians let him remain behind the bars for three years and refuse to help him.

Miss Knight, realizing her lover is innocent, begins a hard, uphill fight to have him freed. She eventually reaches the district attorney who was not only elected to office by the gang but is a son-in-law of Brainerd. The district attorney begins a fight to break the web woven by the crooked politicians and the latter do everything in their power to "get" the district attorney. It is a thrilling battle, filled with action and unexpected climaxes.

In the end the district attorney is successful. He smashes the web, has Pierson liberated and sends some of the crooks to jail and drives the others from the city. The strongest and best done scene in the play comes when the district attorney unexpectedly discovers, while conducting an investigation in his office, that his own father-in-law is the head and brains of the crooked politicians.

The crushed and broken boss pleads for mercy, but even his own daughter cannot bring herself to see him cleared at the expense of her husband's honor, and since Brainerd's death seems only a matter of a very short time, his arrest and trial are left for future consideration.

Money Problem Pursues "Runaway June"

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

IN each episode of the "Runaway June" series June becomes involved in a little domestic drama, the center of which is the question of money. Sometimes the trouble is caused by the wife's extravagance, sometimes, by the husband's, and sometimes, by his not allowing his wife enough money with which to manage the household. But whatever the cause, in June's mind it always resolves itself into a wrangle over money. It was the question of money that caused her to leave her husband, and she seems to be beset with the problem on all sides on getting out into the world.

The fourth episode of this Reliance serial is crowded with events, startling, humorous and pathetic, and introduces no less a personage that James Montgomery Flagg who presides over a hotel register and waves guests and baggage to elevators, doors, and seats as though he has been accustomed to playing in pictures for years. With the exception of a silk-hatted, gesticulative Frenchman, and a few extras, one of whom was shaken up for a week as a result of the realism injected into the hotel lobby fight, the cast remains the same.

The end of the third installment left Ned close to the trail of June and her Vandyked shadow, Blye. Ned sees Marie leave the boarding house with an armful of June's clothes, and follows her to the Hotel Daniel. Just previous to this June has entered the hotel, registered, and gone up to her room. Blye, who has followed her in, notices the name under which she registered, and loiters about the lobby for a while though he keeps one eye turned toward the door as if fearful lest some of June's friends may unexpectedly appear in search of her.

Blye follows June when she again seeks employment.

June happy in the Wiles' home.

Marie enters, inquires the number of June's room, and is about to go up in the elevator when she is overtaken by Ned. During the scene which follows Blye attempts to steal out into the street, but is seen by Ned, who follows. The man with the black Vandyke makes his escape on an elevated train, Ned being held up by the guard since the train has begun to move. Ned summons June's relatives, and they go to the Hotel Daniel, but are too late. June, warned by Marie, has gone to the home of Mrs. O'Keefe, the mother of one of the hotel's bellboys.

Mrs. Wiles engages June as a governess.

Mrs. Blye's detectives, over-zealous in their efforts to capture her husband, pounce upon every Vandyked man they see, causing a great deal of confusion and embarrassment. When they do come upon the real Blye he knocks them all down and escapes.

An employment agency to which she applies for work secures June a position as governess in the Wiles family. She becomes greatly attached to Dolly Wiles, her charge, and is thoroughly happy in her new position. One day while in the park she meets Blye, who offers her a ride in his car. To please Dolly she accepts, and Blye drives them about for an hour. He leaves them at the Wiles apartments, and makes a note of the address. The strain of his wife's extravagance proves too much for Mr. Wiles' resources, and he becomes bankrupt.

Blye accosts June on the street, but she pays no attention to him. He hails a taxi, precedes her to the employment agency, and issues a few instructions to the woman who seems to know him. When June enters the woman answers her request by giving her the address left by Blye. June departs, pursued by Blye.

New Comedy Producer

The World Comedy Stars Film Corporation, a one hundred thousand dollar concern, has just been formed with Phil. Gleichman, well known in the motion picture field, as the dominant figure. The aim of this new corporation is to manufacture and market one-reel comedies with famous stars of the legitimate and vaudeville stage in the leading roles. Contracts have already been signed with Jeff De Angelis, well known as having been the star in "The Beauty Shop," "Fantana," and many other Shubert successes; Lulu Glaser, another widely known star, who has appeared in "Erminie" with Francis Wilson; "Dolly Varden" and other successes too numerous to mention; Florence Tempest of the well known vaudeville team, Tempest and Sunshine; Katherine Osterman, who made a reputation for herself in "Piff Paff Pouff," "A Persian Garden." Edmund Lawrence, who has had an interesting and varied experience on the legtitimate stage as director, and was more recently with the Kalem Company, has been engaged as director; William W. Jefferson of the famous Jefferson family of actors is to be associate director.

The scenarios are to be written by Mark Swan, who has been engaged in turning out scenarios for the Edison Company and who is also a well known playwright for the legitimate stage.

The World Comedy Stars Film Corporation, according to the advice of Mr. Gleichman, is here to fill a place which, up to the present time, has been sadly neglected. These comedies with well known names, are to be released on a regular program.

Zukor on Mysterious Mission

Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players Film Company, left New York Monday on a trip to Los Angeles, where the western studios of the Famous Players Film Company are now situated, for a purpose said to be of the utmost importance to the trade in general and to the Famous Players Film Company particularly. What the real reason for the trip is cannot be definitely ascertained, but it has recently been commonly rumored in the trade that when the present European war terminated the Famous Players' plans of producing a series of important feature subjects in Europe, Mr. Zukor began active contemplation of continuing the foreign film invasion in countries not affected by the continental conflict.

Recently it became a matter of belief that the Famous Players Film Company was planning to produce a number of elaborate film subjects in Japan. The knowledge that the Famous Players possessed the film rights of "Madam Butterfly" strengthened this impression; and when Mary Pickford was sent to the Pacific Coast, it was generally theorized that she would go thence to Japan to begin work on the film version of this celebrated opera and play.

The fact that Mr. Zukor is expected to be away for a considerable period of time tends to the belief that his ultimate objective is a trip across the Pacific to the Orient.

Horsley Opens Bostock Arena

David Horsley's Bostock Arena and Jungle opened its gates in the heart of Los Angeles on Tuesday, January 26, to a capacity gathering that represented the finest element of the city.

Horsley Park as the exhibition place is called, is located at the corner of Main and Washington streets, and occupies a plot of ground 650x450 feet in extent. A substantial concrete wall, finished in California mission style, runs along the entire front, while a huge archway toward the lower end carries out the same scheme and forms at once the main entrance and executive offices. The interior arrangements are highly artistic and novel, the walks being laid out in Tropical Gardens and palm draped lanes, through which the elephants trudge about carrying loads of happy children on their backs. Then comes an immense semi-circle of dens, containing the animals that have gained fame and glory in every section of the globe. A concealed passageway at the back connects each den with the arena at the center, where the performances are held. This huge iron-barred enclosure fronts on a covered auditorium in which twelve hundred people can be comfortably seated to watch the exhibition of trained wild animals.

Big Addition to American Plant

The growing demand for films of the American and Beauty brands has necessitated extensive additions, not only to the Santa Barbara plant of the American Film Manufacturing Company, but also to the Chicago plant of the same concern.

Within the past week, MOTOGRAPHY was shown the plans of the new and enlarged plant of the American Film Manufacturing Company in Chicago, work on which will begin as soon as the frost is out of the ground this spring. The American Company has purchased the land running from the west end of the present plant clear out to Broadway, the adjoining street, and on this will erect a plant which will more than double the present capacity of the concern. On the ground floor of the new portion will be stores, while the whole second story will be devoted to private offices of the president, the manager and the factory superintendent. An extensive drying room will more than double the present drying capacity and there will be a de luxe projection room where the pictures may be inspected and shown to department heads or film reviewers of the various trade journals.

The present plant will be changed in innumerable ways, giving more room to all departments, and when completed will be one of the most completely equipped and handily arranged developing, printing and shipping plants in the United States.

Special Company to Release "The Clansman"

D. W. Griffith, the Mutual director, spent a few hours in Chicago on Tuesday, February 2, while on his way to the west coast. During his stay in the Windy City he said that "The Clansman" would be released by a special company and that it would be shown at the highest prices ever asked for a motion picture. All the details have not been arranged and Mr. Griffith hinted that he would soon be called East again.

He is to resume work at the Mutual studios and will put the finishing touches on another multiple reel subject to be about the same length as "The Avenging Conscience." Mr. Griffith is very enthusiastic over "The Clansman" and feels that it will receive a warm reception from motion picture patrons.

Miss May Allison has signed a long-term contract with the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company.

Dog Actor Displays Wonderful Skill

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

THOUGH the Pathe studio in which "The Exploits of Elaine" is being filmed has never been touted by the press agent as a menagerie or a zoo, one certainly has to admit after seeing episode six of the exciting Pathe serial, referred to above, that as a producer of animal pictures, Pathe is "a comer."

Elaine's collie, as a star is worthy to rank alongside Pearl White or Arnold Daly, for in the sixth episode it is the dog which succeeds in getting a clue to Elaine's whereabouts after all others have failed. When the deductive science of Craig Kennedy proves futile, when the suspicions and surmises of members of her own family as to her whereabouts prove totally inadequate, it is the dog which takes the center of the stage, and leads the friends of Elaine to the hiding place of the Clutching Hand, whither she has been carried.

Elaine is overpowered and kidnapped

This sixth episode is entitled "The Vampire" and opens in the home of Elaine, just after Kennedy has presented her with an automatic revolver and a permit from the mayor to carry same. That night an emissary of the Clutching Hand visits her boudoir on some evil purpose of his master's, is seen by Elaine as he comes through the window and made a target for her new revolver. The man falls off the window ledge to the court below, and is picked up by a waiting accomplice, put into an automobile and driven to the headquarters of the Clutching Hand.

Kennedy finds and saves Elaine

Upon examination, the man is found to be so badly wounded, that the Clutching Hand summons Doctor Martin, a famous surgeon

Upon his arrival the great physician declares that the man will surely die from loss of blood, his wound being so extremely dangerous that an operation would have no chance for successs, unless saved by the operation called the transfusion of blood, in which it is evident that the other party to the transfusion may himself die from losing too much blood.

Elaine shoots the intruder

The Clutching Hand thereupon sees an opportunity of killing two birds with one stone, that is, to save his tool's life and destroy that of Elaine. He sends two accomplices to Elaine's home, chloroforms her, and confines her within a suit of armor which stands in the reception room of her own home. The next morning an expressman is sent for this suit of armor, which has been damaged and orders for repairing which have been given, and thus the helpless Elaine is boldly kidnapped in broad daylight, and taken to the Clutching Hand's abode. There her arm is bared, strapped to that of the wounded man, and the great doctor prepares to perform the critical operation.

Meanwhile, Kennedy and Elaine's family are panic stricken over the girl's disappearance, but the collie which has followed the trail of the expressman, finally leads them to the hiding place of the Clutching Hand. Police are summoned and they batter in the door just in time to see the Clutching Hand disappear through a sliding panel in the wall. Kennedy orders the operation stopped, and thus saves the life of Elaine, though the desperado breathes his last almost immediately afterwards.

The art gates of the new million-dollar Jungle-Zoo, built by W. N. Selig at Los Angeles, Calif., were decorated by Sculptor Carlo Romanelli, of Florence, Italy.

Helen Leslie, the new Universal star, does some splendid acting in the Rex production, "Wolves of Society."

Irene Wallace Joins Selig Forces

Miss Irene Wallace has joined the Selig forces in Chicago to play leads with the company there. Later Mr. Selig has promised her that she may go to California with his company on the coast, where she has never been and which it has been the height of her ambition to visit. Strange as it may seem, Miss Wallace has never found it possible to visit the coast, though her professional duties have taken her West. Ever since she was a child she has been on the point of having her desire gratified, but always something prevented. When she was one of May Wards' Animated Dollies, and that was when she was less than ten, her vaudeville tour took her to San Francisco, but a switch in bookings at the last moment kept her from going to the Golden Gate city. Miss Wallace has spent her entire life in some form of stage activity and is one of the best known actresses in three branches of the profession, though she is one of the youngest film stars. Her greatest triumphs on the screen have been with the Universal, where she played Trubus' daughter in "Traffic In Souls," Esther in "Jewish Freedom Under King Casimir of Poland" and many other important roles. Equally as good in comedy and drama, Miss Wallace has had the opportunity to play a much wider repertoire than most actresses and for that reason is an extremely useful member of any company. In several films she made a wonderful hit in boy parts, as she did when on the legitimate stage.

Cast for "The High Hand"

"The High Hand" a five-part photoplay from the novel by Jacques Frutelle, produced by the Favorite Players is now nearing completion at the studio in Los Angeles. Carlyle Blackwell enacts the leading part of Jim Warren of Warborten, a mill hand, who successfully works his way up to the governorship of the state. Edna Tillinghast, the heroine of the story, is the character enacted by Neva Gerber. William Brunton, as Big Tom Simmonds, a saloonkeeper, and Douglas Gerrard, as Francis Everard Lewis, the political state boss, fight Jim Warren tooth and nail for the possession of the political machine of the state. John Sheehan, as Franques, secretary to Lewis, enacts the part of the go-between, who double crosses Lewis, and unsuccessfully tries to do the same thing to Jim Warren. The story abounds in excellent action, and the machinations of the political intriguers form an excellent background for the clear cut delineation of sterling manhood portrayed by Carlyle Blackwell, as Jim Warren.

Much Terrtoriy Sold

That features of quality will sell on a state rights basis and that this plan of distribution is not a thing of the past has been proven by Harry R. Raver's experience with Itala's new four-act drama, "The Treasure of the Louzats." New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, District of Columbia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, Louisiana, Alabama, Florida, Arkansas, Texas, Oklahoma, Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, were disposed of immediately following Mr. Raver's first announcement and the balance of the United States territory is now under negotiation with prospects of closing within the next few days.

Notwithstanding the fact that Itala films are popular and that stars of "Cabiria" are being used in the new releases, it would seem by this record that state rights are not dead.

"The Firing Line"

Under the name The Firing Line, a new weekly house organ of the World Film Corporation makes its debut under the date of February 1. Volume 1, No. 1 of the four page pamphlet contains an introductory announcement by Lewis J. Selznick, vice president and general manager, on its first page, and a ginger talk to salesmen by C. R. Seelye, director of sales, on page three. Announcement is made of the first award under the profit sharing plan recently inaugurated by the concern, the first prize of $100 being awarded to R. H. Fox of the Chicago office, while Messrs. Lamb and Sobel of the New York office win second and third places and prizes of $50 and $25. Motography extends congratulations on the snappiness of the first issue of the new publication and has no doubt but that it will be widely read.

New Power Catalog

The Nicholas Power Company has just mailed out a new 52-page catalog, compiled by Mr. Barry of that company. The catalog is very complete and covers every machine and machine part made by the Nicholas Power Company in detail, with considerable instructive description, which exhibitors will find very valuable.

The Power company also includes several pages on rheostats, carbon savers, arc lamps, lamp houses, stereopticons, lenses, etc., together with minor accessories, which, bearing the Power trade mark, may be considered as of the same high quality as the machines which this company has been placing before exhibitors for years.

California Star Again Well

After spending three weeks in a sanitarium, recovering from injuries received while playing the title role of Bret Harte's California heroine, "Salomy Jane," Beatriz Michelena, the beautiful prima donna, starring with the California Motion Picture Corporation, is back with her company again, taking the title role in another Bret Harte film romance, "The Lily of Poverty Flat." Many of the scenes in this engaging screen drama are being photographed in the heart of the far-famed Santa Cruz redwoods, where some of the largest sequoias in the world are to be found.

"Justified," a Heart Interest Story

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

"JUSTIFIED," the two-reel American feature announced for release on February 8, is a story of the West in which such popular favorites as Ed Coxen, Winnifred Greenwood and George Field are featured. The story contains enough real heart interest to interest and enthuse the average theater patron, and yet is marked by action enough to satisfy the picture fan who insists on a stirring story as well as a beautifully photographed and well acted one.

The rainstorm effect seen in the first reel is so realistic that it is worthy of special comment, for it is seldom indeed that so natural a rainstorm is noted on the screen. One's wonder grows, when he realizes, that, of course, the picture was filmed on a bright clear day, and that the rainstorm is only an "effect," though this, of course, all the more entitles the producer to praise.

Ed Coxen is seen in the role of Tom Allen, an industrious miner, who is happy with his young wife, but inclined to be jealous when he finds her in conversation with Joe Hill, a shiftless rascal, who covets the results of Tom's industry, but is too lazy to work for it.

Returning one day from his claim, Tom surprises his wife in conversation again with Hill, and after ordering Hill away, tell his wife that unless she refuses to see the man again, he will suspect that she is in love with him.

Hill, angered by Tom's ordering him off the premises, feels revengeful, and creeps back to peer through the window of the cabin, and thus discovers where Tom keeps his nuggets hidden in a closet.

Following Tom's departure from home one evening, Hill creeps up to the lonely cabin, and entering through the open window is about to make away with the nuggets stored away by Tom, when Mrs. Allen surprises him by entering to secure some sewing she has put away. Mrs. Allen comes face to face with Hill, and while she is trying to discover the reason for his being there, Tom returns unexpectedly, finds them together and believes the worst. Hill, as an excuse for his presence in the house, declares that he is there as Mrs. Allen's lover, and though the wife vehemently denies this assertion, Tom drives her out into the storm which has just begun to rage.

Tom meets his wife and child after many years.

All night she wanders over the hills in the pouring rain, and when the morning dawns, is picked up, exhausted, miles from home and cared for by a friendly prospector, who takes her to a distant settlement where she manages to eke out a living until after her child is born.

Tom, following her departure the night of the storm, has relented and gone forth to seek her, but is unable to find her. Returning home again, he discovers the nuggets to be missing, and then realizes for the first time that Hill had lied in explaining his mission to the cabin. The sewing of his wife, found in the clothes closet, opens Tom's eyes to the fact that a child is expected, and this more than ever convinces him of his sad mistake.

Five years later, Tom recognizes Hill in a saloon, and, in order to make certain that he is not mistaken, sits into a card game at which Hill is dealing. The men quarrel ere the game has progressed very far, and Tom is wounded in the arm, but draws his revolver and shoots Hill before he can escape. Tom then flees and takes refuge in a barn where he is discovered by a little lad, who informs his mother that a strange man has entered the barn. The mother goes to investigate, and Tom and his wife are again brought face to face, for the mother is Mrs. Allen, and the child, Tom's own son. The sheriff later arrives and arrests Tom, and after a trial the latter is declared justified in the shooting since he had drawn his weapon in self-defense.

The nuggets, Tom found, were gone.

Tom surprises his wife with Hill.

Going to Columbus?

Ohio exhibitors are this week receiving a final appeal to attend the Columbus Convention on February 9 and 10, and it is expected this gathering will put up a last ditch fight against the pending oppressive legislation in Ohio, which threatens to ruin the motion picture industry in that state, and will make an unusually strong effort to abolish or repeal the present Ohio censor law.

A committee consisting of Sam Bullock, Chairman, S. E. Morris, F. M. Kenney, Emery N. Downs, W. J. Slimm and Ernest Schwartz sign the call for the convention, and also the following appeal which is being sent to every exhibitor on record in the state of Ohio.

Last spring, we conducted a mail referendum vote among the exhibitors of Ohio for the repeal of the Ohio Censor Law.

In July last we followed the recommendations of the National Convention at Dayton and again re-organized as Cleveland Local No. 1, inasmuch as the Ohio Censor Law and its sponsors were repudiated at that convention.

We are battling hard to wipe that infamous piece of legislative graft from the statutes and with your help and vote can repeal the bill. Without it we cannot succeed. It is your business as much as ours. Will you do your part and come to the Columbus open Convention on Feb. 9 and 10? The legislature will be in session. There are half-a-dozen "propositions" from the "common enemy" that will cost you dearly if you fail to come and help. Cleveland cannot fight this battle alone. Read the trade papers for details and come.

Cleveland has no "slate" for election of officers, but will lend its strength to "put none but anti-censor men on guard."

If we kill legalized censorship the politicians will let us alone on everything else. A percentage tax on your gross receipts is threatened. Can you stand it? You had to stand the war tax.

"The Adventures of a Boy Scout"

On February 3 the World Film Corporation released a five-reel picture entitled "The Adventures of a Boy Scout" that is a direct and convincing appeal for the promotion of the Boy Scout movement, and contains a good story and plenty of interesting action besides. The initiative of embodying the theory and practice of the boy scout propaganda is due to R. Dinwiddie, a well known writer. Campbell McCullough, a government official, was commissioned to write a story of heart interest which was passed upon by the boy scout authorities, and then produced by the National Movement Motion Picture Bureau, Inc., of which Alec Lorimore is president.

Edwin Warren directed the picture, obtaining a company of boy scouts to play in it, and working a touching story of boyish affection and chivalry into their daily routine. It deals with the welfare of Tom Slade, who is left to shift for himself by his worthless father. Tom scoffs at the neat-looking and orderly boy scouts until he comes to realize that they are just as manly as he, but are without the air of bravado and the inclination for mischief which rules him. Later Tom becomes a scout and is proud of the fact. In time John Temple and his son Wilfred are converted to the movement, and its influence even reaches Tom's father, causing him to reform. C. R. Kinetophote's Good "Villain"

"Heavies," that is, good "heavies," are not so common that they can be picked up anywhere and Edward Mackay, who directed "The Span of Life" for the Kinetophote, is congratulating himself on the work of Lyster Chambers, who was picked for the villain in the late Sutton Vane's famous melodrama. Mr. Chambers had never played in a picture before, although he had been on the stage for twelve years, and his excellent characterization of the role of Dunstan Leech was like that of a veteran of pictured drama. Mr. Chambers is an American actor who has played with Rose Coughlin, Willie Collier, and other well known stage stars. His appearance with Mme. Kalish as leading man will long be remembered by admirers of that noted stage woman and her supporting companies. Still later, Mr. Chambers found success in the part of Leland in "Deep Purple." He has also had considerable experience in stock companies. Mr. Chambers found a character well within his art in "The Span of Life," and it is very probable that he will be found in other pictures. He likes the work and seems particularly adapted to it.

Carl Ray Now a Producer

Carl Ray, one of the best known motion picture exhibitors in the country, has incorporated the Carl Ray Motion Picture Company of 931 S. New Hampshire Street, Los Angeles, California, and is even now at work on the first six-reel motion picture, which is to be an animal production, and in which Big Otto is to have a share. It is expected the first release will be known as "The Vengeance of the Wilds," in which Charles Wheelock, who has been with both the Lubin and Selig concerns, and more recently in the Mission play, staged in California, will be featured.

Mr. Ray has not yet definitely decided on his releasing medium, but it is understood he is in receipt of many letters and telegrams from various concerns offering him flattering inducements to release his features through their program. After the definite arrangements have been made, the readers of Motography will be advised as to how the picture can be secured, and from whom it may be booked. Certainly Mr. Ray's many friends unite with Motography in wishing him success in his new undertaking.

A Pair of Essanay Two Reel Subjects

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

ESSANAY'S two-reel release of February 19, entitled "An Amateur Prodigal," based upon the short story by Albert Payson Terhune which appeared in Short Stories magazine, presents an interesting situation in a pleasing manner.

One thing of special importance was noted by the reviewer in the film and that was the fact that the name of a real city was used instead of giving a misty suggestion as to the locale of the story. There has been more or less discussion about stating actual locations on the screen but it seems that the logical thing to do is to say that the action transpired in a certain city, Cleveland, O., in this instance, for it proves more satisfying to one who views the film. There is, of course, the question of accurate settings but where no special part of Cleveland, merely a residence district is called for, it can easily be made plausible. It appears to be the policy of Essanay to use the names of actual cities wherever possible and it is safe to say this will meet with public approval.

To get back to the film, however, the photography is clear throughout and the settings well chosen. Joseph Byron Totten appears as the millionaire hero, Ruth Stonehouse as the girl, Lester Cuneo as the worthless brother of the girl and Helen Dunbar as her mother. The early part of the story is thoroughly enjoyable but the climax appears to be hurried. It is an offering which will, doubtless, prove acceptable in the majority of houses.

The story of the film opens when John Andrews, a wealthy young clubman, returns to his apartment one night and finds a man under the bed. After a struggle he throws him out. Returning to the room he finds an opened envelope addressed to John Andrews, Superior apartments, Cleveland, O. He does not remember opening any such letter, but this is his name and address, so he reads the note. It is signed "Your sister Ruth." It tells that his mother is now totally blind and can do nothing but sit and remember and pray for his return.

Andrews is still more puzzled when he receives more letters to the same effect, begging him to come to his dying mother. After some hesitation he decides to carry out the adventure, so goes to the small town in response to the letters. He is greeted with open arms by the girl who had been signing her name "Sister Ruth," and is ushered to the bedside of an old lady, who throws her arms about him after being told that he is her son. She dies, happy that her boy had returned to her.

Years before, a John Andrews, her son, had been sent to prison. His last address was Superior apartments, Cleveland. Most of the letters fell into the hands of a different John Andrews at the same address. While the adventurer is at the Andrews home, the real son arrives and the millionaire recognizes the man he found in his apartment. He gives the ex-convict money to get out of town, confesses to Ruth that he is not her brother and asks her to marry him. She has fallen in love with him and consents.

Charles Chaplin in "His New Job"

IN "HIS NEW JOB" Charles Chaplin makes his debut as an Essanay star. The film was released on Monday, February 1, and is two reels in length.

All the familiar Chaplin antics, made famous when

The release of the real son in "An Amateur Prodigal"

The millionaire poses as the son in "An Amateur Prodigal" he was with the Keystone Company, are again to be witnessed in this Essanay burlesque drama.

Charles is employed by a motion picture concern, after many laughable adventures with other applicants, and when one of the stars is missing from the studio, one day, he gets a chance to show what he can do.

His awkwardness results in spoiling many feet of film and causing no little commotion in the studio. The director finally loses his patience and sends Chaplin back to his first job, that of a stage carpenter. Besides Mr. Chaplin himself such Essanay comedians as Leo White and Ben Turpin are to be seen in the picture which has been eagerly awaited by exhibitors the country over.

Reel Fellows' Activities

Plans are practically completed for the Reel Fellows' Ball, which is to be held at the Hotel Sherman on the evening of February 22, and from present indications this will be one of the most elaborate and largely attended affairs that has ever been given by representatives of the film industry in Chicago.

The regular February meeting of the Reel Fellows' Club of Chicago will be held in the Italian room of the Hotel Sherman on the evening of February 17, this meeting will be doubly interesting, as ladies' night, and all members of the club are cordially invited to be present with their wives, sweethearts or friends. At this time it is expected Mr. Zeck, cameraman of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, will discuss cameras and their operation, while an additional feature will be the projection of a picture taken at the January meeting of the club when everyone present participated in the film, directed by Harry Webster, with the camera in charge of Daniel Webster McKinney. Elaborate precautions are being taken to prohibit any film magnates or their representatives being present, lest some of the club members display such talent as actors, that they would be snapped up and starred in multiple reel productions, much to the detriment of their present employers.

Far East Shown in Films

Three reels of interesting educational films were shown to the trade press on January 28 in the Fulton exhibition rooms, Chicago, by the United Photoplays Company. The pictures were taken in the Orient by Dr. George A. Dorsey, head of the Field Museum of that city and will attract much attention because of their sharp photography and the unique subjects which are depicted.

Manchuria as it is today was the subject of one of the reels and Nara, Japan, with its beautiful landscapes, occupied another thousand feet. The most interesting of all, however, was the reel devoted to the whaling industry off the coast of Japan. A whaling crew are seen landing a whale and later the entire fishing village is seen cutting it up. C.J.C.

Barker's World Picture Stories

Edwin L. Barker, who has been in charge of the International Harvester Company's Service Bureau, and P. W. Swan, who was Mr. Barker's first assistant in the same organization, have united in what is now known as the Barker-Swan Service, located in the Peoples Gas Building, Chicago, and have taken over the Agricultural Extension Department of the International Harvester Company.

Mr. Barker has purchased from the International Harvester Company, its three entertainments in the form of motion pictures, colored views, etc., and has changed the name from "International Industrialogs" to Barker's World Picture Stories. It is the intention to add from time to time, educational pictures of a similar character and to circulate industrial, educational, health and civic lectures, motion picture slides, booklets, etc.

Miss Ethel Hopp Killed

Film circles of Chicago were grieved to hear that Miss Ethel Hopp, the twenty-one year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Hopp of 454 Wrightwood avenue, Chicago, was killed in an auto collision one day last week, when riding in a limousine with her mother and sister, Miss Pearl Hopp. Mrs. Hopp, with her two daughters, was en route downtown to meet her husband, Joseph Hopp, who is president of the Union Film Company, and just as the car swung out of Wrightwood avenue, a heavy touring car speeding down Lakeview avenue collided with it, though the drivers of both machines are said to have striven desperately to avoid the collision. Miss Ethel Hopp was thrown through the window of the car in which she was seated, and struck the pavement with such force as to be rendered unconscious. Though hurried immediately to a hospital, she died within an hour afterwards. Many well known in the industry were present at the funeral services and the sincere sympathy of all in the trade is extended to the Hopp family in their bereavement.

Nifty Little House Organ

The February issue of the California Motion Picture Review, house organ of the California Motion Picture Corporation, has been received, and contains a number of interesting items, that not only tell of the activities of the California Motion Corporation, but also relate to the motion picture industry, as a whole.

On the eighth page of the booklet is a halftone showing the covers of three widely circulated magazines, all of which utilized as a cover subject the portrait of Miss Beatriz Michelena, the star of the California Motion Picture Corporation, in various poses. Among the trio, is shown the cover of the December 12 issue of Motography, which carried Miss Michelena's picture as a cover in two colors. The California people are to be congratulated on the excellent little house organ they are issuing.

Wrestling Champion Signed by Selig

The Selig Polyscope Company has contracted with Frank Gotch, the world's champion wrestler, for his appearance before a motion picture camera, in three wrestling bouts and arrangements have been made for the trying out of the big wrestlers preparatory to their appearance with Gotch in the genuine contest before the camera.

These pictures which will be called the Selig Physical Culture Series, will be ready for release within a short time, the first public showing to be made the first week in April.

Diamond Mine Heiress Imprisoned

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

IN the twelfth episode of "The $20,000,000 Mystery," one is taken from the Zudora diamond mine in South Africa to the home of Madam Duval, the woman of mystery, and its meeting place of the conspirators, not to mention the innumerable side trips to such places as the old structure, in the basement of which is a tunnel which leads to the home of Madam Duval; the offices of detective Hunt, where Zudora and her friends are planning her defense; and the quiet residence in which Zudora now resides.

Zudora finds a new friend in Howard, the superintendent of the Zudora mine in Africa, for when Howard learns that Zudora is being robbed by the conspirators, who have concealed from her the fact that she is the heiress to all the wealth of the amazingly rich diamond mine discovered by her father, he promptly decides that he will inform her of the real situation, and aid her in every way possible to secure her just deserts. The story, therefore, resolves itself into a battle of wits between Madam Duval, Captain Radcliffe and their desperate band on one side, and Zudora, Detective Hunt, Jim Baird, John Storm, and, now, Howard on the other side.

As the story begins on the screen, one is shown the Zudora mine in South Africa, and sees Howard,

The loss of the gems is discovered the superintendent, receive a message from the conspirators urging him to start immediately for America with such diamonds as are then on hand, while the same hour sees him receive a message from John Storm, Zudora's attorney, in which an appeal is made for the superintendent to aid the girl in getting her rightful dues.

Howard starts for America with the intention of not only delivering the diamonds to the conspirators, as ordered, but also seeing that Zudora is informed of her wealth, and her right to a share, at least, in the profits of her mine.

He is welcomed upon his arrival by the members of the band and taken to Madam Duval's through the underground tunnel that has its beginning in an apparently deserted building some distance away. The uncut diamonds he removes from his traveling bag and delivers to Madam Duval, who hides them away, but the conspirators follow him to his hotel and learn his intention of communicating with Zudora.

After his departure, Madam Duval sends three members of the band with the uncut stones to the diamond cutters and enroute they stop at a corner saloon to quench their thirst. Jim Baird, who has been shadowing the house, sees them leave and follows them to the saloon, and by means of a side entrance and a door opening into a back room of the saloon in which the messengers are seated, Jim manages to obtain the grip-sack containing the jewels by skillfully hooking his cane through the handle and jerking it out into the hallway, without their knowledge. He hastens away to turn the jewels over to Zudora, and explains to both her and Hunt how he secured them.

Meanwhile, the loss of the grip-sack is discovered and when the messengers who were entrusted with the gems report again to Madam Duval and Captain Radcliffe, Radcliffe severely punishes them for their carelessness and sets about securing the missing gems.

Believing that Howard has aided Zudora in securing them, Radcliffe orders one of his band to shadow Howard and overpower him. Bound and helpless, he is hurled into an automobile and taken to a private mad house where he is left for safe keeping with the superintendent, who is told that he is violently insane.

Suspecting that the gems have reached Zudora, Captain Radcliffe hastens to Zudora's home, and there institutes a search for the jewels, but does not find them, since Zudora and Jim have hidden them in the false bottom of a flower pot that stands on the library table.

Radcliffe makes noise enough in his search to arouse Zudora, and when she appears on the scene, he promptly seizes her and after binding and gagging her, takes her through a window, down a ladder, and conveys her in an automobile to the same private mad house in which his other victim has been confined.

Edgar Selwyn and Margaret Mayo's Debut

Samuel Goldfish announces that Edgar Selwyn and his equally distinguished wife, Margaret Mayo, have agreed to make their first screen appearances under the management of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company. This will all take place in connection with the picturization of Mr. Selwyn's own very famous and successful play, "The Arab," in which he was himself the star during its original engagement in New York at the Lyceum theater. Mr. Selwyn, it is now officially announced, will interpret for the screen the same stellar role which he created for the stage. Mr. Selwyn and Miss Mayo, who is known as the author of such hits as "Baby Mine" and "Twin Beds," will start West for the Lasky studio in Hollywood, California, within the next few days. Though the picture version of "The Arab," is not to be released until late in the spring, because of the many preceding productions already announced and scheduled for release, Mr. Selwyn is anxious to get to Califronia in time to see the finishing touches put on the Lasky picturization of his noted play, "The Country Boy," which is to be released on March 18.

"Uncle Sam at Work"

What is really a big understaking is the six-reel governmental picture entitled, "Uncle Sam at Work." It has just been completed and the sample print has been sent to Washington for the inspection of the government officials. As an individual undertaking it is unique, being the first attempt to thoroughly cover the entire workings of the United States government in motion pictures.

The entire expense of this film was borne by Henry W. Savage, the well known theatrical producer. Incidentally this is the first active participation in motion picture work by Mr. Savage. Some of his play property has been produced in pictures and he may have more or less financial interest in the films, but in this governmental picture he has given it his personal attention, spending much of his time both at Washington and at the production plant.

"Uncle Sam at Work" will not be put out as a photoplay for popular amusement; at least not for some time. It is the intention of Col. Savage to exploit it as a high-class lecture attraction.

You'll Laugh at "Old Dutch"

A laughing evening was that of Feb. 3 for those who attended the invitation showing of "Old Dutch," the Lew Fields comedy to be released by the World Film Corporation on Feb. 7. The cast is excellent and well selected, (Vivian Martin is the feminine lead), the settings, rich, and realistic, the comedy very much so, without classifying at all as slap-stick, the direction, which is that of Frank Crane, is especially fine and Lew Fields, in his sevenfold role of inventor, hostler, porter, boot-black, soda fountain clerk, barber and head-waiter, makes his every minute on the screen one of telling humor.

Lew Fields and Charles Judels in scene from World Film's "Old Dutch."

"Maybe" Lew Fields doubted, speaking to a representative of Motography during an intermission, "maybe, there's too much drama in it. But I hope the people will like it." Judging from the way those of Sunday night received it, they will.

The sub-titles may be given credit for many of the laughs. For instance, "Every day has its dog," "Will you have a Nutty Sunday or an Ash Wednesday?" "Never thought I would be chamber-maid to a horse!" an exclamation of Field's as he hangs his hat on the horse's hip-bone and picks at the animal's ribs in imitation of a mandolin player, were some of the laugh-makers.

There's humor in plenty in "Old Dutch" and its future as a screen success seems assured.

Marston Becomes Selig Director

Lawrence Marston, one of the most experienced producers of big photoplays, arrived in Chicago this week and reported at the general offices of the Selig Polyscope Company. He will proceed at once to organize a strong company and will direct the productions of some of the pretentious Selig Diamond Specials to be filmed from the works of America's leading authors.

Are We Becoming Grumblers?

CITY exhibitors are becoming quite adept in discovering reasons why their business is bad. Some of them can give you an instant explanation of bad attendance any day in the week, in any kind of weather. Ask any of these gentlemen today the familiar American question, "How's business with you?" and he will reply, "Rotten the last few weeks. You see it's been a little too cold for them." Or maybe it has been too warm, or too wet, or too sloppy under foot; or the circus was in town, or the weather was too nice and folks wanted to stay outdoors, or times were hard and there was no small change.

Now all these things, and many others, are beyond the control of the exhibitor. So when business really is poor, it is a very simple matter to shift the responsibility on to Providence and adopt a philosophical air. And that doesn't make business any better.

A few years ago, when the pictures were still something of a novelty, not one exhibitor in twenty was ever heard to complain about business; or if he did, he set about finding the reason and changing the condition that caused it.

Pictures are no longer a novelty; but they are certainly more entertaining and more attractive today than they ever were. People are willing to pay higher prices for admission and to go oftener than they used to. Yet never in the brief history of the art have there been as many grumblers among exhibitors as a desultory canvass shows today.

It is the easiest thing in the world to fall into the habit of taking business as it comes, in fatalistic style—and under those conditions it generally comes badly. To devise explanations for bad business takes less mental effort than to devise cures for it. And once you get used to it, you can readily convince yourself that your explanation is the true one, and that nothing in the world would improve conditions until the weather, or something else, changes.

As a matter of fact, however, nothing is so sensitive and reacts so readily to persuasion as the public. If the "bad business" grumbler would only refuse to accept his own explanations and excuses, or realize that they neither explain nor excuse, he might win back some of his lost trade. It is the exhibitor's duty to himself and his industry to make his show more attractive and more interesting than moonlight strolls or home firesides or circuses or anything else under the sun. To admit that any other influence can keep the people away from your show is to admit that you are a poor salesman.

Don't admit it; and don't grumble about bad business. Study your show as carefully as you would any other business you expected to succeed in; and study the people in your neighborhood. With the right sort of application you find why business is rotten.

Producing Without a Scenario

JUST think, he directs his pictures without any scenario whatever! Makes 'em up right out of his head as he goes along! They say he often goes on the studio floor without having any idea of what he is going to do. It just seems to come to him. Isn't it wonderful?

It used to be, and probably still is, common for magazine editors to receive short stories and especially "poems" with a letter from the author explaining that he "dashed off" the little gem while waiting for his coffee to cool, or at some other odd moment. There are lots of these "dash off" writers; but the editors don't ever use their stuff. Most of it isn't worth the paper it is written on.

We would not go so far as to say that pictures produced without a scenario are no good; but they are certainly born under a handicap. The motion picture director who expects to produce anything worth its raw stock without a scenario has an infinitely bigger job on his hands than the writer who thinks he can "dash off" a hundred dollar story without ever putting any thought upon it. The director, besides his story, has a number of more or less temperamental and sometimes unruly human beings to manage, stage settings to prepare, properties to arrange. If he can carry all these things in his head simultaneously with the development of his impromptu story before the camera, he must come under the class commonly known as geniuses.

That there are motion picture producers who can actually do good work without a scenario we cannot deny, and do not want to. These can take care of themselves; we utter this warning merely because it seems to be the vogue just now among the newer and lesser directors to work as far as possible without a guide. No doubt every director of intelligence can produce something without a scenario; but obviously the result would be his poorest, and not his best. We take it that everyone feels impelled to do the very best work he is capable of, and to take advantage of every assistance in so doing. This is especially true where competition is so severe and continuous as it is in motion pcture producton.

One of the greatest of motion picture directors has asserted time and again that the story's the thing—the scenario is more important than even the producer. With that conviction, do you imagine he would be content to rely for his plot on a half-baked story extemporized as he went along? The really great director demands a well prepared scenario and sees that he gets it.

Training the Audience

NEXT to changing seats during the showing of a picture, perhaps the most annoying thing with which the patron of the motion picture theater has to contend is the talking and laughing of persons sitting near him. It seems strange that, where the ear plays no part whatever in the entertainment, the sound of a voice, even though it is muffled, should distract the mind almost completely from the entertainment but nearly everyone can recall occasions on which he has seen persons inclined to be aggressive change their seats or leave the theater because the man or woman sitting near them knew this thing or that about such and such a player, and was certain that the play which was being shown was going to end with the heroine in the hero's arms, after the villain had been thrown from the cliff, and because this wiseacre persisted in letting those near him know that he knew.

This unfortunate condition is a difficult one to correct, but some exhibitors have started on the right path by using slides requesting patrons to refrain from noise-making during the showing of the films. In one or two theaters in Chicago a film is often stopped and the sign thrown on, this being done rather for a crying baby than for conversation, for the former annoys only those near the pest, while the latter disturbs the whole house.

Ushers pacing up and down the aisles formerly was considered quite the thing, but this is of as much annoyance to those seated on the side of a small theater as are the other disturbances, for the usher is always obstructing some person's view of the screen. Of course, if the noise continues after the slide has been flashed on the screen, it then becomes the duty of the usher or manager to personally request the disturber to cease. The examples cited above are only a few of the questions pertaining to handling the audience which often puzzle the manager who seeks to make his house a place of comfort for all who attend and, while there are many ways of getting the desired results, an appeal to the audience, via the screen, to do all in its power to make the show enjoyable for the others in attendance will probably prove as successful a means as any other which may be employed.

Just A Moment Please

Ben Schulberg's steno, though usually a vurra, vurra good girl, offended this week by sending us a press sheet referring to the new Select Film Booking Agency as a "special hooking agency." On second thought, though, she may have some inside information and so be right, after all.

Byron (whoever he is) in the American Photoplay Weekly, published by the Liberty Theater Company of Salt Lake City, Utah, will win the everlasting gratitude of a host of scenario bugs by his verse, which reads:

Ba, ba, black sheep, have you any plots?
Yes, sir; yes, sir, several hot shots.
One is a joke, and another is a steal—
Expect 'twill be filmed as a multiple reel.

From out in Los Anglaise we are advised that Miss Agnes Vernon of the Nestor company has announced her engagement to A. Deuce. (Yes, it is a peculiar name, isn't it?) The only thing we know to beat such a combination as a pair of Deuces is three of a kind.

Yes, as you've probably guessed, the above is the advance advertising of our serial.

Speaking of advertising reminds us we've got to run a "Personal" this week in our advertising space. Gosh, but we were embarrassed this week to receive a letter beginning "My Dearest Babe," though the envelope was addressed to us all right. The fellow that wrote it evidently sent the letter intended for us to his best girl, and she got ours. Now to fix it up and straighten matters out:

PERSONAL.

PERSONAL—KENT. YOUR LETTER TO BABE WE GOT. SEND us the one you intended for us and we'll return hers to you, after you have remitted for this personal. Us.

A prominent newspaper of the middle west is having lots of fun in trying to ascertain the most popular outdoor sports among certain groups of individuals. Gee, in the film game that would be easy. We should classify them about as follows:

1. SHOOTING THE BULL.
2. THROWING THE HAMMER.
3. PASSING THE BUCK.

We clamp by an esteemed Noo Yawk contemp. that the "Hypocrites" is to continue its metropolitan run indefinitely. Gee, but Truth has become strangely popular. We fear we shall scarcely know our Noo Yawk!

OUR BURG.

Bill Selig and J. A. Berst was seen to the depot one day this wk. These w. k. cits are getting to be regular commuters.

Paul Davis, Secy. of the Synd. Film Corp. and Executor of the C. J. Hite Estate, was to Our Burg on Biznis this wk.

The w. k. and popular Carl Laemmle Tuesdayed in Our Village and then flitted back to 1600 Broadway.

Jesse Goldberg, Sec. & Gen. Mgr. of the Life Photo, was seen on Main St. one day this wk. Jesse, as usual, was busy as two men.

Another Noo Yawker to be seen in our Village the past wk was Jim Maher of the Photo Drama Co. Broadway may be all right but they have to come to Wabash Ave to do business.

Dave Griffith, the w. k. chap as stages these here motion picters which was recently seen at the Opry House, was registered at the Congress House this wk. He allows as how he'll keep right on makin' picters.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

Brevities of the Business

In order that he may devote all his time to the writing of photoplays Harvey Gates, who has achieved a reputation in the film world as a publicity expert and photoplaywright of exceptional ability, has left the Lubin company at Phoenix, Arizona, of which Romaine Fielding is the director. It was two months ago that Harvey, as he is known to a host of friends in the game, severed his affiliations with the Universal company where he had been associate editor of the Universal Weekly and handled a great part of the trade paper publicity, to write photoplays for Fielding and do his personal publicity work. One of his two-reel plays, "West, Two Thousand Miles" is just being completed in Phoenix and another, "Dr. Gonzales, from Mexico," in three reels, is the next one scheduled for production. The publicity dope put out for Fielding by Harvey has attracted wide spread attention.

Mr. Gates first broke in as a writer and film reviewer on the Dramatic Mirror over two years ago. Here he remained for a year and during this time he started the writing of photoplays and found success almost immediately. Following, he became associated with the Universal and while his duties as editor and publicity man were arduous, he found time to turn out scenarios which sold. Among those which he has had produced are: "I Was Meant for You," Biograph, "Concentration," Biograph, "His Father's House," Biograph, "The Scar," Biograph, "The Elder Brother," two-reel Essanay featuring Francis X. Bushman, "When the World Was Silent," a three-reel Imp, "At the Banquet Table," a two-reel Imp, and "In the Hands of the Potter," Essanay. Most of his plays have been either dramas or melodramas, the class of stories in which he excels.

For the present Mr. Gates will be located in Salt Lake where he has gone, with his wife and baby, to visit his parents from whom he has been separated several years.

Edward B. Selden, one of the special representatives of the World Film Corporation, was seriously hurt in a taxi accident which occurred on Broadway and 29th street, New York, recently. Mr. Selden was on his way to the Pennsylvania station to catch a train and the taxi, owing to the carelessness on the part of the driver, ran against another machine. He was compelled to postpone his western trip for several days because of the accident.

The American studios at Santa Barbara, Calif., have taken on an unusually busy atmosphere these days. President Hutchinson has been very active in the acquisition of new talent and stellar attractions.

The filming of the Essanay photoplay, "Graustark," from the novel by George Barr McCutcheon, now is completed. Some of the scenes were taken in New York and Washington. Francis X. Bushman takes the leading part; that of the young American who wins a princess.

Ed. J. Le Saint of the Selig Company is hard at work on "The Circular Staircase," from the story by Mary Roberts Reinhart which he put into scenario form himself. In this four-reeler Stella Razeto has the leading part.

Joseph A. McKinney, general manager of the United Film Service (Warner's Features, Inc.), will retire at the end of the week from that organization to engage in other operations. Other operations will claim Mr. McKinney's attention after he has allowed himself a brief vacation in spite of immediate demands on his services coming from several sources. He states that he prefers, for the present, not to discuss his future plans.

On Monday, January 25, the Vitagraph Company took the first motion pictures ever made in the interborough subway, New York City. Powerful arc lights were installed at the Grand Central Station, the camera was set up in the "crow's nest" and arranged to show the congestion at the rush hour when the crowds changed from the local to the express. This will be used in the reels of the "Greater City" for the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

A picturization of another Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady story, "The Island of Regeneration," is the feature picture of the Vitagraph theater program this week.

Syndicate Film Corporation stock sold at 118 within the past week. A meeting, at which it will be decided whether this company will embark on a new venture, will be held some time this week.

American Film Manufacturing Company stock is reported to have sold at 150 last week. This is a new high record and represents an advance of about 55 points within the last three months, as a considerable block of stock passed hands at 95 at that time.

Complying with requests from many sources for definite information as to capitalization, etc., of certain companies, the following information is furnished:

Biograph Film Company. Incorporated in New Jersey. Par $100. Capital $2,000,000, practically all outstanding. From 1911 to 1914 they paid at the rate of 1% monthly, but in 1914 they reduced it to ½% monthly. In 1915 they paid 50% scrip dividend to run two years. This is convertible into cash or stock, according to the decision of the directors.

General Film Company. Incorporated in Maine in 1910. Capital stock $1,000,000; outstanding, $795,000 7% preferred, $100,000 common. Common stock cannot be secured and bids of $2,500 have been made within the last year.

Majestic Motion Picture Corporation—Incorporation California. Capital $1,00,000. Par $100.

Mutual Film Corporation—Incorporated in Virginia. Capital authorized, $1,800,000 7% preferred, outstanding, $1,535,800. Common, $1,700,000 authorized, $1,582,500 outstanding. Preferred pays annually 7% and common 1% per month.

New York Motion Picture Corporation—Incorporated in New York. Capital $1,000,000, all issued. Par $100. During 1914 they paid 2% monthly dividends, until July, when dividends were discontinued, but are expected to be resumed this month.

Reliance Motion Picture Corporation—Incorporated in New York. Capital $200,000 7% preferred and $800,000 common. Par $100.

Thanhouser Film Corporation—Incorporated in New York. Capital $400,000. Par $100.

Thanhouser Syndicate Corporation—Incorporated in Virginia. Capital $75,000 preferred, $225,000 common.

Syndicate Film Corporation—Capital $100,000 preferred and $200,000 common. This has already paid out about 88% in dividends on both classes of stock.

Universal Film Manufacturing Company—Incorporated in New York. Capital outstanding $883,000 common and $841,000 6% preferred.

World Film Corporation—Capital $2,000,000. Par $5.00. Outstanding $1,500,000.

Contracts have been concluded by the Jesse L. Lasky Play Company for the services of the famous legitimate artist, Victor Moore. The play in which he is to appear is George Bronson Howard's drama, "Snobs," which is generally considered to be the keenest satire on New York society ever produced.

Kathryn Osterman, who is known in the theatrical world as the laughter loving comedienne, has joined the World Comedy Stars Film Corporation and will be featured in a number of one-reel comedies.

Jess Willard, the white hope, played the principal role in an Imp fight drama entitled "The Heart Punch." This film was produced almost overnight as Mr. Willard was compelled to leave for the West on short notice. Stuart Paton wrote the scenario and directed the production.

Director Charles Brabin, of Edison, is now finishing the last picture in the "Lord Stranleigh" series and is making every effort to make it a fitting and beautiful climax to this unusual series.

Frank Fisher Bennett, the well-known juvenile leading man, has returned to the Mutual-Reliance Company after an absence of several months, and appears in the two-reel feature, "Heart Beats."

In the "Terence O'Rourke" series, George Periolat has played a Russian, Frenchman, German and Bulgarian and is cast for roles of men in almost every other foreign nationality.

Bosworth, Inc., has made further additions to its plant at Los Angeles, Calif., by purchasing a site opposite its studio where several buildings are being erected to make the sets for "Captain Courtesy," a forthcoming release on the Paramount program, featuring Dustin Farnum, who has been loaned by the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company.

Blistered hands and sore backs were all the style at the Essanay studio at Niles, Calif., because the actors became ambitious to plow a large portion of land in the studio grounds. Fritz Wintermeier and Ernest Van Pelt started it and then all turned farmers. Soon there will be gravel walks and flower beds instead of wild grass and weeds.

Fritzi Scheff, whose signature was recently secured by the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company to appear before the motion picture camera, has arrived at the Bosworth-Morosco studios in Los Angeles, Calif. She is to star in a screen version of her Broadway success, "Pretty Mrs. Smith."

An unusual photographic feat, a quadruple exposure, was successfully executed by Edison Director Eugene Nowland in "The Boston Tea Party," a forthcoming release, in which the effect is tellingly used in a patriotic speech during a stirring moment of the play.

Scene from Lasky's "The Country Boy."

The Majestic-Reliance studios in Hollywood, Calif., are the scenes of great building activities these days. A force of carpenters is busily engaged in erecting an enclosed studio, where four companies can work either day or night. The structure will be electrically lighted throughout. The stage itself will measure 60 by 80 feet. A huge open air stage, measuring 50 by 100 feet, also is being built. Director-General D. W. Griffith has added several directors to his corps. The new members include George Nicols, Paul Powell, R. A. Walsh, George Seigmann and G. A. Berabger. Including Mr. Griffith, there now are twelve directors engaged in directing Majestic, Reliance and Komic productions at these studios.

Because neither President Carl Laemle nor Stuart

The funny waiters' quartette in "Old Dutch," World Film production with Lew Fields featured.

Paton, the Imp director, can find a suitable title for a two-reel feature which is to be released on February 27, the Universal Film Manufacturing Company offers a fifty dollar prize to the one who will suggest a fitting name for the photoplay. The contest closes August 1, 1915. All answers must be typewritten and on one side of the paper only. In addition to the title each contribution should be accompanied by a fifty-word explanation of the contestant's choice of title.

Samuel Goldfish, treasurer and general manager of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, left New York last Monday for a trip to the Lasky studios in Hollywood, Cal., the special object of his journey being to complete the organization and equipment of the special company which is to go to Japan for the production of "The Darling of the Gods."

Elsie Janis has proved herself such a success upon the screen that Bosworth, Inc., for whom she appears before the camera, has offered her a salary far in excess of any woman director in the world—$150,000 a year and an interest in the business—for which she is to make eight pictures a year and direct some of the Bosworth releases. Miss Janis, who arrived in New York last week, states that she had been obliged to forego the signing of a contract because of her European engagements which she is now about to fulfill.

Helen Holmes, of Kalem, has been presented with a handsome diamond ring by her director, J. P. McGowan, for her work in directing "The Hazards of Helen" during his tenure in the hospital. Miss Holmes has worked hard and well, and during the long nights she stayed near the bedside of McGowan, besides taking all her meals with him.

Harry Weiss, manager, Chicago office World Film Corporation, wears a smile that will not come off. It's no wonder for, in one day, he and his staff put on the following business: Clifton theater, Chicago, renewal of contract; Crystal theater, Hartford, Wisconsin, yearly contract; Idle Hour theater, Jefferson, Wisconsin, yearly contract; the Nickelette theater, Peru, Ill., yearly contract; Grand theater, Chicago, a yearly contract. R. H. Fox, manager of the special feature department, went up to Milwaukee and signed up the Rainbow and the Idle Hour theater of that city.

Frank Crane insists upon having things done properly and when he saw that there would be an occasion to use some beautiful models in the Palm Beach scenes of the Lew Fields photoplay, "Old Dutch," he sent his assistants to the studios of the most famous artists of America to get the models to come to Fort Lee and pose in the Lew Fields picture. The following responded: Helen Hawley, Howard Chandler Christy; Peggy O'Neil, Hamilton King; Dorothy Goodrich, Haskell Coffin; Mary Smith, James Montgomery Flagg; Dorothy Robbins, Harrison Fisher; Eva Frere, Henry Hutt; Katherine Lane, Charles Dana Gibson; and Anita Wood Penryn Stanlaws.

Otis Turner, of Universal, is making great headway with his series, "The Black Box." He is taking scenes two and three together, as the sets are up. This means much changing of dress for Anna Little, Herbert Rawlinson and William Worthington, who are playing the leads.

Irving Cummings is to make his first appearance for American in "Beauty" productions, under title of "The Happier Man," released Tuesday, February 16. It is not determined whether Mr. Cummings will continue in "Beauty" productions, but for the time being he will participate in some of these popular pictures.

"How Hazel Got Even," a Majestic two-reel comedy-drama featuring Dorothy Gish, was recently completed after a delay of almost two months. At the Mutual studios this picture is regarded as a hoodoo. Donald Crisp started the production of it two months ago and became ill a few days after the picture was started. George Seigmann succeeded Crisp during the latter's illness. On the second day under Seigmann's direction, Dorothy Gish was struck and injured by an automobile. Upon Miss Gish's recovery, Seigmann finished the picture.

John Emerson, who made his first appearance in motion pictures in the Famous Players' "The Conspiracy," returns to the screen in a four-part film adaptation of the celebrated sentimental comedy, "The Bachelor's Romance," by Martha Morton.

The "Seven Lubin Carrs" are quite the most interesting series of models that the Lubin Company possesses and collectively and individually they are just as popular among the players as they are when seen on the screen. Heading the list is Mrs. Mary Kennevan Carr and then follow her children, Luella, fifteen years; Jack, eleven years; Stephen, eight years; Thomas, seven years; Rosemary, four years, and Maybeth, two years. And every one of them is a Lubin photoplayer.

Sidney Bracy is running James Cruze a race for daredevil honors at the Thanhouser studios. Last week Director Howell Hansel was taking a scene for "The Twenty Million Dollar Mystery," which required Mr. Bracy to climb onto an iron shutter from a fourth story window. He did it, but not without throwing the girls in a boarding-school across the street into mingled spasms of terror and delight.

W. N. Selig has arrived in the tropics and sends word that work is proceeding for the filming of "The Ne'er-Do-Well," from the celebrated book of Rex Beach. All of the members of the Selig Company, which is headed by Kathlyn Williams, are reported to be in good health and excellent spirits.

A six-part picturization of Cyrus Townsend Brady's latest and, as he himself claims, best work, "The Island of Regeneration," was the feature at the Vitagraph theater during the week beginning January 31, and it can be said without hesitation that it is by far one of the best pictures yet released by the Broadway Star Feature Company.

F. C. McCarahan, well known in Chicago film circles, is now the president and treasurer of the United States Motion Picture Company, a recently organized concern which announces that it will manufacture, distribute and exhibit motion picture films. Other officers of the company are B. D. Russell, vice-president, and J. S. Stout, secretary. The offices of the company are at 37 South Wabash avenue.

Joseph Byron Totten, the Essanay actor, has returned from a ten days' visit to his farm at Pendleton Hill, Conn. Mr. Totten has a forty-seven-acre stock farm where he keeps six horses, a herd of cattle and a large kennel.

The New York Motion Picture Corporation announced last week that Ford Sterling had signed a two-year contract to appear in Keystone comedies. This does away with the vaudeville tour he had planned to make. Two more comedians, Tolly Moran and Harry Gribbon, have also been added to the Keystone forces.

Joe Engle is intrenched within the private office of the Tiffany Film Corporation, busy on preparations for releasing of "The Heart of Maryland" film and the campaign of publicity which will accompany it.

The Film, the snappy little magazine published by the Reliance Motion Picture Corporation, which has Arthur James as its editor and Albert S. LeVino as associate editor, has issued its fifth weekly number. There is much of newness and interest in this latest magazine-release, chief of which is an article relating to David W. Griffith and in which he is accorded the title "the Shakespeare of motion pictures." The back cover of The Film is left blank so that the exhibitor may have the use of it for announcing his own program.

Appreciating the value of the motion picture as a means of spreading propaganda, the Massachusetts Women's Suffrage Association, in conjunction with the Boston Evening Record, has announced a scenario contest, the theme to be a dramatization of the tenets of equal suffrage, with a prize of $75 for the winning sketch submitted and of $50 for the one deemed second best. Subjects submitted must lend themselves to one-reel picturization, the number of scenes to be about twenty. The winning suffrage drama will be released through the United Film Service. The scenarios should be addressed to Women's Suffrage Scenario Contest, Boston Evening Record, Boston, Mass.

C. Lang Cobb of Ramo Films, Inc., who is making a tour of his branch offices, paid MOTOGRAPHY a visit this week while stopping in Chicago.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

General Program

His New Job—Essanay—(Two Reels)—February 1.—The first Charles Chaplin release in which the comedian rises from the position of scene shifter to that of a star. A review appears on page 247 of this issue.

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 9—Selig—February 1.—In this issue of the weekly a close-up view of Liu Sung Fu, commissioner from China to the Panama Pacific Exposition, is given; a huge mountain of coal at the docks in Norfolk, Va., ready for shipment to Europe, is seen; close-up views are given of Harry K. Thaw in his Manchester, N. H., home, and the opening of Boston's new thirty-six story custom house is pictured. In the war section are views of the first refugees from Tsing Tau arriving in San Francisco, and more of the remarkable pictures secured by A. E. Wallace at Frankfurt, Germany.

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 10—Selig—February 4.—This issue of the weekly shows the searching of cotton bales being shipped to Europe, by the British consul; a close-up view of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and Mother Jones, who have been referred to in the newspapers the past week; Chicago views are given of the new steam roller to be used on the streets for melting snow, and of an elevated railroad trip taken by a number of Broadway theatrical stars. In the war sections are to be found scenes taken in Germany by A. E. Wallace, as well as views snapped near Arras, Dixmude and Nieuport, Belgium.

The Stray Shot—Biograph—February 8.—The girl's husband and his partner leave for a new prospecting field in a distant town. The husband gambles away nearly all his money in a faro game and then, suspecting that he has been cheated, draws his revolver and as he is about to pull the trigger his arm is thrown up and the bullet goes through the ceiling. Rushing upstairs to his room he finds his partner lying on the floor and believes he has killed him. He escapes and returns to his wife. The partner, who has been slightly wounded, recovers, and also returns towards his young friend's cabin. The gambler, meanwhile is chased out of town by the citizens and arrives at the young man's cabin to seek lodging. When the young man recognizes the gambler he is compelled to take him into his home, lest the gambler expose him for murder, and upon the husband's departure next day the gambler attacks the wife. She seizes her husband's revolver and fires several shots through the window, as a signal. The husband returns and is choking the gambler to death when his old partner arrives and separates them. So joyful is he over the discovery that his hands are not stained with blood that he permits the gambler to depart, and the partners are once more re-united to take up their old life.

Suspicious Characters — Edison — February 8.—Jim and Bill, burglars of little skill but much nerve, enter the Erbstein home and proceed to rifle the safe. The policeman on the beat and the Erbsteins make things so disagreeable for them that they take the safe home to finish the job in peace. After a succession of farcical incidents and situations the pair return to their hall room to indulge in stolen pies. C.R.C.

Sweedie Goes to College—Essanay—February 8.—Wallace Beery and Ben Turpin are featured in another one of the Sweedie series, in which Sweedie, the cook, secures a position in the college kitchen, where her services are used to pay her tuition. When Romeo arranges with her to elope at 11 o'clock one evening, Sweedie oversleeps, and Betty, who has planned to elope with her young man at the same hour, descends the ladder and is taken to the minister's by Romeo. Later Sweedie responds to the whistle of Betty's sweetheart, and at the minister's the lovers discover with amazement that they have the wrong girls and make an exchange. N. G. C.

In the Hands of the Jury—Kalem—(Two Reels)—February 8.—Doctor Butler and his young partner, Doctor Haines, are examining a deadly poison when Murdock calls. Haines leaves the room and Murdock quarrels with Butler, shatters the vial, and its contents instantly kill Doctor Butler. Frightened, Murdock flees, taking with him Haines' hat by mistake. Lennice, Butler's daughter, meets him in the hallway and a little later discovers her father's dead body. Fate accuses Haines of the murder and he is tried for it, Murdock being on the jury. As the jury returns to the courtroom with its verdict, Lennice Butler, who has found the hat, accuses Murdock of being the guilty man, and he confesses, thus freeing Haines. Harry Millarde and Anna Q. Nilsson featured.

Patsy in a Seminary—(Seventh Episode of the Patsy Bolivar Series)—Lubin—February 8.—Mary, who has accepted a position in a young ladies' seminary, arrives, accompanied by Patsy, and secures him a position as gardener. Patsy pays so much attention to the young women of the seminary that he is discharged, and immediately a strike is on and the girls demand his reinstatement. When Mrs. Squills discovers Patsy's athletic ability he is given the chair of physical science, but he forces the girls to exercise so strenuously that their parents rise up in their wrath and order the instructor discharged. At this time Sykesy arrives and believing his new trouble is Sykesy's doings he ducks Sykesy in the swimming pool. Later the girls give him a midnight banquet in one of their rooms and after an exciting time he is hurled bodily out of the window by the husband of Mrs. Squills. Clarence Elmer featured.

The Passer-by—Selig—(Two Reels)—February 8.—Fay Thompson, a beautiful Southern girl, when her brother Jamie is drafted for war, asks her lovers to take her brother's place, but none of them will agree, and she hangs a golden cross to the branch of a tree and offers to marry the man who will take it, wear it away to the war and upon his return claim her as his bride. Frank Coakley, totally unknown to Fay, takes the cross and distinguishes himself on the field of battle in Jamie's place. One day he is wounded and loses the cross, which is found by Colonel Morrison. After the war is over Coakley returns to claim his bride, but she will not agree to marry him, since he does not have the cross. Eventually Morrison appears, identifies Coakley, returns the cross and Fay and her soldier lover are married. Stella Razeto and Guy Oliver featured. See review on page 207, issue of February 6.

Hearts to Let—Vitagraph—February 8.—Birnell, a novelist, is unhappy with his wife, and when the husband pays attention to Grace Martin, a friend of Mrs. Birnell's, the wife becomes jealous and as a result of this jealousy the two are finally divorced and later the wife accepts the attentions of young Ralph Lyons, and goes to select an apartment for them. Birnell, who has been abroad, returns home, and seeking a suitable apartment, happens to visit the same place. A broken door-knob in the room results in their being temporarily imprisoned in the place, and coming face to face the humor of the situation strikes them, and before they realize it they are planning the decoration of the place, as if for their own home. Discovering after all that both have interests in common, a complete reconciliation takes place. Leo Delaney and Leah Baird featured.

Pere Goriot—Biograph—(Two Reels)—February 9.—Madam Goriot, the wife of a wealthy manufacturer, dies after being injured in a runaway, and her friend Madam Blanc takes charge of her two daughters, Anastasie and Delphine.

Through her the girls meet two titled fortune hunters, a count and a baron, and in order to make a proper appearance before these titled men, are compelled to spend every cent they possess and to run their father heavily into debt. Madam Blanc profits by the introduction both through the girls and the fortune hunters. When Goriot, utterly lonely, appeals to his daughters for a small room in their household, he is refused, and later the girls gamble and lose heavily to Madam Blanc. Their husbands refuse to pay their debts, and they appeal to their father, who sacrifices his last cent. In his old age, Goriot's sole comfort in life is the affection of Eugene and Victorine, two young lovers, and when dying, Goriot sends Eugene to bring his daughters to him, but both are leaving for a ball and refuse to visit their father. Eugene, indignant, goes to the ball-room and denounces the daughters, and then returns to comfort Goriot in his last hours.

Olive's Greatest Opportunity—EDISON FEBRUARY 9.—This is the last of the "Olive's Opportunities" series and ends in Olive's marriage to Vance Coleman. Mabel Trunnelle and Edward Earle made an excellent pair for the leading parts, and were ably directed by Richard Ridgely. The conclusion is a perfectly logical one. The situations leading to it are developed entirely in the last chapter of the series, none of the previous episodes giving even the slightest clue as to the identity of Olive Arden. Madame Forresti gives a house party at her home in the woods, and invites Vance Coleman as one of the guests. While the party is out skating on a nearby pond a gypsy enters the house in search of food. On leaving he sees Madame Forresti and recognizes her as his former wife. Haunted by the familiarity of the face she has just seen, the woman tells Olive the story of her marriage to Franz Delli, a gypsy. Olive recognizes his picture as that of the man who left her at the gypsy camp years before. This proves Olive to be Madame Forresti's daughter. The next day Delli's body is found in the pond. Olive's happiness in being reunited to her mother is followed shortly by an even greater event in her life—her marriage to Vance Coleman.

The Romance of the Night—ESSANAY—FEBRUARY 9.—A quick-moving melodrama, in which Richard C. Travers, Ruth Stonehouse and E. H. Calvert are featured. Bob Halran is amazed to have a young lady passing in an automobile throw a slipper into his lap, and, suspecting the owner is in trouble, he overtakes the car and meets Helen Darrel, who was being kidnapped. He rescues her and, after being taken to her home, learns that Regan, the chief conspirator, has secured from her father the missing half of a plan which he has been trying for years to obtain. Darrel, Helen's father, tells Bob the hiding place of Regan and his gang and, arriving at the place, Bob overpowers Regan and the gang and secures the missing document, which is returned to Mr. Darrel.

N. G. C.

Mr. Pepperie Temper—KALEM—FEBRUARY 9.—Pepperie Temper gets stuck in the mud while hunting, climbs out of his boots and shoots them to pieces in his anger. The following morning, going out on the back porch for a newspaper, the door, which is equipped with a spring lock, closes behind him, leaving him in his pajamas and bathrobe. His frantic efforts to arouse his wife attract the neighbors' attention, and one of them turns the hose on him, finally subduing him. John Brennan featured. On the same reel is:

The Mexican's Chickens—KALEM—FEBRUARY 9.—When the revolutionists steal his chickens, Senor Sourface joins the federal army in revenge. He is captured by the enemy, and sentenced to be shot out of the mouth of a cannon at sunrise. His wife and daughter hasten to a spot a mile away and catch him in a blanket when he is shot out of the cannon. It happens he was an ex-circus performer and used to do this act twice a day in a big circus. John Brennan featured.

His Soul Mate—LUBIN—FEBRUARY 9.—Albert Maynard loves two coquettes, Dolly and Polly, while his stenographer Nellie is simply crazy over him. Unable to decide which he loves the best, Polly or Dolly, he goes home one night and falls asleep and dreams that he marries Dolly, who dies, and later enters into a second marriage with Polly, who also dies. Visiting his office, he finds that Nell is not there, and learns with surprise that she is also dead. When he himself dies and goes to heaven, he starts in a search for those who have previously departed, and finds that Dolly is the soul mate of another man, while Polly also has a new mate in heaven. Discouraged he pleads for knowledge as to who really is his soul mate, and finds Nell sitting on a cloud by herself waiting for him. He thereupon awakens and next morning proposes to Nellie. Ethel Clayton and Joseph Kaufman featured.

Roping a Bride—SELIG—FEBRUARY 9.—An uproarious comedy in which Tom Mix is featured. Tom and Dick are staunch friends, both in love with Vera, the daughter of the local doctor. To decide which young man is to marry her, Vera agrees that the boys shall ride at full speed and cast their lariats upon her, the one making the first successful cast to win her as the prize. In practicing the boys cast their lariats over a calf and a donkey, and when Vera discovers this, on the day of the race she refuses to marry either, telling them to go back to the calf and donkey.

The Wrong Girl—VITAGRGAPH—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 9.—Banker Dryden's daughter, Elsie, is courted by Count De Brie, assisted by Elsie's French maid, Zelie, secretly the count's sister. Elsie and Tom Hastings, her brother Jack's college chum, see each other's photographs and later meet and fall desperately in love. Tom is to be leading lady of the junior college play, and on the night of the play Zelie sends word to Jerry, the count's chauffeur, of the gown which Elsie is to wear, since it is the count's intention to have Jerry kidnap her. Meanwhile, the seniors steal the costume to be worn by the junior leading lady, and Tom is compelled to borrow Elsie's gown to wear at the performance. He is thus mistaken for Elsie and carried away by Jerry and the count, while Elsie is captured by the seniors in their attempt to break up the show, though she later escapes. After a grand rough house between the juniors and seniors, Tom and Elsie both arrive on the scene and explain all that has happened. The count is attacked and ducked in a pond, and Tom boldy proclaims his love for Elsie. Wally Van and Nitra Frazer featured.

The Life History of a Silkworm—EDISON—FEBRUARY 10.—An interesting educational treating on the life and habits of the silkworm, showing him weaving his cocoon about him and emerging from it in the spring, winged and ready for a new life. On the same reel is:

The Tailor's Bill—EDISON—FEBRUARY 10.—This is a comedy verging on slapstick, featuring Arthur Housman and William Wadsworth. Platz, a reckless sport, neglects to pay Gumm for his masquerade costume and the tailor swears revenge. As a matter of fact, Platz did lay the money on the counter for Gumm, but the bill was attached to a string and made its escape before Gumm could lay his hand on it. The tailor waits outside of the dance hall for his debtor. Platz, to fool him, does not wear his costume, but Gumm recognizes him in his street clothes and immediately things begin to hum. It ends up by Platz's paying the tailor for the rental of the costume and also paying off the policeman who threatens to arrest him—both with the same bill, and he still has it on his string.

The Fable of the Good People Who Rallied to the Support of the Church—ESSANAY—FEBRUARY 10.—The loyal women of the church decide to pull off a festival and raise some coin. The gazelles blow $82 for finery, while the older sisters use up $27 worth of complexion and $19 worth of groceries making cakes and candies. The deacon puts in $12 worth of time decorating the parlors with $20 worth of junk. The night of the big doings, Lucy Wilson, who has rented a gypsy costume for $6 and told fortunes, took in $2.75, while another girlie, who had spent $4.96 for her glad rags and ran a fish pond, gathered in two beans and a quarter. At 10 p. m. the majority of the refreshments being still unsold, the kids are given a free hack at them. The expenses of the affair amount to $250, but when the sisters discover

The Disappearance of Harry Warrington—Kalem — (Two Reels) — February 10.—Another of "The Girl Detective" series in which Ruth is called upon to solve the disappearance of Harry Warrington, who has been kidnapped from his own room. Ruth, disguised, visits the meeting place of a band of anarchists, and learns that Warrington had once been a member of the band, by playing upon the jealousy of Olga, sweetheart of one of the gang leaders. She discovers Warrington's whereabouts and, aided by the police, rescues him. Ruth Roland featured.

Bags of Gold—Lubin—(Three Reels)—February 10.—Weldon returns from Alaska and leaves his gold with Eliot to be put in his vault. Reed, Parker and Brent, three crooks, learn of the gold, and Reed gets a job as Eliot's secretary, Parker as his butler and Brent is given charge of a woodchopper's shack. Gradually the fascination of the gold grows upon Eliot and he plans to transfer it to his home and arrange a fake robbery. Hardy, an artist, who has been painting a portrait of Eliot's daughter, Nan, discovers Eliot's plans, and also suspects the butler and the secretary of being crooked. When Reed takes the only bag of gold from Eliot's vault he is discovered, but Eliot is afraid to make a charge against him, since he is himself a thief, and instead he orders Reed to accompany him home. In the meanwhile Brent suspects Hardy and after knocking him unconscious flees with him to a cabin and ties him to a keg of gun powder in which is a lighted fuse. Parker, endeavoring to find the gold in Eliot's library, is discovered and escapes in a wagon, while Nan springs into the back part of the vehicle to follow him. Hardy is rescued just before the cabin is blown up and Brent is pursued by the wood choppers and falls over a precipice. Parker's horse runs away and as it is about to cross a railroad track Nan escapes by grabbing a beam of a low bridge beneath which it passes, while the horse dashes on. Eliot and Reed quarrel and Reed in the struggle falls to his death beneath the wheels of the train. A moment later the train hits the runaway, killing Parker, and as the story finishes Hardy proposes to Nan. John Smiley and Justine Huff featured.

The Odd Slipper—Selig—February 10.—A surprising melodrama which holds one's interest to the very end. Dr. Randall is mystified to have a dainty slipper one day fall on his shoulder as he is leaving the hotel. Unable to discover from whence it came, he is both puzzled and interested. Later Randall is called on to treat a patient, and he visits the house, which is just across the street from his own home. On arriving at the home of his patient he learns that she is Grace Villers, an orphan, and during his examination the girl tells him that he will learn all about her if he will look in the slipper he has in his possession. The doctor returns home and finds under the insole of the slipper a note which explains that the girl is wealthy and her uncle and aunt have literally captured and imprisoned her, in an attempt to make her appear insane and thus eventually secure her fortune. The slipper had been hurled through the window by her in order to attract someone's attention. The doctor summons the police and Grace escapes from her bondage and the doctor is rewarded later with her heart and hand. Lillian Hamilton and Robert Adair featured.

Getting Rid of Nephew—Biograph—February 11.—The doctor's nephew arrives with a letter reading, "get my boob son a job and oblige brother Bill." The doctor takes the boy to his old friend Hypo, a photographer, who hires him as assistant, and when a newly wedded pair enter to have their pictures taken the boy flirts with the bride, and calls the husband into a dark room to see the negative developed. While hubby is thus engaged the boy again embraces the bride, who screams and the husband then attacks the boob. Hypo returns and discharges him. The nephew then returns to his uncle's home and fools with some chemical apparatus; there is an explosion and a little dust is all that is left on the floor. Sweeping up nephew's remains, the doctor pours the powder into a mortar and pulverizes nephew past all hope of reincarnation. On the same reel is:

The Big Night—Biograph—February 11.—Hubby attends a performance of the Ginger Girls Burlesque Company at the town hall, despite his wife's attempts to prevent him from doing so, and nearly breaks up the show by his attentions to the girls. When one of the company puts on as a special feature "the dance of the seven veils," hubby makes love to her, and at this moment wifey arrives and leads him out by the ear, much to the enjoyment of all present.

Slim the Brave and Sophie the Fair—Essanay—February 11.—Victor Potel is seen at his best in this comedy. Slim calls on Sophie, who is very much smitten with Mustang, and Hiram, Sophie's father, chases Mustang from the premises. Later Mustang returns, and Sophie excuses herself to Slim and from her window upstairs arranges with Mustang to elope the next day. Slim learns what is happening and holds up the stage coach as Mustang and Sophie are departing. Mustang flees in terror, and Slim, after taking off his disguise, appears as the hero who rescued her, and secures Sophie's promise to marry him.

The Trapper's Revenge—Lubin—(Two Reels)—February 11.—Two Canadian trappers are handling illicit whiskey across the Canadian border. Pierre is in love with Jean's daughter, Marie, but Marie scorns his love and cares more for Paul Marr, a member of the mounted police, though when Hugo Sinclaire, a new mounted policeman, appears, she imagines she cares more for him. Hugo has only been amusing himself with Marie and when he boasts of his conquest at the post, Paul attacks him. Later, Marie is shut up in a cabin by her father, and Hugo comes to visit her. He arrives in time to see Jean concealing some whiskey jugs and in the struggle Jean fires at Hugo. Marie hears the shot and tries to release herself. Hugo goes to her assistance, but as he reaches the door is shot and killed by Pierre, who has crept to the window. When Jean regains consciousness and finds Hugo's dead body he believes he is the murderer, while the police suspect Paul on account of the recent quarrel. Marie learns of Paul's arrest and compels her father to confess the crime. In the meantime Pierre quarrels with some half-breeds and is shot. Dying, he confesses the murder, thus saving the lives of both Jean and Paul. Marie's eyes have been opened and she consents to marry Paul, the man she really loves. Edgar Jones and Josephine Longworth featured.

The Masquerade Hero—Mina—February 11.—McQuarrie's wife discovers an old Indian head dress in his trunk and asks him where he obtained it. He tells her a wild-eyed story of his single handed cleaning up a whole tribe of Indians, and she believes him. In the midst of the story his little son enters and is delighted to find that his father is such a hero. After the family have gone to bed, McQuarrie thinks over what really happened, recalling the evening he secured the head dress when going to a masquerade ball and with this thought in mind he falls asleep and dreams that he is awakened by Indians. Meanwhile his little son also dreams of an Indian massacre and sets out to become a hero like his father. Walking in his sleep he visits his father's bedroom and smashes him over the head with a poker, when both awake. Mother also awakes and later the doctor arrives and announces that McQuarrie will recover in a few weeks.

Breaking In—Vitagraph—February 10.—"Silent" Jones, a self-made millionaire, in order to give his wife and daughter, Melba, a broader view of life, takes them from their home on a western plain to New York City, and there Jones enters the Wall Street game, led on by Van Ardsley, the leader of a clique of financiers known as "The Big Six." The Joneses attempt to break into society, but are flouted by all the wealthy folks they know. Jones, disappointed, determines to get even and corners every available share of a certain stock. When "The Big Six" go short on this stock, Jones is able to ruin them all. When Van Ardsley humbly calls to beg for mercy he is told, "you were too good for my wife and baby girl, now I've got you, I'm going to break you." Mrs. Van Ardsley attempts to intercede but meets with no better success. Sickened with their city experiences, the Joneses return to the plains. Ned Finley and Lillian Walker featured.

On the Altar of Love—VITAGRAPH—FEBRUARY 11.—Margaret Dare quarrels with Gerald Lynn to whom she has been engaged, and leaves for the city to study painting. Gerald becomes a pupil of the same school, and though they have become friends, pride prevents them from speaking their love. When an enormous prize is offered for the best painting, both Gerald and Margaret prepare pictures. Gerald's eyes bother him, and as a result, his picture is a poor one, and when he goes totally blind, Margaret is induced to substitute her picture for his in the test, and as a result Gerald becomes famous. When the prize is awarded his picture he forgets Margaret, and the girl, broken hearted, returns home, but later Gerald's sight is restored, he learns of Margaret's sacrifice, and visits his old home to claim her as his wife. Maurice Costello and Estelle Mardo featured.

Their Divorce Fund—BIOGRAPH—FEBRUARY 12.—A young bride leaves home when her husband engages a new cook, as she considers this a slur to her own cooking. Later the two again agree to live in the same house, after the cook has been discharged, but a screen is erected in the middle of the house, and hubby remains on one side, while wifey lives on the other, meanwhile putting away some money towards a divorce fund. This sum grows to a large amount, and each resolves to hide the money and pretend that it has been stolen. The wife secures the cash box and retreats to her side of the screen, but the husband, missing it, follows, and sees her with the money in her hand, and as she has gained in experience and is really becoming a proficient cook, his heart relents and he crosses the barrier to fold the repentant bride in his arms.

The Glory of Clementina—EDISON—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 12.—Miriam Nesbitt and Marc MacDermott featured. At his wife's request, Quixtus consents to sit for a portrait. Clementina Wing, the painter, and he become well acquainted and like each other, but only as friends, for Quixtus is devoted to his invalid wife, and Clementina is too honorable to try to alienate his affections. Their next meeting is in a cafe in Paris. In the meantime Mrs. Quixtus has died, and the widower is becoming infatuated with worldly Mrs. Fontaine, who has designs on his money. Clementina breaks up the party which was the result of Mrs. Fontaine's "accidentally" meeting Quixtus, and draws the latter away from the woman. The scene then shifts to America, where Mrs. Fontaine renews her efforts to fascinate Quixtus. Clementina, who has always been more or less careless and old-fashioned in her manner of dressing, meets Mrs. Fontaine with her own weapons, stylish clothes, and appears to such good advantage in them that Quixtus casts off Mrs. Fontaine and proposes to the painter. John Lancaster, Elsie Greeson and Lee Morris featured.

When Greek Meets Greek—VITAGRAPH—FEBRUARY 12.—Hudson Turner, a millionaire bachelor, falls in love with Margery Cooke, the daughter of a hotel manager at Laughing Springs, where Turner is spending the summer. Reading of his uncle's engagement, Ellis, his nephew, fears lest he lose the fortune which is to be his at the time of his uncle's death, and finally succeeds in persuading his uncle that Miss Cooke is marrying him solely for his money. The uncle agrees to make a test and returns to Laughing Springs pretending to be very ill. When Margery is solicitous and sympathetic, Ellis sees his plan is failing and so tells Margery of his uncle's scheme. Margery then calls on Doctor Diggs to give her lover a most strenuous and uncomfortable treatment. Hudson pretends that he dying of heart failure and makes a will in Margery's favor. Ellis is wild with rage, but Margery tears the will to pieces and falls on her knees in tears. Convinced then of her real love, Hudson realizes his nephew is a blackguard and marries Margery. Sidney Drew and Jane Morrow featured.

The Woman Who Paid—BIOGRAPH—FEBRUARY 13.—When the wife discovers that her husband is paying attention to another woman, she commits suicide, and later when the husband visits the other woman, he is repulsed, and the woman goes to a quiet village, where she eventually meets the minister, a middle-aged widower, through her attentions to his daughter. He asks her to marry him and before agreeing she shows him the newspaper account of the suicide, and admits that she was the cause. Later the minister's daughter is taken ill and pleads to see the pretty lady again. While at the bedside of the girl the doctor arrives and places the house under quarantine, and during the time they are together the minister realizes her true nobility. When the quarantine is lifted he asks her to marry him despite her past, but she declares she has no right to the happiness she took from another, and goes out of his life forever.

The Girl Who Kept Books—EDISON—FEBRUARY 13.—This is one of "The Girl Who Earns Her Own Living" series, featuring Gertrude McCoy. It pictures the disadvantages that shadow a girl in commercial life, even though she be able to do a man's work. A large bank finds that it is being systematically robbed by one or more of its employes, and decides to have the books audited. Jarvis, an expert accountant, is assigned the work, and does it secretly at night in a hotel, assisted by Gertrude Neyland, who is unusually keen at ferreting out errors. At first the bank president demurs about having Gertrude work on the books, saying that it is a man's work, but gives in when Jarvis frankly confesses that she is as good an auditor as he. On the third night Gertrude discovers the keynote to the thief's system and also his identity, clearing her sweetheart, Nelson Thorpe, and proving to the satisfaction of Mrs. Jarvis that she is her husband's assistant and nothing more. C.R.C.

Broncho Billy's Sentence—Essanay—February 13.—Broncho Billy, an outlaw, holds up a stage coach, and later, after being wounded, is refused care by a girl in whose home he seeks refuge. He drags himself to the home of a minister and tells him he was accidentally shot, and is allowed to remain at their home for some time, during which period he becomes converted. One night he leaves a note explaining that he is an outlaw, goes to the sheriff's office and gives himself up. Years later, in the penitentiary, he conducts the weekly services in the chapel and finally one morning is called to the warden's office and given his pardon for good behavior. G. M. Anderson featured. N. G. C.

When Father Interfered—Lubin—February 13.—The Wallingtons are a very old and aristocratic family, and when Arthur, the only son, falls in love with little Dolly, an actress in the local stock company, his father and aristocratic Aunt Emma are scandalized that a Wallington should be ensnared by "a woman of the stage," and with the assistance of cousin Herbert Wallington, they plan to disillusionize him, and securing Dolly's consent, cousin Herbert takes her to a cafe, while father escorts Arthur there. Herbert and Dolly pretend to be thoroughly drunk, in the hope that Arthur will not think so much of the girl, but Arthur "tumbles" to the plot and insists on joining the two at the other table, where he orders more wine, and finally sends Herbert and his father home in a pickled condition. Next day he calls on Dolly and compels her to admit her part in the plot and then produces a minister and a marriage license. Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe featured.

The Bugle Call—Selig—February 13.—Another of the interesting single-reel Selig jungle zoo pictures, in which lions and tigers are featured. According to the story, Ehrman Wolfshon, who lives near a South African military post, falls in love with Nancy O'Farrell, the daughter of the colonel of the regiment. Some of his soldier friends decide to play a joke on Wolfshon and, taking some articles of Nancy's clothing, they prepare them in the form of a dummy, which is later attacked by a lion. Ehrman, finding the ghastly remains, things Nancy has been killed by one of the jungle beasts, and as a result loses his reason. After all hope has been given up of his recovery, Nancy manages to restore his sanity by blowing again a signal on a bugle such as the lovers had been accustomed to use as a signal in making their trysts. Ehrman then regains his reason and realizes that Nancy is alive and well.

Mother's Roses—(Broadway Star Feature)—Vitagraph—(Three Reels)—February 13.—Helen, daughter of John Morrison, a Wall street financier, becomes infatuated with Delevan, who seems to exert a hypnotic influence over her. Payne Morrison, Helen's brother, warns her against the man, but she is planning to elope with him, when the sudden illness and death of her mother prevents it. The shock of his wife's death deranges John Morrison's mind, and Payne has to carry on his father's business. When Helen refuses to elope with him, Delevan plans to ruin the Morrisons, since he believes he possesses the controlling interest in a certain railroad stock. Payne learns of Delevan's plan and remembering that his father had given his mother some of this stock, sets out to find it. The spirit of his mother appears and he is told the stock can be found in the pages of the old family Bible, and there Payne finds it. The excitement of the hunt clears John Morrison's mind and at a directors' meeting the Morrisons are not only able to control the stock, but elect John Morrison, now himself again, president of the concern. James Morrison and Dorothy Kelly featured.

Mutual Program

The Beast Within—Reliance—February 3.—Jim Rose, relieved from prison, is hounded by a detective, and loses his position, Tom Bailey, another detective who believes that Jim is doing his best to live straight, succeeds in having him reinstated in his old position. He does this partly because he is in love with Jim's sister, Mamie. Spike Hennessey and another former pal of the ex-convict attempt to blow the safe in the office of the firm employing Jim, and the latter catches them. Deaf to their pleas and threats, Jim summons the police and has the crooks arrested. Bailey's and Mamie's faith in Jim is vindicated, and the head of the firm honors his heroic employe.

The Double Deception—Majestic—February 5.—A wealthy girl, tired of her aimless life, buries herself in a country town. Henry, a rich young clubman, chooses the same place to escape city life. They meet, fall in love, and become married. Each believes the other to be in rather straitened circumstances, and on their return to the city they start housekeeping in a small apartment. One day Henry sees Laura trying on a pearl necklace and becomes suspicious, but she disarms him by saying they are only paste. He learns differently however, after they are stolen, for the pawnbroker in whose shop he finds them assures him that they are worth a fortune. Meanwhile Laura finds a diamond-studded watch in Henry's bureau and fears that he is a burglar. They accuse each other on their next meeting, and then each confesses.

Nell's Strategy—Princess—February 5.—Nell Winters is compelled to take in sewing to support herself and her father, who is a drunkard. Maurice, a young millionaire, becomes infatuated with Nell, but she dislikes him, being in love with Bob. The latter discovers a way of enriching the iron company by whom he is employed and is sent to New York to superintend the city office. The interest on the Winters' home comes due, and there are no funds in the house to meet it. Nell's father tells her that it is her duty to marry Maurice. She pretends to consent, but wires Bob secretly, explaining her predicament. He hurries back, pays off the mortgage, and saves Nell from a miserable marriage.

Heart Beats—Reliance—(Two Reels)—February 6.—Passing Frank Middleton's house Policeman Moriarty witnesses, silhouetted on the curtain of a rear room, Middleton's murder by a tall figure costumed like the Devil. He notifies Lee, chief of the detective force, and the house is raided, and all of the guests are taken to the police station to be examined. On the table in Middleton's room Lee finds a diary, a woman's handkerchief, and a key. The key proves to belong to a room in which a pretty girl is found weeping. She refuses to make any statement, and is taken into custody. At the station an electric lamp is placed on the floor, and Moriarty reviews the silhouttes on the wall as Middleton's guests pass the lamp. Floyd Parker and Edwin Hurlburt both resemble the figure the policeman saw kill Middleton, and are put through the "heart-throb machine" ordeal. The girl rushes into the room during the middle of Hurlburt's examination, and inadvertently reveals him as the murderer. A note in Middleton's diary substantiates their story—that Hurlburt killed Middleton to save Janet's honor—and Lee closes the machine, saying that it was a justifiable deed.

The Star Boarder—Royal—February 6.—A fickle young man learns that his landlady has money in the bank and straightway starts to help her spend it. A pretty girl comes to the boarding house, and the young man falls in love with her. They are about to be married when the boardinghouse keeper hears of it, and causes the bride to be arrested. The landlady then turns her back on the youth's appeals to be reinstated in her affection.

The Shoplifter—Thanhouser—February 7.—Meg and Meta, sisters, are employed in the silk department in a department store. "Sport" Strubel induces Meg to help him in stealing silk. The manager discovers the loss, and holds Meta responsible. She tells Strubel that he is discovered, and he, thinking that Meg has given him away, writes her a note directing her to meet him at a certain time and place. Meg, meanwhile, alarmed over the turn things have taken, confesses her part to the manager. Meta receives Strubel's note, and notifies the police of where they can catch the thief. For Meta's sake the manager pardons Meg, and her sister helps her keep her vow to live straight.

Bill Turns Valet—KOMIC—FEBRUARY.—This is chapter seventeen of the "Bill" series. Hadley engages a new office boy named Bill whose first duty happens to be to take the boss' ink-stained trousers to a tailor. Ethel stops Bill on his way out and gives him her dress which the tailor is to shorten. The tailor is out, and Bill decides to make good by doing the work himself. Meantime Hadley and Ethel are surrounded by newspapers and embarrassments which finally lead to a visit from the police. In the nick of time Bill returns with the missing garments.

"Justified"—AMERICAN—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 8.—Tom Allen drives his wife from home when he believes her flirting with Joe Hill, a ne'er-do-well, but later discovers that Hill has visited the cabin to rob him, and that his wife is innocent of any wrong doing. Five years later the two men meet, and in a quarrel over a card game, Hill shoots Tom in the arm and the latter kills the man who has wronged him. Seeking a hiding place to avoid the sheriff, Tom hides in a barn and is there discovered by his wife, who lives in the village. Affairs are all explained and the two are reconciled, Tom being judged not guilty at his trial. See review on page 245 this issue. N. G. C.

His son, Tom, and Molly, a hired girl, marry, pay a small deposit on a farm and start in bravely to work it themselves. Their crops are successful, and they pay off the rest of the debt—when Dan Mallory is released from prison. He tries to borrow money from the happy couple, and failing in this, steals it and loses it gambling. The next day Tom and his wife are ejected from their property by the Mexican who won the money from the gambler. Mallory attacks the Mexican, gets back the money, and Tom and his wife, overjoyed, buy back the farm. But the old father, returning to town, pays for his last deal with his life at the hands of a band of Mexicans.

Mrs. Cook's Cooking—BEAUTY—FEBRUARY 9.—A laughable and thoroughly natural comedy in which Virginia Kirtley and Joseph Harris have the leading roles. Cook, dissatisfied with his wife's cooking, goes to a restaurant and there gets into a quarrel which results in his being arrested. When he calls up his wife to come and bail him out, she merely laughs and hangs up the receiver, so Cook spends a whole day in jail on a diet of bread and water, and when arraigned in court is fined "$30 or thirty days." Another appeal to Mrs. Cook results in her arriving to pay his fine, and Cook goes home to eat what he declares is the best meal in the world. N. G. C.

The Smuggled Diamond—THANHOUSER—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 9.—The Secret Service Bureau receives word that a celebrated diamond has been smuggled into this country, but the information that it is concealed in a certain man's cane arrives too late to enable the officials to capture him at the pier. No sign of the jewel can be found among his effects at the hotel. The men confess themselves baffled, but a young woman with natural detective ability traces out the mystery, locates the jewel, and compels the smuggler to confess.

A Heart of Gold—AMERICAN—FEBRUARY 10.—A human interest story with the sea for a background, and such excellent players as Harry Von Meter, Jack Richardson and Vivian Rich featured. Jim, a big fisherman, lives in the cottage of Mrs. Carr, and is dearly beloved by all the children in the neighborhood, who enjoy his flute playing.

Mary Price, unable to endure her husband's drunkenness, leaves home and is taken in by Mrs. Carr. Jim meets her, and one day proposes, not knowing that she is already married. When he discovers the truth, his heart all but breaks, but later he meets Jake, Mary's husband, and endeavors to make him realize his unworthiness of so sweet a woman. Following a severe storm at sea, Jake's boat is wrecked on a reef and Jim goes to his rescue. When brought ashore, Jim vows never to touch another drop of liquor, and Mary returns to her home, while Jim once more seeks happiness with the children and his flute. N. G. C.

The Chinatown Mystery—BRONCHO—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 10.—Frank Sloan, reporter on a big city paper, is detailed to work in Chinatown upon the mysterious disappearance of a Chinese slave-girl, Woo. His nerves becomes unstrung and he falls into the opium habit. Some time later he obtains some inside information on a murder mystery, and promises Captain Wells that he will put him in a position to arrest the murderer if he will keep the fact a secret for just one hour—time enough for Sloan to get a scoop on it for his old paper. After the story is landed some of Sloan's friends shanghai him aboard a steamer bound on a long cruise, and he finally overcomes his cravings for opium. On his return he receives his old position again, and becomes reconciled to his fiancee.

The Chinese Lottery—RELIANCE—FEBRUARY 10.—Through Jason Hunter's help Mary obtains a position as newspaper reporter. She decides to get a scoop on a lottery raid, finds out the location of one of the dens in Chinatown, and makes arrangements with the police to have it raided after ten o'clock when they will be sure to catch the owner. Too late to undo her work Mary learns that Jason Hunter is the owner of the place. She changes the laundry sign to a house two doors away. The police raid the innocent place and the next day Mary is discharged for failing to get a live story of the affair. Jason hears of it, confesses his foolishness to his father, promising to give it up, and Mary is restored to her position.

The Bride of Guadeloupe—DOMINO—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 11.—Felipe, a desperado, has Ricardo abducted to allow him a clear field in his suit for Berta's hand. Under threat of death the prisoner is compelled to write his sweetheart, telling her that he has sailed to Spain to marry another girl. Brokenhearted, Berta enters the convent. This he does by having Willie receive a letter addressed to his wife and purporting to come from some other man, and by paying Kitty Norman to write Willie a love letter and seeing that it falls into his wife's hands. After this first burst of jealousy and anger the couple realizes how foolish they have been and become reconciled.

The Heart of Lincoln—Gold Seal—(Two Reels)—February 9.—Betty is loved by two men, a Southern and a Northern colonel, who are great friends. Just before the war she has a little gathering at her house. Both of the colonels and Abraham Lincoln are present. A heated debate takes place between the two friends as to the merits and faults of Lincoln, the Northerner, of course, taking Lincoln's side. When war is declared the two men part, embittered towards one another. The Southerner's mother becomes dangerously ill, and Betty manages to get word through the lines to him. He returns home, and is seen by the Northerner who, instead of arresting him, only reports his presence in the vicinity. Another soldier arrests the Southern colonel and the Northerner is imprisoned. At the court martial the Southerner is condemned to death as a spy. Betty writes Lincoln to save him, but receives no reply. She meets him shortly afterwards, learns that he did not receive her letter, and pleads for the men's freedom. The president grants her request, and the Southerner returns to his command with a much different opinion of Lincoln than he formerly had.

Terror—Eclair—(Two Reels)—February 10.—A bully and a bad man of a western town kills a man in a drunken rage, and forces his brother to take the blame. The innocent man is obliged to flee from the town on the day of his marriage to escape being lynched. A dreadful plague attacks the town, killing off the residents, causing a famine, and making the town a place of pestilence and stark terror. The bully, a coward at heart, sees grim death stalking at his side. Meanwhile, the brother, now a doctor, is summoned from the neighboring town and, returning, works miracles with a wondrous cure of his own. Coming face to face with the man he wronged, the bully flees, chased by the maddened mob, and falls over a precipice. Norbert Myles, Erma Earle, and Carl Levinus play the principal parts.

Father Was a Loafer—L-Ko—February 10.—When triplets are added to the four children already driving him insane Brummel deserts, and infatuates Miss Rocks, a multi-millionairess. In the meantime his wife forgets her sorrow in the company of Baldwin who has no objections to the presence of seven squalling children. Just as Baldwin thinks his suit is successful Mrs. Brummel reads of her husband's coming marriage with Miss Rocks. Her arrival at the Rocks mansion is the beginning of a whirlwind of exciting events for Brummel.

The Vaudry Jewels—Big U—February 11.—The Secret Service has long been puzzled by the operations of Mrs. Vaudry, whom, they are convinced, is smuggling in jewels, and detail Dudley Crisp to capture her "with the goods." The detective meets Mrs. Vaudry and they are mutually attracted to each other. Crisp discovers that Mrs. Vaudry makes repeated trips between Europe and America, always on the same boat, and that, on landing, she advertises for a maid and it is always the same girl that answers the ad. In time he has enough evidence against Mrs. Vaudry to convict her of smuggling, and is then in a quandary as to whether he ought to yield to his love and allow her to escape, or do his duty and have her sent to prison. He decides on the former, but Mrs. Vaudry, becoming aware of the situation, surrenders herself to the police to save Dudley's honor. A year later the two are reunited.

The Phantom Warning—Rex—February 11.—Alice, a seamstress in the employ of Manton & Son, protests to the senior partner about the conditions and wages in the mill. He discharges her. She waits for the girls at the factory door, and advises them to strike. For this she is arrested. Victor Manton, who is in love with Alice, has a dream in which he sees a huge grinder converting girls into money. He awakes to find his father shaking him saying that he wants him to take full charge of the mill. Victor's first act is to release Alice from jail, and ask her co-operation in bettering conditions in the mill.

Billy Was a Smart Boy—STERLING—FEBRUARY 11.—Billy's flirtations with Carmen lead him into all sorts of trouble out of which he emerges much the worse for a quarrel with Carmen's sweetheart. In the end he is scorned by both Olive and Carmen. Billy Jacobs, Olive Johnson, and Carmen DeRue featured.

The Stake—IMP—FEBRUARY 12.—John Thornton and Tom, supposedly his nephew, live together. Tom's one fault is gambling, and he returns home one night ashamed, discouraged, and out of money. In the library he finds Thornton, greatly agitated. After listening to Tom's confession of his weakness for gambling, the old man tells the boy the story of how, during his younger days, the girl he loved had been stolen from him by Hack Martin, a drummer whose two great faults were drinking and gambling. Thornton plays Martin for Mary's freedom and happiness after having won all of his money, and wins again. They return to Mary's home and find her dead. Martin attempts to take the baby boy, but Thornton prevents him. The old man then informs Tom that he is the boy, and that Martin, his father, is lying in bed in an adjoining room. The man was in the act of robbing Thornton's house when he caught him and recognized him. As Tom enters the bedroom, the butler informs Thornton that the beggar is dead.

All Aboard—NESTOR—FEBRUARY 12.—Eddie boards a train for his uncle's where he is to meet the girl that is to be his future wife. Victoria takes the same train, bound for her aunt's to meet her future husband. They become acquainted, and are the butt of a number of amusing incidents which are brought about by the porter and three children that were left in Eddie's care by one of the passengers. They are married on the train by a minister, not knowing that they are fulfilling their relatives' wishes. The knowledge comes as a big and pleasant surprise to them both.

A Bogus Bandit—VICTOR—FEBRUARY 12.—Buck Carson, a cowboy, reads a description of Bat Collins, an outlaw wanted by the sheriff, and recognizes him as the man who held him up the night before. The reward offered for Collins is $500. Buck meets an old drifter and his daughter who are in great want, and generously decides to give himself up to the old man as Collins in order that he may obtain the reward. The cowboys decide to lynch the notorious outlaw. Meanwhile the real outlaw has held up a ranchman in the vicinity. He rides to tell the sheriff and arrives just in time to prevent Buck's being lynched. The old man tells his story, and a collection is taken up among the men to relieve his wants. Buck finds his reward in the girl's love.

The Heart of Sampson—101 BISON—FEBRUARY 13.—Val Sampson and his sister, Nan, live in a sort of a primitive way in a cabin in the Canadian mountains. Old Foxen, a trapper, looks upon Nan with the love of a father. Cash Durkin, meets Nan, gains her confidence, and betrays her. Nan, fearing that Durkin is not going to return to marry her according to his promise, visits his cabin and finds it deserted. Foxen tells Val of Durkin's perfidy, and they proceed to the man's cabin to make him keep his promise. The find Nan lying on the floor dead, Durkin's picture clasped in her hands. Val sets out to find Durkin, and, on their meeting, a fight to the death ensues.

Terrors of the Jungle—101 BISON—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 13.—Paula Deering and Bill Jonas, the sole survivors of a wrecked schooner, are stranded on the coast of Africa. Bill's advances become so repulsive that Paula leaves him, and plunges into the jungle. She loses her way, and is found, half starved, by Dirk Vedder, a wild animal trapper. Bill comes upon the party and flies into a rage on discovering that Paula and Dirk are in love. The two men come to blows and Bill, beaten, leaves the camp, vowing vengeance. A year elapses. Paula and Dirk are now married. Bill, a veritable wildman of the jungle, steals their baby, and returns to the jungle with it. A short time afterwards Dirk misses the child, puts his dog on Bill's trail, and pursues him. Hampered by the baby, Bill makes but little headway, and finally drops it. Dirk finds the baby, and returns home with it, forgetting his desire for revenge. The next day he searches for Jonas, and finds his remains at the entrance to a lioness' den.

Won With Dynamite—JOKER—FEBRUARY 13.—Much against Papa Higgins' wishes Mandy encourages Tom's attentions. The town council resolves that the constable must round up a desperate outlaw who has been terrorizing the community. Higgins accepts the inevitable and starts out to hunt the man. He finds him, but Black Bart proves to be so bad that Higgins takes refuge in an auto truck. Bart visits the constable's home and makes love to Mandy. Her mother, hearing her scream, calls out the deputies. Bart presses the truck into service and tries to make his escape with Mandy, but Tom takes up the pursuit, and soon overtakes the truck. In trying to fight off Tom's party Bart explodes the dynamite with which the truck is loaded, and its occupants are blown skyward. Bart lands in the waiting constables' arms. Higgins gives Tom permission to marry Mandy as a reward for his bravery.

Sight of the Blind—ECLAIR—FEBRUARY 14.—The monotony of minding her father's country store wears on Edna King, and she is delighted when an attractive stranger stops in town. During Mr. King's absence the stranger induces Edna to go away with him. Before leaving Edna prepares some medicine for her blind sister, instructing her to take it at five o'clock. On arriving in the city Edna is quickly disillusioned as to the stranger's motives in taking her away from home. At the same time she realizes that in her haste has put a poison tablet in her sister's dose of medicine. The country girl tells her story to a police sergeant. He sees the necessity of prompt action, obtains an auto, and, accompanied by Edna, races for the girl's home. They arrive just in time to knock the glass of "medicine" out of the blind girl's hand.

Wolves of Society—REX—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 14.—Paula, an adventuress, and her accomplice, Gilbert Carstairs, work themselves in Henry Mayhew's confidence, posing as brother and sister, and later Paula and Mayhew become married. Ruth Mayhew, the old man's niece, dislikes the atmosphere of the house with its new mistress, and leaves. Richard Dare, her sweetheart, is greatly disappointed on returning from an engineering trip in Mexico at not finding her at home. In front of the house he meets an outcast who tells him of events in the past of Paula and Carstairs. Years before the man had been a trusted employee in a bank, but he met Paula, became fascinated by her, and in time betrayed his employer's trust to obtain money to meet the siren's demands. Dare notifies the police of the character of the pair that are plotting Mayhew's ruin, and they are arrested. By chance Ruth and Dare meet, and she consents to return home to her uncle's home to live.

Alliance

The Chocolate Soldier—(FIVE REELS).—Major Spiridoff is in love with Nadina, daughter of Colonel Popoff. Both officers belong to the Bulgarian army and at the declaration of war between Bulgaria and Servia they leave for the front. Lieutenant Bumerli, a young Swiss adventurer, joins the Servian army, and after a battle is pursued by a number of Bulgarians. He lives on chocolate drops for several days, and in the end he escapes by getting in Nadina's room, she protecting him. Her mother and cousin are attracted to him as well as she and the three give him their pictures when he leaves, putting them in Popoff's coat which they give Bumerli in order that he may escape detection. Peace is declared and Bumerli and Popoff are sent to sign the treaty of peace. They become friendly and he tells Popoff of the manner in which he escaped and laughs to think how angered the "fool husband of one of the women" would be if he should ever know. Spiridoff and Popoff return home and tell Nadina and the other two women of what the Swiss adventurer had told them. Consternation follows, when Popoff asks for his coat. Bumerli anxious to repay the favor restores the coat to the ladies and the recognition is mutual. The women are worried about the photographs in the pocket of the coat, but Bumerli has secured them. The wedding of Spiridoff and Nadina is about to take place and Bumerli is very sad, until Colonel Popoff discovers the picture of Nadina given the adventurer and breaks the engagement. Nadina and Bumerli then discover their love for one another.

Box Office

The Girl I Left Behind Me—Box Office—(Five Reels).—Robert Edeson has the leading role in this picture, as Lieutenant Hawksworth. Claire Whitney gives grace and charm to "the girl," and Stuart Holmes interprets the part of the coward. Irene Warfield characterizes Fawn Afraid, an Indian girl. The action takes place in and about a lonely frontier army post in the West, and the majority of the exterior scenes were made at Fort Assiniboine, Montana, this assuring the rugged scenery, real cavalry troopers, and real Indians that give the picture realistic atmosphere. The opening scene introduces gallant Lieutenont Hawksworth, who is in love and loved by the commander's daughter. The commander, however, favors another officer as the girl's suitor, and, at a dance held at the post, announces their engagement. While the dance is still going on, both lieutenants are sent out with a regiment to quell an uprising among the Indians. Hawksworth's rival proves to be a coward but, on returning to the post, reports Hawksworth as being the cause of the regiment's defeat. A daring ride to a neighboring fort for help vindicates Hawksworth, and moves the commander to consent to his marriage to his daugther. C. R. C.

Paramount

Mistress Nell—Famous Players—(Five Reels).—In this noted drama of the days of gay King Charles II, dominated by the heroism and gallantry that marked that brilliant period, Mary Pickford plays the role of pretty Nell Gwyn, the favorite of the public and the monarch of England, whose bravery and wit save her royal lover from treachery at home and abroad, and free him at the same time from the toils of a designing woman, who tries to steal his heart from Nell, as well as to wrest his kingdom from him, to give to France. It is Louise, Duchess of Portsmouth, who undertakes this double plot, but little Nell cleverly detects her treacherous plans. After angering and baffling Louise in a score of counterplots Mistress Nell, from a hiding place, sees the signing of certain papers which are to place England in the hands of France if they reach their destination. This, Nell determines, shall never be, and in the guise of a young blade of fashion she wins the confidence of Louise, and is herself given the important documents to deliver. Needless to say, the papers are never delivered, except to the King of England, together with a missive from Louise, which, intended for France's monarch, plainly reveals her duplicity. How Nell further outwits the vengeful woman and wins back her royal lover's heart is dramatically developed in this dashing romance.

Pathe

The Poisoned Room—(Episode Five of The Exploits of Elaine)—Pathe—(Two Reels).—The Clutching Hand sprays the interior of Elaine's boudoir with arsenic and then so arranges electric wires in the basement that hydrogen is released from the water pan of the furnace, passes up through the pipes and mixes with the arsenic to form a deadly gas. Both Elaine and her dog are overcome by the fumes and a physician is first summoned and later Craig Kennedy. The detective solves the mystery, though it endangers his life. A review will be found on page 191 of the February 6 issue.

The Vampire—(Episode Six of the Exploits of Elaine)—Pathe—(Two Reels).—The Clutching Hand's accomplice is shot by Elaine as he is about to enter her room, and when a great doctor is called, he declares the only way of saving the man's life is by a transfusion of blood operation. The Clutching Hand kidnaps Elaine, and prepares to make use of her blood in restoring the life of his tool. Elaine's collie leads Kennedy and the police to the hiding place of the Clutching Hand in time to save the life of Elaine, though too late to capture the Clutching Hand. See review, page 243 this issue.

It's a Long, Long Way to Tipperary—Pathe—(Three Parts).—The lighting effects in this feature are beautiful. This about explains the quality of its photography, for fully half, if not more, of its scenes represent night, most of them around campfires. The story has continuity and reflects human nature. Considering the subject, the present war, the story is cleverly handled, carefully avoiding anything that would seem like animosity for the German side. Briefly, it is of two young Irishmen who are in love with the same girl. They are also political enemies. When the war breaks out they forget their factional enmity, and enlist in the same regiment. One of them realizes that the other is the girl's favored suitor, and, when they both are in the enemy's territory and it is a question of which one is to escape, he sacrifices himself in order that his rival might return safely to the girl. A spirit of patriotism and nobility pervades the entire picture. This is evidenced in one place by the Irish regiment's cheering the Germans after a terrible battle with them. C. R. C.

Colonel Heeza Liar—Pathe.—This is an excruciatingly funny split-reel cartoon comedy from the pen of J. R. Bray. The colonel brags at the club about his prowess at "showing up" ghosts. One of the members takes him up on it, and makes a bet that he cannot rid a haunted castle of its ghostly visitors. The colonel accepts, and has a lively time between twelve and one, the ghosts' recreation hour. On the same reel is:

The Great Eared Bat of Madagascar—Pathe.—An interesting educational subject, showing views of the peculiar bat mentioned in the title. C. R. C.

The Police Dog—(Second Chapter)—Pathe—A one-reel cartoon comedy by C. T. Anderson. The police dog's human partner goes swimming, and after a thrilling experience with a shark, reaches shore to find that the dog has run away with his clothes. His subsequent action provokes the chief and the policeman is thrust into jail. C. R. C.

Beyond His Fondest Hopes—Pathe.—Tony, a newsboy, sees a dainty little girl pass his corner in an auto and wishes she would notice him. He falls asleep and dreams that she returns and takes him to the beach in the machine. There they have adventures with a life-guard and with an old maid, whose clothes they take away. Finally the little girl's maid finds them and chases Tony away. The newsboy wakes and realizes that such happiness was never meant for him.

Pathe News No. 8—The Washington, D. C., babies competing for prizes; the Federal League and Organized Baseball forces in Chicago for their lawsuit; Boy Scouts being drilled at Carlisle; the launching of the new American submarine at Quincy, Mass.; Governor Manning succeeds former Governor Blease in Columbia, S. C.; the opening of the U. S. Custom House of Boston, Mass.; funeral of the deputies killed at the New Jersey fertilizer plant; Martin Brumbaugh succeeds John K. Tener as governor of Pennsylvania; Harry K. Thaw leaving Manchester, N. H., for New York; the war department, showing views from both sides which depicted the most important events recently transpired.

Pathe News No. 9—The Great Northern, a new turbine liner, leaves Philadelphia for San Francisco; labor conditions under investigation in New York City; the snow melter, which is said to keep the streets clean, at work in Chicago; Mayor Curley of Boston talks with Mayor Rolph of San Francisco over the transcontinental telephone; Billy Sunday in Philadelphia requested to visit New York; the latest Spring sytles; training the English recruits for battle at Salisbury Plain, Eng.; war views from Ypres, Belgium; Neuilly-Sur-Seine, France; Maidenhead, Eng.; Nieuport, Belgium; Vincennes, France, and Menin, Belgium.

Fires of Affliction—Pathe—(Three Reels)—A woman is married to a widower, and her husband and his son both make life so miserable for her that she leaves home and takes a place as a nurse to an aged and wealthy invalid. He has a young friend who asks the nurse to marry him. This she cannot do, but she admits her love and tells him to wait for her. Then she goes home to accept her husband's offer of a divorce. He refuses to make good, and commences renewed insults. Fortunately, he dies in an angry fit and the troubled wife is able to find happiness with her lover. The closing scenes are particularly effective. C. R. C.

Thanhouser Syndicate

$20,000,000 Mystery—(Episode Twelve)—Thanhouser—Howard, superintendent of the Zudora mine, journeys to New York and delivers a vast quantity of diamonds to Madam Duval and her band of conspirators, but determines to tell Zudora of the fortune which is rightfully her's. Ere he can do so, he is overpowered by Captain Radcliffe and other members of the band and confined in a private madhouse. Later Jim Baird manages to secure the diamonds which Howard has brought over from South Africa, and takes them to Zudora, where he conceals them in her home. Suspecting that she has them, Radcliffe and others of the band search her home, and when she awakens kidnap her and convey her to the same madhouse in which Horton is confined. See review on page 249 this issue.

United

The Doll Wife—Smallwood.—The Grays are a happy couple until Donald's mother arrives and takes the reins away from the young wife. Ethel by accident discovers a half written letter that mother has written in which she says that "her son has married a doll." Ethel has borne all meekly, but this is too much—she rebels and in order to punish mother she decides to become for a time a real doll. When Donald brings two friends home for dinner he is horrified to see his wife in knee dresses and playing with a doll which she compels the guests to kiss. The doctor comes and examines Ethel and pronounces her hopelessly insane. Ethel, when she sees Donald's sorrow, is hardly able to continue her part of the doll baby, but mother must be taught her lesson and she goes through with it until mother is brought to realize that the girl she thought a doll is really a capable woman.

What's in a Name—GAUMONT.—John Dale, an old millionaire, visits the home of a friend and falls in love with the picture of his friend's daughter, Bess. He leaves a letter for his friend, saying that he will give the girl a check for $100,000 when she becomes Mrs. John Dale. John Dale, Jr., Dale's nephew, finds the check and knowing that if his uncle has a wife he will be cut off, has the old man kidnapped by his friends and then weds Bess himself. When the uncle is released and visits his friend, Mr. and Mrs. John Dale confront him and ask for the check which was to be given Bess when she became Mrs. Dale. The uncle proves himself to be a sport and donates the money.

Universal Special

The Master Key—UNIVERSAL—(EPISODE TWELVE)—FEBRUARY 1.—The shopkeeper tells Ruth and Dore of the strange Hindu to whom he sold the image which, they think, contains the key to the Master Key mine, and they secure passage on a steamer bound for the Orient. Sir Donold Faversham learns that Ruth is in Los Angeles, and calls upon her. On being told of their intended trip he offers his services, having been, at one time, in the British service in India. In passing through the streets Ruth's sympathy is aroused for a poor beggar who is being tormented by the natives, and she goes to his rescue. Later the old man proves his gratitude to her. Disguised as natives the party enter the temple in search of the idol. In trying to steal it Dore is captured. Sir Donald offers to effect his release if Ruth will promise to marry him. Torn by conflicting emotions, she promises to marry the Englishman, and is rewarded by seeing Dore rescued, after a terrific fight with the Hindu guards.

World

Money—KEANOGRAPH—(FIVE REELS).—John D. Maximillian, commonly known as "Croesus," secures control of the wheat market of the world. He is assisted by Cyrus Livingstone, his junior partner. "Croesus" has a daughter, Ruth, from whom the knowledge of her father's operations are withheld. When a number of friends visit Maximillian's steel works escorted by Livingstone the latter takes advantage of the absence of the superintendent, George Crosby, to court his sweetheart, Hope Ross, a stenographer. When Crosby defends Hope he gains Livingstone's enmity and is about to be discharged, but Ruth saves him and Ruth and Hope become friends. The oppression of the workmen leads to a strike. Maximillian refuses their demand and gives a banquet to his friends. While the banquet is in progress the striking forces assault his home. Livingstone attempts to kiss Ruth during the orgie and she is rescued by Crosby. He also manages to send the strikers away from her father's home. Ruth becomes interested in charity work with Hope and falls in love with Crosby, but later she realizes the love affair existing between Crosby and Hope and steps aside. Livingstone and some anarchists plan to abduct Ruth and hold her for ransom, as Livingstone has been stripped of his fortune by "Croesus." Hope, wearing Ruth's cloak, is mistaken for her and kidnapped and Crosby pursues the abductors in a taxi. The yacht upon which Livingstone escapes with the girl runs through the dangerous reefs of Devil's Gap and is eventually wrecked. Crosby manages to rescue Hope. A great lightning storm sweeps the city of New York and the palace of "Croesus" is struck and destroyed by flames. "Croesus" himself perishes within it and Ruth becomes heir to his wonderful works. She sees that justice is done and happily steps aside when Hope marries Crosby.

Miscellaneous

The Black Envelope—PICTURE PLAYHOUSE—(FOUR REELS).—Jim Creelman, hard pressed for funds in the campaign for mayor, borrows $20,000 from Olga Bateman, an actress who has fallen in love with him. This leads him to success in the campaign. After his election he meets Syble Chatfield, fiance of De Bussy, editor of a paper, and falls in love with her. He wins her from De Bussy and they are married. On their honeymoon they are surprised to read in the paper that the loan made by Olga was never repaid. Creelman tells all to his wife and she agrees to help him in defeating the blackmailing scheme, which they know De Bussy and Olga have planned. The receipt for the money which Creelman paid Olga in settlement of the loan was placed in a black envelope, which disappeared, and when De Bussy meets the faithful wife later tells her that the envelope is in his possession and that she may secure it by coming to his house that night. To save her husband's honor she goes and obtains the receipt. When De Bussey insults her she kills him, and her husband, finding her in his apartments, accuses her of being disloyal. In desperation she kills herself as soon as he leaves the house.

The Lure of Alaska—ALASKA FILM CORPORATION—(SEVEN REELS).—An educational film showing the interior of Alaska with its beautiful scenery. Many marvels hitherto unknown are shown in this film, which Dr. Leonard Sugden spent more than three years in taking. The film pictures Alaska more vividly than it has ever been described by a book.

The Folly of a Life of Crime—U. S. FEATURE FILM—(SIX REELS)—This film presents George Santag, the well known train robber and deals with the events which lead to his becoming a criminal. With his brother, John, and Chris Evans they become outlaws, greed being largely responsible for their actions. Later George was captured and his career cut short, but John and Evans led the sheriff's posse a warm chase. On several occasions they became so bold as to visit the posse's headquarters and escaped after killing several of the men. In the end, however, Chris is captured and John is killed, the three bandits being made to suffer for their life of crime.

feigning sleep. When the hotel staff arrive at the room they apparently waken Brown from heavy slumbers and when accused by the woman he points to her head and says "nobody home." The woman is taken for one demented and Brown enjoys a good night's rest. On the same reel:

Zoological—Nolege.—This subject is a study of all sorts of animals in captivity.

(THE FOLLOWING SYNOPSES COVER THE KRITERION RELEASES FROM FEBRUARY 1 TO 5.)

An Intercepted Gift — Alhambra— (Two Reels).—Al Ross, an outlaw, steals a string of pearls belonging to Captain Torres and gives them to his sweetheart, Alice Montrose. Captain Torres sees the pearls on Alice's neck and asks where she got them. She tells him Ross gave them to her. Torres threatens to arrest them both unless she marries him. She refuses and both are arrested. When in prison Torres offers to free Ross if she will marry him. She consents and tells Ross of the agreement. Ross, feigning illness, gets the guard within his cell, overpowers him and escapes. He follows Torres and Alice and rescues her. They shoot Torres and his guards, ride over the border into the land of freedom.

Frank's Nightmare—Alhambra.—Frank introduces Fred, his pal, to his fiancee Rena, and at once becomes jealous. This jealousy is accentuated when he finds Fred looking at Rena's picture. He goes to bed, and falling asleep, dreams. The story on the screen then shows Frank's nightmare. Fred climbs out of bed, dresses and leaves the room. Frank follows in his pajamas. Suspecting Fred of planning to elope with Rena he stays close behind. This is exactly what Fred has planned and when Rena refuses he carries her off. After saving her from Indians, highwaymen, counterfeiters, and Fred's hired assassins, Frank wakes up to find himself being shaken by Fred, who wants to know what the trouble is.

Capturing Stella—C K.—The sheriff of a small western town in love with Stella, is being jollied because of his inability to locate a horse thief, who is causing a great deal of trouble in the neighborhood. Stella meets the horse thief, and not knowing who he is consents to go to a dance with him. The sheriff, seeing them together, becomes jealous. Going home from the dance he sees a fellow put a note under the wheel of an abandoned wagon and when he has left he takes the note, reads it and discovers that the fellow Stella is infatuated with is the horse thief. Stella is taken home by the thief and he takes her to his cabin. The sheriff follows and is shot in the arm by the rustler. The sheriff, sitting at the table, rolls a cigarette, throws the tobacco in the thief's face, binds and overpowers him, then turns to the girl. When the rest of the posse arrive upon the scene, they find the girl and the sheriff obvious to all excepting themselves. They lead the thief away and leave the other two in each other's arms.

The Adopted Baby—Monty—(Two Reels).—This is an interesting child story. A baby is abandoned on the doorsteps of a wealthy family. The child of the house discovers the baby and thinking it more to her liking than her dolls decides to take and keep it in her doll house. Finding it difficult to keep the baby without detection it is brought to the house. The father and mother decide to adopt the baby in place of one that is gone.

Thoughts of Tonight—Navajo—(Two Reels).—A young easterner meets a girl of the mountains and learns that she is the daughter of the guide. He boards at their home during his stay and Black Steve, a half-wit, takes a dislike to him. While out hunting the easterner shoots the guide by accident and rushes to the cabin, arriving just as Black Steve has overpowered the girl. He saves her and they return to where the guide had fallen, but he had regained consciousness and wandered away. The half-wit sets a trap for the easterner and after he is caught in it goes to get the girl. The guide regains his memory when he sees a picture of his own home in a neighboring camp and on the way home gets a note which the easterner has tied to the horse's mane. He arrives home in time to save the girl from Black Steve and a few moments later the latter is bitten by a rattlesnake and dies. The guide and his daughter rescue the easterner and he asks the girl to become his wife.

$500 Reward—Paragon—(Two Reels). Garth, a country doctor, is prejudiced against modern medical methods and resents the entrance of Kent, a young surgeon, in the village. He is further incensed when his daughter falls in love with Kent. Garth falls into the snares of Shrubbs, a money lender, and the latter threatens to foreclose a mortgage on his cottage. Tom, Garth's servant, steals a note from Shrubbs' office and the latter offers $500 reward for anyone who will identify the thief. Circumstantial evidence points to the fact that Kent is guilty. Tom gives the note to Winnifred and she and Tom go to the court house to clear Kent. Tom confesses his guilt and demands the $500 reward and Shrubbs is compelled to pay it to him. Kent, because Shrubbs suspected him, forces the money shark to let Tom go free. The doctor then consents to the marriage of Kent and Winnifred.

A Man for A' That—Punchinello.—Vera's father insists she marry Count Di Lucca, a man whom she has never seen. Vera objects to the marriage. A persistent suitor also hears of this proposed marriage and schemes to kidnap the count and substitute an organ grinder in his place. Di Lucca, desiring to ascertain the girl's worth, changes place with his valet. As a result the valet is kidnapped and when the count arrives, after being delayed, he finds the household in a turmoil because of the antics of the supposed count. His valet escapes from the office in which the kidnappers put him and hurries to the house. After due explanations the count reveals himself and all are made happy. Vera has no further objections to the marriage and we see her resting contentedly in the count's arms.

A Wonderful Lamp—Pyramid.—This picture shows the adventures of a tramp who dreams he finds an old lamp. There suddenly appears before him a genie who says that he is the slave of the lamp and anything that he desires, as he is now possessor of the lamp, he will procure for him. After many delightful adventures the tramp awakes to find a policeman standing over him. On the same reel is:

Cotton Industry—Nolege.—This is a very interesting film showing the latest inventions for the betterment of the cotton industry.

Tainted — Santa Barbara — (Two Reels).—Richmond is the man with the taint. His child is born blind and Richmond begs Dr. Jackson, the man with the gambling taint, to keep this fact from his wife. At the same time the wife of McGraw, the man with the liquor taint, gives birth to a child and the doctor changes the babies. Twenty years pass and the children have grown to manhood and womanhood. McGraw is killed by a fall and the girl, who is blind, has to sell flowers for a living. Jackson, heavily in debt from gambling, constantly demands money from Richmond and the latter determines to confess all to his wife, but Jackson's death leaves him the only one who knows of the change of the children. The boy falls in love with the girl, whose place he has filled in the Rickmond household and they are married. This saves Richmond from the obligation of confessing to his wife.

Percy Made Good—Santa Barbara.—Percy calls for Betty and takes her out in his auto; father takes another auto and pursues them. He catches up with them and makes Betty come home with him. Percy follows and goes to Betty's home; they plan to elope. Percy decides that if he is going to be married he needs more money-so he goes to the bank and draws out all of his money. He goes back to Betty's home and finds a check of father's on the floor. He rushes to the bank to have it cashed. Father returns for the check and cannot find it. When Percy returns he tells father the bank failed at two, but that the check has been cashed. Father, after a little persuasion, gives Betty to Percy and all ends well.

The Boob's Elopement—Thistle.—The Boob and his sweetheart Rena plan to elope and Rena's father overhears the plans. Freddy, a lunatic, escapes from the asylum. He arrives at the farm and makes father exchange clothes with him. He then follows Rena and the Boob. After many adventures the lunatic catches them and when they discover he is perfectly harmless they go to a minister and are made one. Freddy is led back to captivity and father thinks he might as well give his consent and blessings.

The Foster Brother—Trump—(Two Reels).—Paul Burke is an adopted son of Doctor Burke. The doctor had promised the dying wife of a drunkard and gambler to care for the child. Paul bears three scars upon his wrist as a result of his father's fury while in a drunken frenzy. Edwin Burke, the doctor's son, is in love with Edith, a ward. Paul becomes jealous and goes out to a gambling den. While playing poker he is caught cheating by the owner of the den, Paul's real father. The gambler recognizes his son by the marks on his wrist. He takes advantage of the fact that the young man is in debt and has cheated at cards and persuades Paul to steal a formula of a cancer cure which the doctor has discovered. While Paul and his real father are in the home of the doctor to secure the valuable data, Paul turns a gun on him and in the fight that follows is injured. The police are after the gambler and trap him in the laboratory, where he is killed in a skirmish. Paul saves the formula and proves that he is a man.

New Characters in Pathe Serial Film

BY FLORENCE M. ENK

IN "The Double Trap," the seventh episode of the "Exploits of Elaine," the Pathe serial of mystery, we are introduced to "Weeping Mary" and "Gertrude the Pippin," two new characters who work in conjunction with the Clutching Hand to dispose of Elaine Dodge and Craig Kennedy.

Heretofore all the Clutching Hand's assistants have been men, but this time he employs two women, one to trap Elaine, the other to trap Craig, believing that in this way he will be able to dispose of the two of them at one time. The introduction of the two new characters adds more interest and no little amount of comedy.

The fight which takes place between Craig Kennedy and one of the emmissaries of the Clutching Hand at the top of a church steeple, many feet in the air, will cause the spectators to hold their breath more than once.

"Weeping Mary," representing herself as Mrs. Taylor Dodge, the lawful wife of Taylor Dodge, one of the victims of the Clutching Hand whose murder has caused Craig Kennedy and Elaine Dodge to seek the Clutching Hand, presents herself at Mr. Bennett's office and desires an interview with him.

Bennett, who is Elaine's lawyer, refuses to see her unless she states her business in writing, and while she is doing this Elaine enters. Noticing the weeping attitude Mrs. Dodge has assumed, she questions Bennett, who just then receives the note "Weeping Mary" has written, in which she states that she is the lawful wife of Taylor Dodge.

Elaine becomes indignant and demands proof of the marriage which "Weeping Mary" is very willing to supply. All unsuspecting Elaine accompanies "Weeping Mary" and her son to the church where the supposed ceremony between "Weeping Mary" and

The Clutching Hand captures Elaine.

Taylor Dodge was performed. Here they are greeted by one of the helpers of the Clutching Hand, disguised as a minister. He asks the ladies to be seated. Elaine taking a chair near a closet in which the Clutching Hand conceals himself and while the supposed minister pretends to look for the record of "Weeping Mary's" marriage with Taylor Dodge, he steps out and confronts Elaine. Elaine becomes frightened and tries to escape, but the Clutching Hand grabs her and puts her roughly back in the chair.

In the meantime, "Gertrude the Pippin," a very beautiful woman, visits Kennedy's apartments and appeals to him to recover her jewels which have been stolen.

Kennedy, suspecting the meaning of all this, assumes a very interested attitude and, finally, he and Jameson, his assistant, accompany "Gertrude" to her home.

While Kennedy and Jameson pretend to look for clues and at a time when their backs are turned, the emmissaries of the Clutching Hand emerge from behind some curtains and cover the two men with revolvers.

Kennedy pulls out a small box which he informs the men contains a chemical so dangerous that were the box to be dropped the buildings in the entire vicinity would be blown to pieces, and then invites them to shoot. At this information they become frightened and all manage to escape with the exception of one man, who does not enjoy himself when Kennedy unwraps the box supposed to contain the dangerous chemical and shows that it only contains candy.

The fight on the church steeple.

After many threats they induce the man to direct them to the church where Elaine is held prisoner. Kennedy releases Elaine and then pursues her captor to the top of the steeple where a hair-raising fight takes place. Elaine follows and shoots, killing the emmissary, who falls to the ground, bearing the cross he had clung to during the struggle.

Kennedy descends to the small balcony in the steeple where Elaine stands and again we see the love which is gradually coming to these two brave young people, Elaine Dodge and Craig Kennedy.

Pennsylvania Exhibitors Form League

On January 28, at the end of a three day session in Harrisburg, the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania started upon its career as a concrete body embracing exhibitors throughout the state of Pennsylvania. Ben H. Zerr of Reading is the president of the organization, G. W. Sahner, first vice-president; Gilbert C. Miller, Plymouth, second vice-president; James Delves, Pittsburgh, secretary; Charles Segall, Philadelphia, treasurer and Frank A. Gould, Reading, publicity agent. Frank J. Herrington, Pittsburgh, was elected national vice-president.

Nine separate locals were organized, being located in Philadelphia, Wilkesbarre, Reading, Harrisburg, Williamsport, Altoona, Pittsburgh, Erie and Dubois. The first four locals have been in existence for some time as independent organizations. Williamsport will be an entirely new local, while the others have been formed by men who heretofore were affiliated with the Pittsburgh local of the old state association. The committee in charge of the formation of the local districts for each of the nine locals are as follows: Nat Fischer, Philadelphia; J. G. Hansen, Reading; J. S. Thomas, Plymouth; Frank Woods, Indiana; F. B. Whiteman, Roaring Springs, Peter Magaro, Harrisburg and A. G. Thomas, Pittsburgh.

The convention expressed itself as being decidedly against legalized censorship and a committee was elected to do its utmost to repeal the Pennsylvania censor law. Peter Magaro, Fred J. Herrington, Charles Segall, Francis E. Devlin, and Ben H. Zerr were the exhibitors elected on this committee. The exchange and supply men's representatives were Hunt Miller, George W. Bennethum, Harry Schalbe, J. H. Butner, and L. F. Levison. Hon. A. C. Stein was elected as honorary member.

Numerous addresses were made during the convention, some of the speeches being made by Marion S. Pearce, who invited the organization to become a member of the national body, Peter Magaro, who spoke in favor of a law permitting the separation of white and colored patrons in the picture theaters and J. W. Binder of the National Board of Censorship, the theme of whose speech was "legalized against voluntary censorship."

As it is probable that the organization will be given a charter by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, it was found unnecessary to draw up a constitution. Per capita assessments of seventy-five cents for the quarter beginning January 1 and ending April 1 are to be collected immediately, and out of this money the state league will pay the national organization the amount due for a charter. Another meeting is scheduled for June 7, 8 and 9, at which time the membership will have materially increased.

Four Reelers on Mutual Program

It is reported that after March 8 the Mutual Film Corporation will release a four or five reel feature on every Monday and Thursday. These features will appear on the regular program, and will be the product of all the Mutual companies in turn. Some of the most famous actors and actresses in the country, it is said, will appear in these big productions.

The first one to be released will probably come from D. W. Griffith, featuring Harry Woodruff of "Brown of Harvard" fame. This is to be the first Monday four-reel release, and it is understood that the American Company will follow with the first Thursday feature. According to present plans all of the well-known Mutual companies will then alternate in regular sequence in supplying the augmented attractions.

It is also rumored that the productive power of the Reliance, Majestic, American, Beauty, Broncho, Domino, Kay Bee, Keystone, Thanhouser and Princess plants is being increased to meet the demands of the proposed enlarged program.

Resigns from Position

Agnes Egan Cobb, who is well known for her work in placing the Leading Players Film Corporation and Features Ideal on the market, is said to have resigned the management of the aforesaid corporations, as well as from the board of directors of the Eclair Film Company. Mrs. Cobb has left for Toronto to visit her brother for a week, and upon her return to New York will temporarily assume the management of the Egan Film Company, until the complete recovery of her brother, Charles S. Egan, who is rapidly gaining in health and is expected back in his office in the near future. Soon after his return, Mrs. Cobb expects to make an announcement of importance to the film industry.

Another Essanay Secret Service Story

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

THOSE who enjoyed Francis X. Bushman's exploits as a secret service man will be delighted to learn that another of the secret service series will be available on February 18, when the three-reel picture entitled "The Accounting," is announced for release.

The story is excellent in every respect, being well put together and leading naturally up to a big climax. There are surprises galore scattered throughout the three reels, and one's interest is consequently sustained throughout.

In plot development and construction the picture is undoubtedly one of the best which has been screened for some time and is remarkably easy to follow, though the mystery element also predominates.

As the story begins one sees Gordon Bannock, a U. S. secret service operator, ordered by his chief to get certain papers bearing upon the alliance between Retrograd and Galia, two European principalities. The papers, Bannock is told, are of supreme importance, and he is also warned to beware of Olga Petroff, a clever feminine spy who is known to be operating in the employ of the government of Retrograd.

The scene then shifts to the European principality and one beholds Bannock in the disguise of an interpreter, this enabling him to gain admission to the council of the officials of the two governments, who are bent on forming an alliance. Through interpreting for the officials, he hears the entire proceedings, and is able to secure the treaty after it is signed, though in doing so he is forced to disclose his identity to Sargall, prime minister of Retrograd.

The soldiers attack the innkeeper and his wife.

Immediately Bannock departs and Sargall regains consciousness, he summons Olga Petroff, who appears veiled; and he commissions her to recover the papers.

Olga Petroff discloses her real identity.

Bannock is forced to defend himself.

In the meanwhile Bannock visits a little inn, and there meets the inn-keeper, his wife and their daughter Velvia. Bannock is charmed with the girl's beauty, and is about to begin a flirtation with her when soldiers are heard approaching, and Bannock prevails upon the inn-keeper to mislead them, while he escapes through a back entrance and hides in a nearby forest.

After the soldiers depart, Bannock returns to discover that the inn-keeper and his wife have been killed, while the pretty Velvia lies sobbing on the floor, her body across those of her dead parents. Knowing the girl to be all alone in the world Bannock asks her to marry him, she consents and they travel to another inn, where they take shelter for the night.

Late that night Bannock, sitting alone before the fire-place examining a document he has drawn from his pocket, hears his wife approaching. She snatches the paper from his hand and declares that she is none other than Olga Petroff, the spy. With mocking laughter, Olga taunts him about the way she outwitted him, and then departs to deliver the papers to Sargall.

Bannock, after her departure, secures the real treaty, which has been concealed under a carpet in his room and smiles to think she has been foiled in spite of her treachery. Later, as he realizes his wife will suffer the wrath of Sargall, when the papers are found to be blank, Bannock decides to follow her back to Retrograd. Hiding on a balcony outside of Sargall's room, he sees the blank papers delivered, and Sargall gives Olga the alternative of suffering punishment for her failure to secure the real papers or of submitting herself to the love he has long felt for her.

Horrified, Bannock leaps through a window and overpowers the prime minister while Olga, who really loves Bannock, falls into his arms and declares that she will flee with him. Knowing their safety to be endangered, Bannock covers Sargall with a revolver, and forces him to accompany them in an automobile to the border.

Lubin Signs Mary Charleson

Pretty and vivacious Mary Charleson has joined the Lubin players and will shortly be seen in a series of novel Lubin productions. Her first appearance will be in "The Governor," a three-reel drama, written by Shannon Fife, in which she will play opposite John Ince. Following this she will be featured in a series of fifteen one-reel romances called "Road O' Strife" by Emmett Campbell Hall. Miss Charleson has thousands of screen friends and has played leads with John Bunny, Maurice Costello, Edwin August and many other prominent photoplayers. Her birthplace was picturesque old Dungannon, not far from Belfast, Ireland. When she came to this country her parents took her to Los Angeles and there won innumerable friends while playing in "Rip Van Winkle." After that she played in stock companies in different cities in California and did a few seasons in comic opera and vaudeville before entering pictures. Miss Charleson arrived in Philadelphia this week and immediately began work upon her first picture.

The Frohman Amusement Corporation

The Frohman Amusement Corporation comes to the film industry with a foundation that establishes it as a most welcome addition. This newcomer has sound financial backing, a business man of tried ability at the head of the business department and no less a figure than Gustave Frohman, one of the famous three Frohman brothers, Daniel, Gustave and Charles, at the head of the artistic and producing departments.

It was William L. Sherrill who conceived the idea of the Frohman Amusement corporation and through his connections in the insurance and financial fields, where he has been a prominent figure for years, he interested some of the most prominent capitalists in New York City and Chicago in this film corporation. Gustave Frohman was induced to sign with the organization to superintend the making of films which they are determined to have clean, wholesome and appealing. The first thought of the corporation is for films which can be seen by the mothers and children. They feel that because a film appeals to this side of the household is no reason why it cannot be made so well that it will also appeal to the fathers and brothers.

The first production of this new organization is from the pen of Marie Hubert Krohman, author of several well-known dramatic successes. It is entitled "The Fairy and the Waif" and features three well known stars from the dramatic stage, all known for their remarkable work in handling children parts. The headliners are Mary Miles Minter, the original "Littlest Rebel," the child who appeared for four years with Dustin and William Farnum in this most successful play; Percy Helton, who has created such a lot of comment by his unusual and forceful characterization of the crippled boy in the latest George Cohan dramatic success, "The Miracle Man," and Willie Archie, who has for years been doing "fat boy parts" in big dramatic successes. The story is clean, strong and above all human.

Griffith Takes Over Liberty Theater

By an arrangement completed with Klaw and Erlanger late Saturday, D. W. Griffith, will take over the Liberty theater in West Forty-second street, New York, at the end of this month for the purpose of presenting there his great spectacle "The Birth of a Nation."

"The Birth of a Nation" is the complete working out of all the contributory themes in American history upon which Thomas Dixon founded his famous novel and play "The Clansman." Where the play proper touched only upon phases of the reconstruction period in the South, the Griffith treatment by means of the marvelously enlarged new art of motion picture embraces the entire historical relationship of the slavery question to the development of American history. After arrangements had been made with Thomas Dixon to utilize his well known story, the author suggested the change in name so that the scope and tremendous appeal of the enlarged story could be more comprehensively covered in the title.

Scene from the Griffith feature "The Battle of a Nation," in which the Ku Klux Klan is seen arriving to quell a riot in the negro section.

The taking of the Liberty by Mr. Griffith and his associates realizes another advance in the art of motion pictures and brings theatergoers up to the $2 moving picture.

Over 18,000 people were employed in the making of the great spectacle and a specially written score that elaborates the various themes of the story will be played as an accompaniment to the production by a symphony orchestra of 40 pieces.

"June" Saves Woman of Gambling House

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

AS the "Runaway June" serial continues the wisdom of the Reliance company's form of familiarizing a newcomer with what has gone before in the story becomes more apparent. The first sub-title tells briefly where June ran and why in the preceding episode, enabling one who did not see it to pick up the thread of the story right at the start. Then, after interest is aroused by the action and the developments of the plot, we are acquainted, by means of visions and reminiscences, with an outline of the entire story from its beginning. The cut-backs are necessarily short to prevent their becoming tiresome to those who have followed the serial from its first chapter, but are clear enough to give a chance spectator an outline of the plot.

She had lost money at bridge.

Episode five entitled "A Woman in Trouble" does not attempt anything startling in the way of thrills, and bears less on June's chase than any of the preceding installments, but it contains a drama with a strong human appeal, staged with conscientious regard for atmosphere and and detail in the settings. The presence of a few more women might have added more realism to the gambling room scene, but it is doubtful if anything but actual bloodshed could have contributed to Aunt Debby's sincerity in trying to prevent Marie's escaping her in the public market.

Bly gives notice of the police raid.

The last scene in the preceding installment showed June entering the house to which she was sent by an employment agency. She is ushered into the office, and, after a short talk with the woman in charge, is employed and instructed in her duties. She is horrified to find that she is in a gambling house, and that her duty is to keep a record of the outstanding notes against the patrons.

Aunt Debby tells of seeing June's maid.

Aunt Debby, the Moores' cook, goes marketing and meets Marie, June's maid. The old colored woman questions her as to her mistress' whereabouts, but receives no satisfaction. Indeed, Marie declares that she does not know her, and tries to escape, but Aunt Debby grabs her by the arm, knocks her down, and sits on her. The police interfere, favor Marie in their judgment, and attempt to arrest Aunt Debby, but the old cook is too stout to get into the patrol wagon. At Marie's request they release her, and she hurries to Ned's to tell him of her experience. Accompanied by him Aunt Debby returns to the market place, but no trace can be found of Marie, nor does anyone seem to know which way she went.

In the meantime June has made the acquaintance of Gwendolyn Perry, a patron of the place, whose life has been made miserable by her husband's stringency in regard to the money to be spent in running the household. She is given an allowance as though she were an employee, and has no way of obtaining money in case she exceeds it. Some time before she had lost money at bridge and had turned to the roulette table as a means of recouping her losses. Her account at present shows her to be indebted to the extent of $800, but, after considerable pleading she induces the keeper to accept her I. O. U. for further credit, and enters the adjoining room where she joins the other women at the gaming table.

The keeper calls up Mr. Perry, informs him of his wife's indebtedness, and asks him to make it good. He is furious on learning that his wife is at a gambling house, and threatens to have the place raided. Shortly afterwards he bursts into the office, pays his wife's debt, and asks that she be called into the room. June suspects from his manner that he intends to denounce Mrs. Perry, and summons the courage to tell him in very plain words that his wife's position and circumstances were caused by his selfishness and the office-like methods that he applied to the affairs of his home.

Her argument wins Perry, and he consents to forgive his wife and be more lenient. Mrs. Perry is seized with fear on seeing her husband and, fleeing into the other room, seizes the croupier's pistol and is about to shoot herself when June intervenes. The place is suddenly filled with smoke, a ruse of the keeper's and Blye's to fool the raiding police. June escapes in the confusion, closely followed by Blye.

New American Star

News has been received that a new star will shortly make his debut in a series of four-reel photoplays for the American Film Manufacturing Company. The new star is Harold Lockwood, who scored a tremendous success in such Famous Players' productions as "Tess of the Storm Country" and "Hearts Adrift," in which he supported Mary Pickford in the leading role. Mr. Lockwood has thousands of admirers scattered throughout the country made both during the time he served under the Famous Players' banner and the period just preceeding that, in which he appeared in pictures of the Selig brand, also with the Universal Nestor Company and the original Bison 101 Ranch Company. His rise in the world of pictures has been very rapid as it was only a little over four years ago that his debut occurred with the Selig Polyscope Company. Since joining the Famous Players Company Mr. Lockwood has supported not only Mary Pickford, but also such stars as Marguerite Clark in "Wildflower" and "The Crucible," John Barrymore in "Are You a Mason?" William H. Crane in "David Harum," Jack Emerson in "The Conspiracy," Henrietta Crosman in "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch," John Mason in "Jim the Penman" and Maclyn Arbuckle in "The County Chairman"; so you can easily see that the American Company is securing an exceedingly popular leading man who will undoubtedly make even more of a hit with the public as time goes on.

Harold Lockwood.

New Officers Elected

At the large and enthusiastic meeting of the International Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, held Thursday, February 4, 1915, at Room 210, Masonic Temple Building, Chicago, the following officers were elected for the period of 1915-16:

President, John H. Frundt, Ariston theater; vice-president, Harry Rose, Star theater; treasurer, William J. Sweeney; recording and financial secretary, Sidney Smith; sergeant-at-arms, Max Schwartz, Halfield theater.

The executive committee consists of H. L. Lieberthal, Colleen theater; J. Victor, Homan theater; T. M. May, Kenwood theater; H. M. Immenhausen, New Standard theater; David Toplin, Le Grand theater; D. W. Martin, Butler theater, and Harry Ascher, Panorama theater.

After the election an elaborate lunch was served. The installation of the newly elected officers will take place at the next regular meeting.

Take Over Broadway Theater

One of the most far-reaching theatrical deals of recent times has just been consummated by which the Broadway theater, one of the best known playhouses in New York, is transferred to new management, with a radical change in policy to be placed in immediate effect. The new lessees are incorporated as the Waybroad Company, controlled by Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players Film Co., and Stanley Mastbaum, one of the best known motion picture and theatrical men of Philadelphia.

Scene from Famous Players' "The Eternal City."

Beginning Saturday, February 20, the theater will inaugurate a policy of important feature photoplays to be produced by the Famous Players Film Co., which will be exhibited in the manner of regular theatrical attractions, with an admission charge ranging from twenty-five cents to a dollar.

Mutual to Move

It is rumored that the Mutual publicity department, now located at 29 Union Square, New York City, will soon be moved to the fifteenth floor of 71 West Twenty-third street, as will the Mutual executive offices and exchange now on the fourteenth floor of that building. The Western exchange, now at 145 West Forty-fifth street, will also move to new quarters in the Twenty-third street building, it is said. About 40,000 feet of additional floor space has been taken over to provide for the change. The publicity department alone comprises twenty-one people. The Reliance studio will also be moved, but to where has not yet been decided upon. It is expected the change will be made about March 1.

The New Universal Serial Starts

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

IF the first installment of the new serial being released by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, called "The Black Box," foreshadows what is to follow, it seems safe to predict that this mystery production will meet with public favor.

It has many of the elements which appear to make the "to-be-continued" films popular. To begin with, its chief character, Sanford Quest, criminologist, is a type which will ever be popular, and the interpretation given this role by Herbert Rawlinson, well known to picture fans through his splendid work in Universal special and program pictures, is clever and appealing. Then there are thrills, mystery, the use of novel devices by both Quest and his adversary and a slight suggestion of romance.

E. Phillips Oppenheim, known the world over as an author of excellent mystery stories, designed this series, and it seems to be typical of him. The production is being made under the guidance of Otis Turner, who has handled so many successful big pictures that he needs no recommendation to the exhibitors. The players who support Mr. Rawlinson in the principal roles are Anna Little, Frank Lloyd and William Worthington, the latter playing two roles. Great care has been given to the settings and the atmosphere of luxury in Quest's apartment, the home of Arleigh, an English nobleman, and the room in a New York hotel serves as a sharp contrast to the poverty of the crook's home and of the surrounding neighborhood. The photography is clear throughout.

The film opens with an introduction of Sanford Quest in his apartment. He is seen experimenting with a strange device, which the audience are told is a recently discovered explosive called anihaldyte, it being possible to control this so that it will send its force in one direction only. Quest has improved the explosive and adopted it for his own use. He is greatly pleased when he sees that he has been successful in his experiment.

In the home of Lord Arleigh in London excitement prevails. Arleigh's daughter has just received her father's permission to go to New York to study music. A letter arrives from a friend of Arleigh's, which brings the Englishman the information that his brother is still in South America, where he is searching for proof of the Darwinian theory and where he hopes to find the "missing link."

The girl goes to America in time, accompanied by her maid; and a butler who has been employed by her parents in England follows. One day the maid comes into the room and finds the girl murdered and the jewels which her father gave her, stolen. The police are notified but the case proves too much for them and they are forced to admit that they cannot secure a clue to the identity of the murderer.

Sanford Quest is called upon at this time and, after an examination of the room, drops a card upon which is written a message to the chief of police saying that he has found the criminal and that they need search no further. The maid finds the card and her actions betray her. Quest takes her with him to his apartment where, by means of hypnotism, he learns that Miss Arleigh was murdered by the former butler and that she assisted in planning the crime.

Quest allows her to go to the butler's den, telling her that at seven that evening she will have secured the jewels and that at that time he will expect her to return. The criminologist follows her and falls into a trap set for him by the butler. He is locked in a cellar and left to perish by inhaling deadly fumes, but the explosive which he mastered as the picture opened is brought into use and he escapes. The maid is given the jewels and still in Quest's power she returns with them to his apartment at seven o'clock and is cared for by Quest's woman assistant.

The butler-crook determines that he will kill the woman he believes "double crossed" him, but by means of electric thought transference Quest learns of his plans and leads him to his apartments where, after he has attacked a dummy representing the maid, he is placed under arrest. Count Arleigh arrives at this time and Quest returns the jewels to him and tells him that his daughter's murderer is now in prison.

In South America Arleigh's brother and his band find the "missing link" and are in the midst of their rejoicing when one of their number is striken with fever. In his ravings he discloses the hiding place of the mysterious black box. Back in New York, Sanford Quest sees that the maid is not a criminal at heart and that she is a really clever woman, so he offers her a chance to begin life anew as his assistant. She accepts.

Reunion of Well Known Players

Jack Richardson and Louise Lester (Mrs. Richardson) recently visited the Universal studios at Hollywood, during a trip from Santa Barbara, where they play for the American company. Miss Bush took the opportunity to call Allan Dwan up at the Famous

Thanhouser Players' Theater

The Thanhouser Players' theater which opened January 18 at New Rochelle, N. Y., is progressing nicely. The New Rochelle citizens are indicating by their patronage that they like good movies, and the S. R. O. sign is put out by Manager John William Kellette, every few evenings. Monday is Zudora night; Wednesday, Thanhouser night, and Friday night is Post Card night, on the latter night the players each giving out their own post cards. W. Ray Johnston is president of the incorporation. Carl Louis Gregory, who photographed "Thirty Leagues Under the Sea," is vice-president; Frank Farrington, secretary, and H. R. Clarke, treasurer. Other directors are Sidney Bracy and Harry Benham. Clarence Dull and Harris Gordon constitute the house committee, while the entertainment is in the hands of Ernest Warde and Frank Grimmer, Thanhouser's cast director.

Hybar Film Corporation Growing

The Hybar Film Corporation, of Atlanta, Georgia, seems to be making constant forward strides and is now said to be the largest film exchange in the South. It has beautiful offices in the Forsyth building, with what is said to be the only projection room south of the Mason and Dixon line. Arthur S. Hyman, president, is in charge of the field organization work, and P. T. Barbour, secretary and treasurer, is in charge of the office and all routine work of the organization, which employs seven road men and a staff of thirty in its Atlanta office.

The company operates several large theaters, including the Grand Opera House in Atlanta, with a seating capacity of 2,500. Splendid results are being obtained and even greater expansion is probable in the near future. A branch office is being opened in New Orleans, where Mr. Hyman visited last week.

Leah Baird, Vitagraph Star

Leah Baird, one of the popular members of the Vitagraph Company, was born in Chicago, Ill., on June 20, 1887. She was educated in the public schools of this city and became a stenographer, but close application to shorthand and typewriting did not appeal to her. Like the majority of young girls, she dreamed of success on the stage. After her first professional performance, she decided she had at last found her vocation and determined to study that she might advance rapidly in her chosen profession. Stock was the school in which she gained her experience and during her theatrical career she played with companies in Toronto, Canada, Buffalo, N. Y., Troy, N. Y., Wilmington, Del., and Yonkers, N. Y. Miss Baird's road experience was confined to one season's work, when she toured the country in "The Gentleman from Mississippi." A bad theatrical season was the cause of Miss Baird's going into pictures and the Vitagraph was the first company to whom she offered her services. Her success on the screen was immediate. She also writes scenarios, many of which she appears in herself.

New Quarters for World Film

Beginning March 1, the new Chicago quarters of the World Film Corporation will be at the corner of Wabash avenue and Adams street, in the College building. Five thousand square feet of space have been utilized to take care of the twenty-two employees now necessary to handle the business. The entire fourth floor, which faces Wabash avenue on one side and Adams street on the other, will be occupied. A ventilating system, in addition, will keep a circulation of fresh air.

Manager Harry Weiss of the Chicago offices feels quite proud of the fact that this growth has developed since April 1, 1914, when he was doing business in 500 square feet of space and had two employees.

Mr. Weiss celebrated the occasion of the signing of the lease with a dinner, and had among others for his guests, W. R. Scates, division manager of the World Film Corporation, and W. A. Cahn, who negotiated the lease.

Song Basis of an Excellent Production

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

"IN THE TWILIGHT," the two-reel American release of February 15, will be found one of the most wholesome heart-interest stories ever released by the American Film Manufacturing Company. It is based, as one can easily imagine, on the song entitled "Love's Old Sweet Song," and verses of this are at several points in the picture shown on the screen by double exposure.

Photographically the feature is a gem, some of the scenes on a peaceful farm being real works of art, and comparable to nothing less than paintings. Harry Von Meter, Jack Richardson, Vivian Rich and Charlotte Burton have the four leading roles, and all of them are seen to advantage, though possibly Mr. Richardson is a bit the more entitled to praise for his clever characterizations.

One of the rural exteriors.

As the story opens we learn that Ellen and Mary, two sisters, are loved by Sam and George Drew, the sturdy sons of a nearby farmer. The boys call on their sweethearts, and ere they depart both couples are engaged. The mother of Ellen and Mary is grief-stricken at the thought that both her daughters are to leave her, but with a smile sits down at the old parlor organ, and all join in singing "Love's Old Sweet Song." As the melody fades, the old lady cautions the young folks that they must keep their love and happiness as pure and sweet to the twilight of life as it now seems. They laugh and declare that beyond a doubt it will remain that way.

As time passes George obtains a long sought opportunity to get work in the city and departs, after telling Ellen that once he has secured a foothold in the metropolis he will return for her. In the city George meets and becomes engaged to Doris Grant, the daughter of his employer, and poor Ellen is soon forgotten.

Sam and Mary eventually marry, and a year later a little girl comes to bless their union, while Ellen is more gloomy than ever after reading in the newspaper of the birth of a daughter to George and his wife. Though Sam and Mary have prospered, George, in a city home, has acquired numerous bad habits and finally is discharged for incompetency, takes to drink, and as a culmination of his career is sentenced to the penitentiary for a crime he committed while drunk.

Meanwhile Sam and his wife are called to the city to be present at the death of George's wife, and ere returning they adopt George's little girl, who has been left an orphan.

Years later, when George's term has been served out, the humbled man returns to the home of his youth, and passing the humble cottage, he sees his brother. George pauses outside the window attracted by the soft refrain of "Love's Old Sweet Song," which is being played on the phonograph by the two little girls within.

George's head falls in his arms, and his sobs are heard by Sam. When Sam goes to investigate he is amazed to discover his brother, but warmly welcomes him into his home, and as the picture ends George seems ready to begin life anew, while Ellen, ever faithful, is ready to do her part in giving him a new start.

As a fitting finish to the picture the closing scene, like the first one, is typical of the title and is tinted in the soft shade of rose which American uses for its twilight effects.

George causes his wife much unhappiness.

Sam and Mary eventually marry.

Will Fight Ordinance Change

On Tuesday, February 2, a small, but exceedingly enthusiastic, gathering of exhibitors convened in the Candler Theater, New York City, for the purpose of discussing the threatened changes in the ordinances of New York city, concerning the admission of children to motion picture theaters, by the committee which is to recodify the existing ordinances of the city.

After the meeting, which had been called jointly by the presidents of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York and the Cinema Club of the Bronx, was called to order by President Needles of the former organization, Sam Trigger was asked to take the chair and after calling attention to the fact that there were 896 exhibitors in greater New York, of whom less than one-eighth belonged to any organization, he delivered a scathing rebuke to those who cared so little for their rights that they lacked even interest enough to attend a meeting called in one of the greatest crisis that the business in New York has ever faced, as shown by the fact that there were less than ten per cent of all the exhibitors in New York present.

The projected change in the statutes was carefully explained by James Wallace, Jr., counsellor for the association of greater New York, President Whittman of the Cinema Club and Louis H. Harris, its counsellor, and the exhibitors were urged to combat it. Before the meeting adjourned the sum of $400 was collected and the counsellors of the two organizations will undertake to see what can be done relative to protecting the exhibitors.

The Metro Corporation

Within the past week announcement has been made of a new releasing company formed by several exchange men. The concern has been incorporated as the Metro Pictures Corporation and its officers are all men who were very recently allied with the exchanges handling the Alco program.

The Metro Pictures Corporation is said to be capitalized at $300,000, and has for its officers and directors the following: Richard A. Roland of Roland & Clark, Pittsburg, president; George A. Grombacher, owner of exchanges in Portland and Seattle, vice president; James B. Clark of Roland & Clark, Pittsburg, second vice president; Joseph W. Engle of New York, treasurer; Louis B. Mayer of Boston, secretary and Otto N. Davies of Minneapolis as a director.

Though no definite information has yet been obtained with regard to the program to be handled by the Metro Corporation, it is understood that the film men have organized for the purpose of enabling the exchange men to control their product to the benefit of the exhibitor, and finally the consumer, and it is declared that there is enough capital already on hand to perfect a strong national organization which will offer high grade pictures.

The offices of the new concern are to be located in the Heidelberg Building at Forty-second street and Broadway, New York City.

Mrs. Blackton to Stage Benefits

On Friday evening, February 19, at the Vitagraph theater a benefit for the "Save a Home Fund" will be given by Mrs. J. Stuart Blackton. She has purchased the entire house and will devote the proceeds of that evening to this charitable and worthy cause. Many are familiar with the work of this fund and the suffering and privation it has saved so many mothers and children during the hardships of this winter. No one who is familiar with the great good accomplished will hesitate in contributing his mite on this occasion and at the same time enjoy the delightful evening's entertainment provided by the management of the theater. In addition to the magnificent program there will be an added attraction in the presence of the many pretty Vitagraph girls who will act as ushers and program distributors. They will be assisted by many prominent society girls who are interested in this "Save A Home Fund." Among the Vitagraph girls are Lillian Walker, Norma Talmadge, Dorothy Kelly, Lillian Herbert, Anita Stewart, Ethel Lloyd, Betty Gray, Nitra Frazer, Leah Baird and Rose Tapley.

Annual Edison Banquet

To the whetting song of "How Dry I Am" about four hundred men sat down to the fourth annual banquet of the Edison organization at the Hotel Washington, Newark, N. J., Saturday evening, January 30. Horace G. Plimpton, manager of negative production, and a large contingent of Edison players from the Bronx studio attended the feast. Thomas A. Edison was the guest of honor and first vice-president C. H. Wilson made a felicitous speech, complimenting and thanking all concerned for the wonderful spirit that had actuated the entire organization since the disastrous fire of the night of December 9 and what extraordinary work had been done within a few weeks' time.

Mr. Wilson sprung a pleasant surprise on Mr. Edison in presenting him with the first and complete Edison Diamond Disc which had been produced in so short a time after the entire phonographic plant had been wiped out on that night. Besides a splendid cabaret, some Wadsworth and Housman comedies were run with great applause. The surprise and hit of the evening was the appearance, in a motion picture skit, of Harry Beaumont, Bigelow Cooper, and Carlton King in a burlesque on the Edison officials, respectively, of Leonard C. McChesney, salesmanager of the motion picture department, Adolph Gall, technical director of the motion picture department, and William Maxwell, second vice-president of Thomas A. Edison, Inc.

A Triple Alliance

In writing of the new serial soon to be announced by the American Film Manufacturing Company, S. S. Hutchinson, president of the concern, writing from Santa Barbara says:

"I wish to say, in general, that we feel that we have a 'Triple Alliance' in this matter, consisting of the American Film Mfg. Company, as producer of the serial, The Tribune and the Nichols-Finn Advertising Company, on publicity, and the distribution, in charge of a man whom I consider the greatest expert on film distribution in the United States, barring none; namely J. R. Freuler. This alliance will form a union of strength so well balanced that it will be non-defeatable."

Edna Maison is appearing in a heavy role in a series of six one-reelers which are being put on by the Universal.

Gretchen Lederer has just joined the western Vitagraph stock company as a leading woman.

French Farce Made Into Novel Photoplay

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

TWO, or perhaps it was three, years ago all Chicago was laughing at what was then alleged to be one of the funniest farces ever seen in the loop district. It was called "The Blue Mouse." The fun which ran riot at that time has all been imprisoned in celluloid and as a six-reel film is now to be released in Chicago and vicinity by the Photoplay Production Releasing Company, of which Aaron Gollos is president. Mr. Gollos gave a private showing of his six-reel feature at 2 o'clock Saturday afternoon, February 6, and judging by the expressions of approval overheard, he has a box office magnet of great worth.

Laughter begins with the very beginning of the first reel and breaks out at frequent intervals until the last inch of film has faded from the screen at the conclusion of the sixth reel. Madge Lessing, the famous comedienne, has the title role, and as Dolly Frivoluse, "the Blue Mouse," goes gaily through scene after scene, causing embarrassment to the various characters, flirting outrageously with this one and that one, and causing ripples of laughter among those viewing the picture.

Photographically the piece is splendid, the exteriors being carefully chosen and clear and bright in every detail, while the interiors are staged with care, and though many of the scenes are taken at long range, this being a European style, it seems that there are enough close-ups to make the picture enjoyable.

The story is probably familiar to every exhibitor, but briefly relates to Teddy Barker, an employe of the Searchlight Insurance Company, who falls madly in love with Clara Brummer, whose father finally agrees to the marriage of his daughter, but withholds a dowry of 5,000 pounds sterling until the young man attains the position of manager of his company.

Teddy Barker and the Blue Mouse.

Mr. Bock, director of the insurance company, has a weakness for pretty girls and granting favors to those of his employes who have fascinating wives. When this fact becomes known, Teddy Barker, who has met Dolly Frivoluse, known as "the Blue Mouse," conceives the idea of foisting Dolly off on Mr. Bock as Mrs. Barker. Upon an arrangement to pay her liberally for acting the part, Dolly readily agrees to completely turn the head of Mr. Bock and secure for Teddy the position he seeks.

An arrangement is made by which Mr. Bock, purely by chance, meets Dolly, and Teddy introduces her as his wife. Bock is immediately fascinated, and more enchanted when he obtains a picture of her in a bathing costume. Unknown to those most interested, the wife of another clerk, seeing the frivolity between Mr. Bock and Mrs. Barker, writes a letter to Mrs. Bock which completely destroys Mr. Bock's domestic happiness and brings Mrs. Bock post haste to the office.

When Mrs. Bock encounters Mrs. Barker in the office she suspects her of being "the Blue Mouse," and later Mr. Brummer visits the home of "the Blue Mouse," having been told that his son-in-law was a frequent caller there, although he is of the opinion that it must be a different Teddy Barker.

Meanwhile "the Blue Mouse" is in debt and a sheriff's sale of her furniture takes place. Bock, Barker and Brummer all visit the place, and when Mrs. Bock and Mrs. Barker appear among the prospective buyers the men have a lively time in eluding their wives. Bock and Barker seek refuge in the luxurious bed of "the Blue Mouse," while Brummer hides in a huge bear-skin rug. The fun grows fast and furious as one after another the characters escape discovery by the narrowest of margins. Later, Bock, with "the Blue Mouse," visits the real Mrs. Barker, believing he is doing his companion a favor by proving that her husband is flirting with another woman. Imagine his astonishment when he discovers that he is himself the mistaken one and that his companion is the real "Blue Mouse." Ere the film is finished Teddy Barker is made a manager, his father-in-law pays over the dowry, Mrs. Bock regains control of her own husband and "the Blue Mouse" has successfully weathered the financial storm and peace is restored all around.

New Lubin Star

Miss Gladys Hanson, the Broadway star who has been leading woman for Daniel Frohman, E. H. Sothern, Kyrle Bellew, Henry Miller, David Belasco and other prominent producers, will be featured in Clyde Fitch's "The Climbers" which the Lubin Company is making into a feature photoplay at the studio in Philadelphia. The scenario for the production was written by Clay M. Greene and the play will be directed by Barry O'Neil. "The Climbers" is a powerful society drama and in the character of Blanche Sterling, originally played by Amelia Bingham, Miss Hanson has a strong emotional part particularly fitting her temperament and one which will give her a wide scope for the display of her remarkable ability. Among the well known Lubin players who will appear with Miss Hanson are George Soule Spencer, Jack Standing, Charles Brandt, Ruth Bryan, Rosetta Brice, Peter Lang and Ferdinand Tidmarsh.

Cameramen's Paper

MOTOGRAPHY is in receipt of Nos. 1 and 2, Volume 1, of a new publication called Static Flashes, published at Los Angeles, California, by the Static Club which is an organization of cameramen. The paper is well printed, illustrated with numerous half-tones and, according to its own announcement, will be "devoted to the men who make the movies," that is manufacturers, directors, artists and players. "Capt. Jack" Poland is editor of the publication, which we understand is to be a weekly, and is surely to be congratulated on the breezy items which he has compiled for the first two issues. There seems to be something of interest for everyone within the four pages of Static Flashes.

New Publication

On or about March 10 or 15, a new motion picture publication will make its appearance on the newsstands of the country, when Street and Smith, well known publishers of New York City, will start the publication of a five cent weekly devoted to the motion picture industry. The magazine is to be a popular one with a national circulation, devoted to stories of the latest films of all motion picture producers, as well as items of general interest regarding the motion picture industry. In it halftone illustrations will be used, and its circulation will undoubtedly be exclusively among motion picture theater goers.

Coming Bosworth Features

The releases of the Bosworth-Morosco productions for the next six months have just been received from the Los Angeles studio.

The schedule of releases is as follows: "The Caprices of Kitty," Elsie Janis, March 8; "Sunshine Molly," March 18, featuring Miss Weber, Phillips Smalley and Hobart Bosworth; "Pretty Mrs. Smith," Fritzi Scheff, March 29, play by Oliver Morosco and Elmer Harris, Morosco Photoplay Company in association with Bosworth, Inc.; "Captain Courtesy," Dustin Farnum, April 19, play by Edward Childs Carpenter, Bosworth; "Help Wanted," April 29, play by Jack Lait, Morosco Photoplay Company; "Little Sunset," May 6, story by Charles E. Van Loan, a Bosworth production; "Betty in Search of a Thrill," Elsie Janis, May 17, Bosworth production.

For the last quarter of the year the plans include among other productions for the Morosco Photoplay Company, "The Judge and the Jury," by Oliver Morosco and Harry D. Cottrell; "Wild Olive," by Oliver Morosco and Elmer Harris, and "The Society Pilot," by Oliver Morosco and Dr. C. C. Bachman. In the latter, Lenore Ulrich will star, while Peggy O'Neil, another Morosco star, will appear in "Wild Olive."

Arthur Housman, Gloom Dispeller

"I came to the stage by the star route," he explained in response to the question. It was almost startling coming from the boyish comedian who is joked by his fellow Edison players because of his modesty and funereal seriousness of face. "Yes, I read, when I was 17 years old, that any one born on October 10, my birthday, was astrologically destined to be a great actor. I foolishly believed the stars, and here I am." Arthur Housman, of Edison, was the comedian speaking, but to judge from the success he is having in Edison comedies, especially when teamed with William Wadsworth, the care-killer, the stars seemed to have spoken aright. He is one of the quietest of the Edison players and it is as difficult to get him talking about himself as it is to open the proverbial oyster with a pearl cargo. Nevertheless, he is a hard worker and the fun and irresistible humor he injects into Edison films are studied out carefully and seriously, but with the art that makes them spontaneously infectious.

Siren of the Stage Lures Husband

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

THE release of "In Spite of All" on March 1, marks the beginning of the new Edison schedule which will hereafter include a three reel feature every other week. Ashley Miller adapted the play from the stage success of the same name in which Mrs. Fiske was starred and which was written by Steele Mackaye. The story gives the impression of being in two parts, the first part being climaxed by Clandenning's marriage to Alice Knickerbocker, and the second part, by Alice's triumph over Stella's charms. This is due to the fact that, for a time, Stella is not seen in the picture and the important events which take place during her absence in Europe make her return seem like the beginning of a new thread.

As a whole, the plot is cleverly handled and well directed. Photographically it is above criticism. Gertrude McCoy heads the cast as Alice Knickerbocker, later Mrs. Clandenning, the young wife who suffers the torture of seeing the man she loves become fascinated with Stella, an opera star, with scores of admirers, none of whom she cares for but all of whom pay her tribute with jewelry, gowns, and other expensive gifts.

Robert Conness is a good type for Carroll Clandenning, and puts personality and magnetism into his impersonation. Sally Crute's part as the bewitching Stella calls for true artistic ability, as does the role of her wretched victim, Drake, a part in which Richard Tucker is seen to good advantage. William Bechtel does some excellent character work as old De Granville, affording a strong contrast to young Jack Knickerbocker (Harry Beaumont), another of Stella's suitors. Other well-known Edison players in the cast are Augustus Phillips, Robert Brower, Harry Eytinge, and John Sturgeon.

The story opens with a scene showing the radiant Stella bowing off the stage, loudly applauded by all. Later, as she is standing in the lobby of her hotel, surrounded by a group of admirers, Carroll Clandenning approaches, and is introduced. The newcomer's better judgment is swept away by his admiration of the beautiful woman, and he attributes no significance to the cold manner in which she turns away Drake, a persistent suitor.

A short time later, Drake, now a mental and physical wreck, bursts into Clandenning's room, upbraids him for stealing Stella's affection, and begins to denounce her as a siren. In the middle of his tirade his eyes fall on her picture on the mantel. Her beauty is irresistible. He grabs the picture, kisses it passionately, and rushes out of the room, uttering a cry of bitter anguish and sorrow. Clandenning is impressed by the scene, as is shown by his action in casting Stella's picture into the grate, and in taking a trip to the country in an effort to forget her.

Banquet scene in Edison's "In spite of All."

He meets Alice Knickerbocker, a type of girl who loves but once and then with her whole heart and soul,

A tense moment in Edison's "In Spite of All."

and they become married. Their married life is one of happiness and devotion until Alice's brother Jack visits them in the city, and falls in love with Stella. Not knowing of her husband's experience with the woman and trusting him implicitly, Alice sends Carroll to the actress to beg her to discourage Jack's attentions. Meeting Stella personally proves too much for Clandenning, and he again falls under her charms.

Through Jack, Alice learns of her husband's conduct. Determined to see this wicked woman she obtains a position in a shop patronized by Stella, and delivers a gown to her dressing room. Clandenning enters with a gift for the actress, and Alice, heartbroken, runs out of the room. Stella surmises that the girl must be Clandenning's wife, and her sympathy for her, prompts the actress to bring Clandenning to his senses, and restore his affection to his wife. The plan works out most effectively. Clandenning is confronted in his home by Alice, Stella, and De Granville, one of the woman's admirers whom she makes a fool of to show Clandenning how badly he has been deceived. Alice forgives her husband, and Stella passes out of his life forever.

Screen a Medium of Good

Francis X. Bushman, leading player with the Essanay eastern company, on his recent trip through the East, made a careful study of the effect of motion pictures on the public. He declared that in every instance the effect on the audiences were beneficial and uplifting. "I have come to the conclusion that photoplays are the single greatest power for good in the world," declared Mr. Bushman. "The results they can accomplish are even greater than the influence of the church in my estimation. This is because the general public attend photoplay houses, while only a limited number attend the various churches. I am not minimizing the power of the church by any means, but I do want to emphasize the power of the photoplay because of the vast throngs to whom motion pictures are an integral part of their lives. Thus it behooves film manufacturers to put out none but the best plays.

Francis X. Bushman.

"The theaters I visited all displayed plays of a high character as well as being entertaining. The first mission is to entertain, but underneath that there must be a stimulating power to make the play first class. Personally I would not take part in a play that is deteriorating in any way, and I am glad to say Essanay would not for a moment tolerate such a play. It believes in plays that not only entertain, but are of a high moral standard.

"There was not the slightest disorder noticeable in any of the many theaters I visited in Boston, Baltimore, New York, Norfolk or Washington. Men, women and children came in, some tired from the trials of the day, and all left buoyed up by the entertainment. The careworn look on many countenances disappeared shortly after the plays started. By the end of the play it was happy spectators that were leaving the theater. They had been refreshed and stimulated to achieve better things in life. They were certainly made more fit to take up the cares of the next day because of the relaxation that had come through the innocent amusement."

Violet MacMillan

Violet MacMillan, latest star to join the New York Motion Picture Corporation at Inceville, California, has the distinction of being the smallest artist playing "leading-lady" roles in pictures. Being but fifty-seven inches in height is not much to boast of in quantity, but the quality of work she is doing is said to make up for the shortage in height. Miss Violet made her advent into motion pictures last June by accepting an offer from the Oz Film Co., to be starred in their fairy tale pictures. At the time the offer was made little Miss McMillan was being featured on the Orpheum Circuit, doing a "single" act. The proposition was put before her so favorably she could not resist the chance so she joined their forces at Los Angeles. However, the longing to do real dramatic work was so strong within her that when an offer from Thomas Ince, the great producer of the Kay-Bee, Broncho and Domino Brands on the Mutual Program, was received, she immediately accepted and up to the present time has been featured in five photo-plays namely, "A Modern Noble," "His Brothers' Keeper," "The Phantom on the Hearth," "The Artist's Model," and "The Disillusionment of Jane." In all of these Miss MacMillan has displayed talent which speaks very highly for her future greatness.

Universal Issues Advertising Booklet

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company has issued a booklet describing the many unique advertising schemes which have been designed for the use of exhibitors who wish to advertise the showing of the six-reel production "Damon and Pythias." Many tributes and testimonials by those who have seen the film are also presented.

Much attention has been given to both the newspaper and poster end of the advertising and many other helpful suggestions are to be found in this twenty page booklet. It is sure to prove helpful to the enterprising theater manager who plans to show "Damon and Pythias" as one of his big features.

Zudora's Friends Again Rescue Her

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

SEVERAL exciting incidents are introduced in episode thirteen of "The $20,000,000 Mystery" which make it an enjoyable two-reel subject, aside from the part it plays in further developing the plot of the big serial. Chief among these is the fight between the three men, who have come to the sanatorium to rescue Zudora, and a like number of conspirators. The scene arrangement is such that the suspense is cleverly worked up to a crisis at this point and, in the average house, the struggle between the men will arouse considerable interest.

The settings in this episode deserve mention. The interior one, representing the home of the chief conspirators, which is beautifully arranged, is again used and the exteriors representing the diamond mines of South Africa are quite convincing. The acting continues to be of the highest quality, Marguerite Snow, James Cruze, Elizabeth Forbes, Sidney Bracy, Frank Farrington and Harry Benham doing the majority of the work.

Quite a few negroes were used in the mine scenes and their scanty attire causes one to shiver when it is recalled that the pictures were filmed when the weather was far better suited to overcoats. Some of the scenes in the sanatorium, where Zudora and the mine superintendent are imprisoned, are almost too realistic, but the effect of the entire installment is pleasing, nevertheless.

The confinement of Howard, the mine superintendent, and Zudora in the sanatorium, as set forth in episode twelve, and their subsequent release makes Madame Duval still more eager to accomplish her evil ends. Her determination becomes firmer when it is decided to send Jim Baird to South Africa to examine the Zudora mine properties and, if possible, reclaim them for the rightful owner. Baird has hardly left New York before Zudora and Howard, the latter a very ill man after his rough treatment at the hands of Dr. Munn, suddenly disappear again. Tom Hunt and John Storm are at their wits' ends, and fruitlessly search everywhere for the missing pair, never suspecting that the subtle mind of Madame Duval has arranged for their imprisonment in the sanatorium again, as she realizes that this is practically the last place where Hunt and Storm would expect to find them.

In the meantime Baird has arrived in South Africa. Bruce, Madame Duval's able lieutenant is not far behind him, for a few days later, he, too, reaches the mine. He does not know that Baird has recognized him and that he is watching his every move. It happens that a short time later one of the Kaffir miners unearths a sixty carat diamond—a gem of purest water as expert examination proves, and Bruce, homesick for the joys of Broadway, cables Madame Duval and Captain Radcliffe of the find, announcing that he will bring the diamond to New York in person. That night, as Bruce smokes his cigar, Baird watches the waste-basket, where he has hidden the treasure. As soon as Bruce falls asleep Baird climbs in at the window, obtains the diamond, and escapes into the darkness, but not before Bruce, awaking, fires at him.

The death of Howard.

Unfortunately, Bruce recognizes him and, when Baird takes ship for New York, almost the first person he encounters on board is that worthy. As Baird already has notified Hunt and Storm that he has the gem and knows they will meet him at the pier, he has scant fears that the band will be able to trap him. He little realizes the clever plans of Madame Duval and her aids.

Meanwhile Storm and Tom Hunt have been able to gain no trace of Zudora, nor the vanished Howard, and it is with downcast faces that they meet Jim Baird at the steamship dock. In the confusion, Bruce deftly snatches Baird's satchel, which contains the precious diamond, and dashes through the crowd. He springs into a taxi, which is driven by one of the gang, and dashes off at top speed. Hunt, Storm and Baird leap into another machine and start in pursuit.

Then follows a mad race between the two machines. Soon the city is left behind and Bruce's vehicle turns into a road, which the trio behind recognize. A minute later it stops at the driveway of the sanatorium and Bruce dashes into the house. But his pursuers are too close behind to enable him to escape and the same thought has struck them all—perhaps Zudora is within these walls. Baird flings aside the attendants, who attempt to stop him at the door, while Storm and Hunt force their way in through a window. A struggle between the searchers and the conspirators follows, in which the former are victorious. Hurriedly they make a search of the building, finding Zudora and Howard imprisoned in an inner room, and while Storm carries her half-fainting form to the limousine, Baird and Hunt continue their quest for Bruce, but are compelled to acknowledge that he has got away with the diamond. The death of Howard takes place as he is about to tell them of what happened during their confinement.

American's "The Quest"

F. McGrew Willis, the author of "The Quest," a five part feature produced at the American studios, acquired a widespread popularity through his special Sunday newspaper and magazine articles. Mr. Willis has done every other kind of work conceivable, running the gauntlet from a railroad section hand to editor of a country weekly. With a record of over one hundred produced scripts, Mr. Willis, who is but twenty-four years of age, can be classed as a master photo dramatist while his work in "The Quest" will undoubtedly place him in a position to be envied by many older authors.

Edison Films at Exposition

The films made by the Edison Company for the New York State Commission, to be shown at the Panama Pacific Exposition, were shown at the office of the manufacturers, 10 Fifth avenue, New York, Friday of last week, the commission viewing them.

After the seal of the state, a subtitle reading "New York—not the land of promise but the land of performance; the land of plenty and the land of prosperity," is shown. The spectator is first taken to Ellis Island, then on a trip around New York City and up the Hudson. Points of beauty in the scenery around the state are shown, as well as trips to educational institutions of the state, the important industrial enterprises, chief places of interest in the larger cities, etc.

Scenic and industrial pictures of a similar nature have also been made by Edison for the Massachusetts' Board of Panama Pacific Managers, which will be shown at the exposition. For the same state there was also made "The Boston Tea Party," a heart interest story woven around that historical incident; and "The Landing of the Pilgrims," besides "Paul Revere's Ride," "The Battle of Bunker Hill," "The Deerfield Massacre" and "The Battle of Lexington." It is quite probable that "The Boston Tea Party" and "The Landing of the Pilgrims" will be placed on the regular release after the exposition. Exposition films were also made at the factories of the Corticelli Silk Mills at Florence, Mass., and the William Skinner and Sons, at Holyoke, Mass., both dealing with the silk industry.

For the New York State Department of Health, Edison made, for the Fair, "In His Father's Footsteps," which worked up so well that it was placed on the regular release, and "He Meant Well, but——"

There will be used at the Panama Exposition three Edison Model D projection kinetoscopes, two in the New York State building and one in the Social Economy building.

New Great Northern Feature

About March 1 the Great Northern Film Company will release another big production in four parts, entitled "Through the Enemy's Lines." This is a most realistic and impressive war picture, within the boundary of perfect neutrality, and interwoven with a pathetic and stirring incident of a great conflict. It is needless to dwell upon the photography, scenery, settings, etc., because "Great Northern" quality prevails throughout.

Miss Ebba Thomsen, who plays the part of the heroine, is a member of the Royal theater, in Copenhagen, and a favorite with photoplay fans all over the world. Her interpretation is both convincing and appealing.

Cameraman to Tampa

Watterson R. Rothacker, general manager of the Industrial Motion Picture Company, advises us that Tuesday, February 9, a cameraman was sent to Tampa, Florida for the purpose of taking official motion pictures of the Gasparilla Carnival, which is one of the annual entertainments of the city. The picture will be in two or three reels for special southern circulation, and will first be shown at the Bonita theater at Tampa. The cameraman will remain in the city during the time the Chicago National League Base Ball Club is in training there and expects to secure an interesting base ball feature for general circulation.

Motography's Gallery of Picture Players

MABEL TRUNNELLE has won a place in the front rank of photoplayers by reason of personality and inborn dramatic genius. Her large black eyes tell the story of the deepest and lightest of emotions with the power of a thousand voices. Miss Trunnelle was born in Chicago and attended school in that city. Later she went to the Chicago Dramatic School, where she was equipped with the fundamental training for a theatrical career. After appearing in leading productions and stock companies, Miss Trunnelle joined the Edison players about four years ago, and brought with her a wealth of experience and technical knowledge — for she had played over three hundred different parts. Her wonderfully expressive features, her truly eloquent eyes and sincere artistic temperament have made her one of the greatest favorites on the screen .

Mabel Trunnelle.

RICHARD TUCKER was overtaken by a fancy for the stage while occupying a trustworthy position in the Union Trust Company in Rochester, his home town. Shortly afterwards the trust company lost a most efficient employe, but had the pleasure of seeing him forge his way to prominence on the stage where he has been associated with Otis Skinner, Nat C. Goodwin, Arnold Daly, Henry E. Dixey, Mrs. Fiske, and Bertha Kalich. Mr. Tucker's last stage appearance was in Rochester as Major William in "Salvation Nell." He has now been a member of the Edison stock company for two years, and the confidence placed in him is reflected and justified in the important roles assigned him in recent Edison features and the convincing manner in which he interpreted them. His ambition and engaging personality have served as stepping stones to success.

Richard Tucker.

ROBERT Conness was born on a farm in La Salle County, Illinois, but spent most of his boyhood days in the far West. He attended public school at Topeka, Kas., and took part in amateur school theatricals at the age of seven. Upon graduating from school, he was given a position in the office of a railroad company in the West, but could find no contentment in wielding a pen. He made his debut on the stage in "Alabama," and later appeared in leading juvenile roles with James O'Neill. He has had engagements with the Frohmans, in the "Prisoner of Zenda," "Colonial Girls" and "The Bachelor's Baby," and has starred with Mary Mannering, Blanche Walsh, Hedwig Richer and Louis Mann. Mr. Conness appeared for the first time in motion pictures about five years ago, with the Edison Company, and has been with that company ever since.

Robert Conness.

BESSIE LEARN, just five feet tall "with heels," has risen to immeasurable heights of popularity during the three years that she has been playing ingenue leads in Edison pictures. Sweetly girlish in manner, trim of figure, and of dainty, wholesome beauty, Miss Learn is splendidly adapted to represent a film girl. Her popularity is not, by any means, confined to the fan, for "behind the screen" she is a favorite with all of her fellow players at the studio. Despite the fact that she has been before the public all of her life, she still retains the almost shy manner and hesitancy of a sheltered school. She was born in San Diego, California, and appeared on the stage with such well-known stars as Chauncey Olcott, Robert Hilliard, and Annie Russell before entering pictures. Miss Learn has been featured with great success in both comedy and drama.

Federal Censorship Becoming More Imminent

THE action of the House Committee on Education in reporting favorably the Smith-Hughes censorship bill on February 2 was a considerable disappointment to motion picture men. The effectiveness of the existing National Board of Censorship and the danger of a political commission to cover the same field had been so thoroughly discussed and so well presented to the committee that it was hoped the truth of the situation might have struck home. Apparently it did not; or, if it did make any impression, the opportunity to credit a new opening for political patronage proved too great a temptation.

Reiteration of the arguments against the federal censorship bill and testimony in favor of continuing the present arrangement with the National Board would waste this space and the readers' time. All motion picture men are thoroughly familiar with the situation and its logical conditions. The fight against the bill must be continued, harder than ever. It has the approval of the committee; but it has yet to be passed by the House, then by the Senate, and finally to be signed by the President. So there is still opportunity to proceed against it. That opportunity should be vigorously pursued in every way possible.

Some Dangers of Press Co-operation

FROM the very beginning of picture popularity the press of the country—by which we mean the newspapers, magazines and periodicals of all classes—has made free with the subject. That it has done so is perfectly justifiable, of course, for the motion picture is essentially a public institution, for all the people. And it is noticeable that the area of contact between the press and the picture is becoming constantly larger.

Most of the daily newspapers have contented themselves so far with brief and impartial comments on current releases, or with the retelling in story form of the film plots. Some of the magazines, however, and particularly those periodicals designed for women, have adopted a more or less censorious attitude, or at least an air of benevolent uplift toward the films.

A good example of this, both in activity and attitude, is seen in a recent announcement of the Woman's Home Companion, an excellent monthly publication of large circulation. This paper is to start, in its March number, a movement for "Better Films." Its reason for the action is that "the weekly total attendance is greater than the total number of school children—greater far than the number of subscribers to the country's public libraries. Yet we continue, many of us, to regard the moving picture theater with a sort of amused tolerance; 'extraordinary, of course,—but really not serious.'"

It is the purpose of the Companion to publish each month, in addition to suggestions as to ways in which the women's clubs may work for the betterment of the picture theaters, a directory of the best films of the month. "In the preparation of this directory," says the announcement, "the editors will have the co-operation of the leading film companies." It is proposed to select "perhaps fifty out of the five hundred released each month by the better film companies."

But the extraordinary feature of the proposition is that films printed in the Woman's Home Companion directory will, when exhibited, bear the legend "Especially recommended to the readers by the editor of the Woman's Home Companion."

Now with all due respect to that excellent publication, it is difficult to see why ten per cent of the films released to American exhibitors must have its indorsement. Without discussing the almost insuperable difficulties confronting the Companion's editor in his attempt to designate the best fifty out of five hundred films, or explaining whether the department will list releases a month ahead or a month behind, we may ask where this particular editorial genius will obtain his ability to select ten per cent and reject ninety per cent of all the excellent pictures produced. Such a task imposes considerable responsibility on the one who so lightly assumes it—more, perhaps, than he realizes now.

Big as the Companion may be, there are other publications in the same class. Suppose they all started similar departments; would the film makers want to list their names no every film approved? Of course they would not all agree on the same ten per cent of the month's production. Why not turn the tables, list on each film the desirable current magazines, and force the latter to say in their editorial heads: "Recommended to all audiences by the producers of the General Film Company," or the Universal, or Mutual?

Departments of this kind in magazines are encouraged by the film makers because it means free advertising for them, and they all hope to be included in the select list of ten per cent. But it is obvious that they cannot all get in; and it is equally obvious that their omission is a purely arbitrary privilege of the department editor. Frankly, we cannot believe the arrangement is a desirable one for the film makers. The tacit condemnation of ninety per cent of all releases by sheer inability to include them in the list will have a false significance to the readers of the publication, who are bound to assume that only the ten per cent listed are fit to be seen, or to let their children see. Nothing could be further from the truth; and unless the editor of the Companion takes persistent pains to make this point clear the scheme will work actual harm to the pictures.

More on Censorship

THE Child Betterment Magazine some time ago published a strong editorial on the subject of censorship. The editorial is signed by Dr. G. Frank Lydston, editor of the magazine, who makes the somewhat novel suggestion that what is needed is more censorship of audiences and less of the films. He opines that some enterprising manager will yet wake up and have two sorts of films, one for adults and another for children, with special hours for the exhibition of each. What Dr. Lydston lays most stress on, however, is the hypocrisy and fanaticism which, he points out, at present are the underlying causes of by far the greater part of the censorship movement.

"The censorship of the movies," he writes, "thus far has been based upon a combination of prudery, hysteria, desire for notoriety, a mistaken sense of duty to the public, ignorance, fanaticism, misplaced sentiment and the prurient imagination and natural depravity which impel some people to indulge every opportunity to see, hear, think and speak of suggestive topics under the pretext of so-called 'defense.' Let us hope for a new era of censorship dominated by clean, intelligent brains, a knowledge of psychology and social conditions and sincerity with a dash of common sense. * * * Just a word regarding 'class' censorship. The censors are very careful to exclude or materially tone down prize fights, shooting scrapes, and acts of violence in films designed for the cheaper theaters. At a certain prominent theater in Chicago is depicted the most brutal fight I ever have seen, on or off the stage, and shooting enough to satisfy the most bloodthirsty. What's the answer? Are there two kinds of public morals, the five cent kind and the twenty-five cent kind? Does a tendency to moral depravity necessarily lurk in the pocket containing the elusive nickel, or is the eagle on a two-bit piece a guarantee of immunity to contamination? Possibly 'class' censorship is a compliment to the poor in purse and a reflection on those of us who have the quarter."

Just A Moment Please

We lamp by a downstate paper that an exhibitor in Carrier Mills, Illinois, is charging eggs for admission to his theater, and finding it mighty profitable. Can you imagine what this will mean if it keeps on—it may cost us one loaf of bread to see "Zudora," two eggs to get into a five-reel show, and possibly a whole sack of flour to behold "The Eternal City" or "The Clansman." Ye Gods, lads, this eggs thing must be crushed in its infancy!

Opening our morning mail we come across an item from the National Exposition Company signed by (now comes the important point—watch closely) A. D. V. Storey, press representative. Speaking of names and occupations, did you ever lamp one more appropriate?

While on this subject of press agents, have you ever noted the varying ways in which the P. A.'s endeavor to kid you into printing their particular bull? For instance, here's a few samples:

Arthur E. Machugh always heads his copy "suggested by" and signs his name.

J. B. Clymer politely puts it, "Courtesy of publication will be appreciated."

Richard Willis tabs his copy, "Compliments of R. W."

Don Meaney invariably inquires, "Can you use this, old top?"

Wid Gunning casually states, "If you can use this we shall appreciate it very much."

The Lasky copy you can tell a mile away. It invariably begins, "Mr. Samuel Goldfish announces that——"

As for friend Mabel, she just scribbles across one corner, "Please use this."

However, it takes all sorts of people to make a world, and if we only had the space we should like to print every word every one of 'em sends us, but, Moritz, it can't be done.

Sounds almost like old times doesn't it, to read of Sam Trigger with his mad up berating the N. Y. exhibitors because they won't get into the game and fight to resist the passage of the proposed 16-year-old ordinance? Givemell, Sam, we're for you!

Poisoned Pens and Motion Pictures

BY CHARLES MORTIMER PECK

Charles Mortimer Peck, assistant general manager of the Balboa Amusement Producing Company, Long Beach, Cal.

WRITERS in theatrical and trade publications, in newspapers and magazines, devote considerable space to criticising photoplays. Their plots are trite. They all end happily in the same way. They are not up to the standard of stage productions. They lack literary and dramatic merit. These and other adverse opinions are doubtless more or less deserved, but those who find fault should remember that motion pictures are young and that advancing years will furnish plenty of opportunity for improvement.

Newspapers have been published so many years that some degree of perfection should have been attained by this time, but they are very far from the ideal. Magazines are hoary with age, but editorial wisdom has not developed to the point where every story can be guaranteed good. Thousands of books have been printed annually for half a century and ninety per cent of them have been vigorously condemned. The stage, with all of its glorious history, is not without its blemishes. Motion pictures, though handicapped by youth, have made more progress than any of the exalted mediums of entertainment and amusement I have mentioned. Without financial aid from outside sources they rank fourth from the top among the great industries of the United States.

They have grown big so fast that they are a little loose jointed, but they are surely becoming steady upon their own legs.

The supercritical who sit in high places and spend their energies throwing javelins at motion pictures, can find diversion picking rank weeds in the garden of vaudeville. Grand opera, music and the different arts command the attention of reconstructionists. All things that depend for success upon human endeavor must vary in quality. In this respect the motion picture cannot be singled out as an exception.

There are bound to be poor pictures, because the process cannot protect itself against the encroachment of men with crude notions of beauty nor prevent illiterates with means from adopting it as a business. Eventually the better pictures will eliminate this undesirable element. The unrelenting law of "the survival of the fittest" will be automatically applied and there will be no market for the junk that now finds its way to the screen.

In the meantime there is consolation in the knowledge that serious minded men are constantly working for motion picture improvement. They are studying its possibilities and requirements and the results of their work are beginning to show. The mechanical obstacles are being gradually removed. The huge task of educating a new type of actor and actress is proceeding satisfactorily. Directors are being trained and placed in charge of important productions. A new school of dramatists is being slowly created. Slowly, because those in control of the destinies of the motion picture have been dilatory in realizing that they cannot have good pictures unless they have good plays with good stories back of them. Motophoto dramatists are new literary creatures. There are not many of them because their profession has not been encouraged. Instead of recognizing them as a necessary motion picture adjunct, manufacturers have gone to other sources for their supply of material. They have ransacked the dust heaps for worn out Broadway hits, picturized novels and thrown scanty recompense to amateur scenario writers, but they have not awakened to the necessity of paying decent prices to those who are capable and willing to devote their entire time to the conception and construction of motion picture plays.

I do not mean to imply that authors of motion picture plays should be subsidized or paid for that which is not worthy, but inasmuch as no writer can hope to do his best work until he has had extensive experience, each and every one who has served his apprenticeship, and who can make good, should find a ready sale for his dramas or comedies at prices that will make his vocation a profitable one.

Then, when all the essential angles of picture making have been covered and protected, cinematography will step majestically forward and assume its permanent place in the foreground of the world's mediums for the entertainment and amusement of all the people.

The silent drama is played in a language that is universal. No matter what tongue a nation may speak, the motion picture reaches the understanding of each individual member of that race. As soon as the negative is finished positives are printed and quickly transported to every quarter of the globe where they are rapidly exhibited and rapidly pass into disuse. Others are made to take their places—tens, and hundreds, and thousands of others. The consumption is so great that it is almost impossible to keep up with the demand.

In a few short years—notwithstanding the difficulties they have had to overcome—motion pictures have driven the yellow novel to its death. They have killed the fake circus and annihilated the barn-storming hamfatters who used to infest the country. They have forced the big New York producers of theatricals to give the public a fair run for its money. They have made respectable citizens out of millions of street loafers. They have contributed to the enlightenment and enjoyment of the classes as well as the masses and they will keep right on performing their share of the world's work. They will do this, not because of those who wantonously tear them to pieces, but rather in spite of them. Their fate rests in kinder hands—in the hands of those who have faced sterner impediments than the reckless restrictions of critics whose questionable knowledge of motion pictures renders their advice impractical.

One very earnest writer, who advertises the possession of rare intimacy with motion pictures, deplores the manner in which most cinema dramas terminate. He is opposed to the finish that is celebrated with a long, lingering exchange of kisses between lovers and antagonizes the uniformity of finales that send audiences away with the impression that pleasant relations have been restored.

When the dramas of scores of studios have been assembled for review it is probable that many of them will be found to end monotonously. But what of the dramas of the stage, which has had centuries in which to solve the same problem? What about magazine stories that continue to end in the same old way? What about current novels that persist in leaving everybody smiling when the author says "good-bye"? Shall more be expected of motion pictures during the seven years they have been reflecting drama than is expected of the stage in the seven hundred years it has been struggling with the same proposition?

Motion pictures have been brought to their present state of development by a comparatively few human beings who were, at the start, not overburdened with artistic discrimination. They had to learn by experience. They have been refined between the mill stones of necessity. And measuring their accomplishments and the accomplishments of those responsible for the so-called legitimate stage with the same stick, they appear to have the advantage.

It is wonderful if the theatrical stage does one new thing in a year.

It is remarkable if motion pictures do not do a new thing each day.

Those who worry most about the shortcomings of motion pictures are those who know the least about them. They do not stop to think that it is only ten years since New York was persuaded to look at its first picture shows and there were no two, three or four-reel dramas on the program. The vogue of motion pictures has occupied the photoplay stage but a short period, yet in that brief span it has achieved results so stupendous that us atoms who write should gasp in amazement instead of whining in malice and envy.

Motion pictures are not hurt by the venomous pens of those old fashioned dramatic critics whose rheumatic minds are incapable of appreciating the marvelous strides they have made. On the contrary they are growing in perfection and attractiveness even faster than safety warrants.

Warren Discusses Scenario Questions

Giles R. Warren stopped in the midst of the production of a feature film at the Selig Polyscope studios in Chicago, Ill., and riffled the pages of the photoplay manuscript he held in his hand, with every appearance of vexation.

"Why don't the writers number their scenes consecutively?" he queried. "For instance, look at this story. Here we are working on reel two. The script says, 'scene 25, same as scene 10.' Now the director has to turn back to scene 10 in the second reel. Not the same scene. Then he turns back to scene 10 in the first part of the story. The author writes, 'scene 25, same as scene 10.' In other words, he returns to scene 10 in the first reel in scene 25 of his second reel.

"Now, this all makes extra work and is uncalled for. Yet they say the director is too exacting.

"This is how it should be written in order to make a hit with the director: 'Scene 25—interior log cabin, same as scene 10 in first part.' This 'same as scene 6, or 8, or 28,' business is not an evidence of thoughtfulness on the part of the author. Many writers who pride themselves on their technique have this habit.

"This is the simple rule that will make an unqualified hit with the director of the photodrama; name the locale of every scene. Eliminate the confusing 'same as scene 10' directions. It makes no difference if the scenes are the same, name the location of the scenes every time. It is a little thing, true, but the little things in picture play writing and directing, in the aggregate, make the big things.

"The system of designating each and every scene makes the work of the director easier. He has a long memory, it is true, but he cannot be expected to remember everything. When he is obliged to turn back repeatedly the pages of a manuscript to discover something the author could as well have written in as left out, it does not make that particular writer popular with him.

"My best advice to the writer of pictureplay plots is to be clear, designate each and every scene, number the scenes of your multiple reels consecutively. Say your two-part scenario totals one hundred scenes. Do not number the scenes of your first reel up to fifty and then start numbering the scenes of your second reel all over again. If the final scene of your first reel numbers 50, start the first scene of your second reel with number 51.

"This method aids the director, it helps in the cutting and trimming department—in fact, it is a little convenience that is beneficial all along the line."

"Flying A" Leads Aspire Athletic Honors

Harry Von Meter, who used to be a physical culture teacher and recently put the men in the American-Mutual studios at Santa Barbara, Calif. in good shape by giving them the army setting-up drill, a while ago disrupted a whole working day there with the best intentions in the world.

"I never realized how much more delicate women's muscles are than men's," he said, "and when the girls came to me and said they, too, wanted to take the setting up drill I gave it to them straight. They took it, too. I suppose they never realized how strenuous it was until afterwards. The next day, though, Virginia Kirtley was the only girl who came to work, and she's always exercising anyway. Vivian Rich came around in the afternoon, but she was so stiff she could hardly walk. Next time I'll go easy."

Mae Marsh Gets Bracelet

Mae Marsh, the clever star of the Griffith-Mutual films, is the proud possessor of a gold bracelet given to her by her grandmother. The bracelet is an heirloom that has been in the possession of the Marsh family for almost a century. It was given to Miss Marsh's great grandmother as a wedding present by her husband. The great grandmother presented it to her daughter on the latter's wedding day.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

Brevities of the Business

D. W. Griffith of Mutual is soon to begin work on a production that is to be even greater than "The Clansman."

Nathalie de Lontan has been especially engaged to play in a feature picture that is now being produced by Director Sturgeon of the western Vitagraph studios.

The Eclair Company, releasing through the Universal program, has moved its studios from Tucson, Arizona, to Hollywood, Cal., where it has taken a lease on the recently vacated Sterling studio. They expect to begin production within ten days.

G. M. Anderson and Charles Chaplin have been making things hum at the Essanay studio, Niles, Cal., since their return from Chicago.

Giles R. Warren, after about six months' work at the Chicago studios of the Selig Polyscope Company, has gone to the Los Angeles, Cal., studio of that company, where he will direct the filming of several notable picture plays. The change is a promotion in recognition of Mr. Warren's excellent work.

C. A. Chivers, who for some years past traveled in the South for one of the largest film organizations, is now with the World Film Corporation, covering the same territory.

Wally Van, the Vitagraph director and comedian, left New York last week with a company of Vitagraph players for Saranac Lake, N. Y., to take a three-reel comedy, written by himself. The large ice carnival and many other features of interest at that place will be filmed.

Frank J. Baum of the Oz Film Company is in New York making his headquarters at the Alliance offices. Mr. Baum made a flying trip from Los Angeles to complete arrangements with General Manager Cobe to release the "The New Wizard of Oz" on the Alliance program.

Archer McMackin, for a number of years director with the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company at Chicago, has signed to direct pictures for the Universal Company at Hollywood, Cal.

Dr. C. B. MacDowell, the famous explorer, who is in the employ of the Selig Polyscope Company, recently returned from China, Japan, Siam and the Holy Land. He brought with him thousands of feet of motion picture film which show strange scenes of great educational value.

Albert C. Froome, for many years a headliner at the New York Hippodrome, has been engaged to appear in "The Twenty Million Dollar Mystery." Mr. Froome plays the role of a wealthy Montana mine owner who was a friend of Zudora's father when both were prospecting.

A program of exceptional pictures featured anniversary week at the Vitagraph theater, beginning Sunday, February 7. A year ago, on February 9, 1914, the old Criterion theater threw open its doors as the Vitagraph, a theater devoted exclusively to the showing of high class motion pictures at dollar prices.

Max Figman and his company, including Miss Lolita Robertson, who is Mrs. Figman, made a flying trip to Seattle, Wash., from Los Angeles, Cal., last week, and filmed a number of big scenes on the Sacramento River for "Jack Chanty," a forthcoming release on the Alliance Program.

"The Campbells Are Coming," the big six-reeler produced at the Universal West Coast studios, is completed and a great big sigh of relief has gone up. The most thankful of the whole company are Francis Ford and Grace Cunard, the director and leading lady.

Reina Valdez is playing with the Fiction Company at Boyle Heights, Cal.

The World Film Corporation have had a company at work in Orlando, Fla., for some time. Orlando was selected as the "Johnny Jones Show" is the only circus in the southland that can be used by the company, and a circus scene was necessary in making the picture of "The Butterfly," in which Howard Estabrook is starred. Mr. Estabrook, Barbara Tennant, O. A. C. Lund, the director, and the rest of the company are expected to return to the Fort Lee, N. J., studios some time this week.

The American players at Santa Barbara, Cal., have missed the presence of Edward Coxen, one of the "Flying A" stars, during the past week. He has been confined to his home on account of a cold.

During the formal opening of the New York to San Francisco telephone line, Eugene W. Castle, West Coast cameraman for the Mutual Weekly, had the distinction of sending the first 'phone message to his home office over 3,400 miles of wire. After motion pictures were made of the prominent telephone officials and the mayor of San Francisco, Mr. Castle was handed the telephone set and delivered a message to an official of the telephone company at the New York end, who then called up Pell Mitchell, editor of the Mutual Weekly, in the production offices of the Gaumont Company in Flushing, N. Y.

M. F. Tobias, president of the All Theaters Film Company, which handles the Alliance Program in New York state, has just returned to his New York City office after a tour of the theaters he controls.

Miss Ruth Stonehouse, the pretty Essanay actress, will give a special dance at the charity show to be given February 15 and 16 at the Bryn Mawr theater, Chicago.

The Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company has announced the exclusive engagement of Ina Claire, who has signed a contract similar to that signed last week by Charlotte Walker and who will consequently soon make her photo-dramatic debut under Lasky management. As in the case of Miss Walker and other stars recently retained by the Lasky organization, Miss Claire's arrangement is of such a nature that her photo-dramatic appearances for a period of years to come must be entirely under Lasky management.

At a recent meeting of the board of directors of the Cosmos Feature Film Corporation, Leo Rosengarten tendered his resignation as president and sold his entire holdings in the company to Arthur H. Jacobs, who was elected president in his stead.

Universal Film Manufacturing Company.—At a special meeting of stockholders, called this week, a vote will be asked on the proposal to increase the capital stock from $2,000,000 to $3,500,000.

Syndicate Film Corporation.—A dividend of 15% on both preferred and common, following the extra 25% declared on both classes of stock in January, makes a total dividend disbursement for the fiscal year up to 103%. This latest 15% will be paid on February 27 to stockholders of record February 20. The cash balance in the treasury would then liquidate all outstanding debts and equal par for both classes of stock. At the annual meeting the officers elected were: J. M. Sheldon, president; B. S. Adams, vice-president; P. H. Davis, secretary, P. G. Chace, treasurer. A. Coe was elected to succeed A. E. Jones as director. It is understood that a complete liquidation of the remaining assets will not occur at this time, but the policy as to whether the company will immediately attempt another serial has not yet been decided upon.

Mutual Film Corporation.—An active demand for both preferred and common was maintained through all of last week.

New York Motion Picture Corporation.—As the law of supply and demand is the most certain guide to coming good or bad news, a persistent demand for stock of this company during the past four days, with very little stock offered or obtainable, would seem to indicate that the large amount of available cash resources, which is credited to this company at the present time, will warrant some dividend disbursement in February. Stock sold at 77, which is about the high point for this security in the last five months.

Theodore Mitchell, a well-known newspaper man and formerly of the Cincinnati Enquirer, is handling the publicity on D. W. Griffith's filmization of "The Clansman," which is to be released under the title, "The Birth of a Nation." Mr. Mitchell has offices at 420 Longacre building, New York City.

An installation and reception held by the Order of Elks at New Haven, Conn., was the occasion which furnished invitations to a chosen number of film players, among whom were Florence La Badie, William F. Russell, Mary Fuller, King Baggot, Maurice Costello, and Rose Taplay.

Charles Verhalen is turning his diplomatic ability to account as assistant to B. F. Clements in the Kriterion offices.

"Bud" Mars of aeronaut fame is New York representative for the Mars-Hull Company, manufacturers of the Mars Portable Hygienic Air Purifier, and occupies suite 724 in the Marbridge building.

Beatrice Michelena, in a scene from "Mignon," adds to the prettiness of a pocket calendar which is a novelty souvenir given to friends by the California Motion Picture Company. Another favor being presented by this company is a sepia-toned desk calendar which also offers a charming scene from "Mignon."

H. Z. Levine, publicity manager for the Box Office Attractions Company, has been confined to his home all week with an attack of grippe. John Henry Goldfrap, Mr. Levine's assistant, has been in charge of the publicity bureau in Mr. Levine's absence.

Paul Gulick, head of the publicity department of the Universal Film Company, made a hasty trip to Washington, D. C., last week, adjusted certain matters with the postoffice department there and returned almost before his absence had been discovered.

H. H. Van Loan, formerly editor of the Authors' Syndicate, Inc., is now a member of the Universal publicity department, handling the news campaign on the Universal City opening, the "Black Box," and other Universal special attractions. Mr. Van Loan, who is a relative of the famous Charles E. Van Loan, has occupied the desk opposite Bob Doman's since February 3.

In Miss Edna Mayo, Essanay has secured another star of the first magnitude. Although only 22 years of age, she has had six years of experience on the speaking stage and in motion picture work. The most recent plays in which she appeared on the speaking stage were "Madame X," "Excuse Me" and "Help Wanted."

Elmer McGovern announced this week that Dell Henderson has joined the Keystone staff.

Paul W. Panzer, the Pathe star, last seen on the screen as Owen in "The Perils of Pauline," is scoring a big hit in vaudeville throughout the New England states. At Cambridge, Mass., he was received by Governor David I. Walsh and Mayor Timothy W. Good, and in Boston the Elks held a reception in his honor, and he delivered a short address to the members. Mr. Panzer's act on the stage consists in explaining the making of and showing a number of thrilling scenes taken from five of his best photoplays.

Phil Mindil, known far and wide in the film business, now occupies the publicity desk and writes ad copy for the Serial Publication Corporation.

E. E. Dodge, formerly of the Western Import Company, has succeeded John W. Gray as sales manager of "Runaway June" and other special Reliance productions.

C. A. Dickinson has been made assistant manager of the Chicago office of the World Film Corporation, his promotion being a recognition of his good work in soliciting city business.

Irene Wallace, the popular leading lady, Harold Howard, and Makoto Inokuchi, the Japanese actor, left Chicago this week for the west coast, where they will work in the Selig Polyscope stock companies. These artists were especially engaged in New York recently and will assume important roles in forthcoming Selig productions.

Marceline, the Hippodrome's famous clown makes his screen debut in Thanhouser's "Mishaps of Marceline."

On March 15, George Kleine will release a dramatic five-part feature entitled "The Woman Who Dared."

Harry Weiss has received, as a reward for his hard work done during the last six months in the Chicago office of the World Film Corporation, a week's vacation with all expenses paid. He plans to visit New York.

C.; a close up view of the barge in which President Wilson will lead the war ship fleet through the Panama Canal; glimpses of the damage done by recent sand storm at Salisbury Beach, Mass.; and in the war section views taken in Frankfurt and Berlin, Germany; also a glimpse of the German prison camp in which Russians are now at work.

Hearst-Selig News Pictorial No. 11—Selig—February 11.—Grace Darling in this issue of the weekly is seen visiting the home of abandoned animals in New York City; the wrecked orphanage at New Orleans, La., is shown, also the mid-winter carnival at Saranac Lake, N. Y. In the foreign section are some of the first pictures obtained of the Italian earthquake, showing soldiers hunting for victims and many of the maimed and destitute survivors, while from Yarmouth, England, come pictures showing the damage wrought to homes by the recent invasion of the German Zeppelins

In Red Dog Town—Biograph—February 15.—A chicken thief is caught and about to be lynched when word is received that a bad man is cutting up rough in a saloon and the posse rush back to town after tying the free end of the rope to a large boulder. Another negro happens by and seeing his compatriot with a rope around his neck accepts a proposition to take his place for a moment, for which he receives two bits. After he has placed his neck in the noose the thief takes the money away from him and the posse, returning, find the wrong man attached to the rope. On the same reel is:

His Losing Day—Biograph—February 15—The broker's customers beat the stock market and demand their winnings. Frantic over his losses, he sends his boy to the bank for the money. Returning, the boy stands outside the door to read a thrilling chapter in a Wild West novel and the ticker shows bigger and bigger losses. The broker, growing deperate, rushes out, discovers the boy deep in the book, snatches the money and finds that he has not enough to pay the enormous losses sustained.

In the Plumber's Grip—Edison—February 15.—A plumber is a most indispensable and independent person as shown by this slap-stick comedy, featuring Bessie Learn and Saul Harrison. Harry Skinner, a plumber, is ejected from Ex-Aldermann Flynn's house for making love to the latter's daughter, Gertie. Harry promises Flynn that he will regret his rash action, and Gertie helps him keep his promise by sneaking up stairs and cutting a hole in the water pipes. Flynn holds out as long as possible, but finally, to prevent his house from being floated away summons Harry. The young fellow refuses to touch the job unless Flynn consents to his marrying Gertie. Tired of floundering about in knee-deep water Flynn gives his consent and Harry then turns off the water. C.R.C.

The Victor—Essanay—February 15.—Mr. and Mrs. Justwed are very happy at the prospect of her mother visiting them, but when she arrives Mr. Justwed changes his opinion of her. He is driven from one end of the house to the other and lives a dog's life, until a friend suggests that he treat his wife and her mother in an unpleasant manner. This he does, allowing the water in the bath tub over their room to overflow. This loosens the plaster and the women are buried beneath it and drenched to the skin by the water. The plan proves a success and happiness is again restored in the household. Wallace Beery, Betty Brown and Charlotte Mineau have the leads.

Her Supreme Sacrifice—Kalem—(Two Reels)—February 15.—Disinherited by his father because of his marriage to Ora Miles, a typist, Gordon Ames becomes secretary to Hale, an elderly millionaire, Ignorant of her identity, Hale falls in love with Ora. Learning that Gordon's father will forgive him providing he leaves her, Ora, knowing her husband to be breaking down as a result of overwork, decides to sacrifice her happiness for his sake, and taking her baby, now a year old, she goes to a Western state and secures a divorce. She meets Hale and when he offers her a position she accepts, learning only too late that Gordon's father had died without forgiving him. Hale proposes to Ora and, thinking of the comforts his wealth would provide for her child, she consents to marry him. Elaine, her old nurse, learns of the approaching marriage and on the wedding day brings Ora's baby to the Hale mansion. The child wanders into the street and is knocked down by an automobile. When Ora sees the injured child she recognizes it as her own, and when Gordon appears at that moment she realizes where her happiness lies and decides to face the future once more with Gordon. Alice Joyce featured.

Patsy at the Seashore—(Eighth of the Patsy Bolivar Series)—Lubin—February 15.—Patsy arrives at the seashore, and after some difficulty secures employment as life-saver at the local bathing pavilion. By a queer coincidence his parents arrive to take a cottage at the same resort, as do also the parents of Sykesy and Patsy's lady-love, Tilly Grace. While Sykesy and Tilly are bathing they are caught in the undertow one day and Patsy saves their lives, becomes a hero and is awarded a Carnegie medal. That night Patsy proposes to Tilly and she accepts him, though later he has a fight with Sykesy, and when the doctor examines the injured Sykesy he declares his case a desperate one. Jane, who loves Patsy, warns him he is liable to be arrested, and as the film closes Patsy runs away pursued by the landlord and porters of the hotel. Clarence Elmer featured.

The Van Thornton Diamonds—Selig—(Two Reels)—February 15.—Thurston, a crook, marries Katherine, an orphan, and later tells her that he wants her to become his accomplice. She refuses and runs away, but later he forces her to return and assist him in securing the Van Thornton diamonds. At a ball given by Mrs. Van Thornton, Katherine hides the diamonds, thus foiling Thornton's plans to steal them. When the crook attacks Katherine, Mrs. Van Thornton's brother, George, saves her and kills Thurston in the struggle which follows. The man's death is made to appear to be suicide and George and Katherine find happiness in each other's love. A review will be found on page 233 of the February 13 issue.

The Professor's Nightmare — Vitagraph—February 15.—The professor one night attends a "thriller" with his wife and becomes so excited when the villain chokes the poor heroine that he greatly disturbs those around him. Next day, meeting a friend he has not seen for a long time, the professor indulges in too much liquor and when he arrives home and when his wife sees his condition she goes sobbing to bed. The professor falls asleep in a chair before the fireplace and dreams that he is the villain of the play and his wife the heroine. After an unsuccessful attempt to force her to sign some papers he kills her, hides her body under the table and is then arrested by the police. He is sentenced to be electrocuted and after being strapped to the chair the Devil appears before him and turns on the current. Sparks begin to shoot from around his feet and he seems to be burning up. He then awakens to find his slippers ablaze, his feet having gone too near the fire. His screams bring his wife with a pitcher of ice water and after describing his nightmare he promises never to drink again. Nicholas Dunaew and Kate Price featured.

Dwellers in Glass Houses—Biograph—(Two Reels)—February 16—District Attorney Carlisle's first move after his election is an attempt to clear out the grafters and to indict Callahan, the police lieutenant. A henchman of Boss Rogers brings the Boss news of what is occuring and Rogers seeks to dig up something in the District Attorney's past that will prevent his continuing his reform campaign. The henchman learns that Carlisle and a woman were present at Lawyer Bennett's home the night the latter was killed and Rogers believes he has what he wanted. He summons Carlisle to his home and threatens to expose him and find the woman in the case unless Carlisle ceases his activities. At this moment Mrs. Rogers parts the curtains and declares that she herself is the woman in the case. She says that years before she had loved Bennett and consented to marry him. On the church steps he confessed he was already married, but intended to get rid of his wife. Later she married Rogers and one day Bennett threatened to turn over a letter of hers to her husband, unless she visited his rooms. To prevent this she went, accompanied by Carlisle, a former sweetheart. In the struggle with Bennett she struck him with a vase and killed him. Rogers realizes the hopelessness of bringing any charge against Carlisle and Callahan is forced to flee the town. Louise Vale and Jack Drunnier featured.

The Life of Abraham Lincoln—EDISON — (TWO REELS) — FEBRUARY 16.—"The "greatest American citizen's" life is always an interesting subject, and especially at this time when his memory is revived in everyone's mind by the national holiday instituted in his honor. Frank McGlynn impersonates Lincoln, and does it admirably. Not only does he resemble him closely, through the aid of make-up, but he also gives to the character the strength, awkwardness, and simple magnetism for which the former president was noted. His courtship with Mary Todd and his first meeting with Stephen Douglas are the first events pictured in Lincoln's life. Then follow his marriage on November 4, 1842, his nomination and campaign for the presidency, his joint debates with Stephen Douglas, his election, a few of the events connected with his term in office and the Civil War, and Lee's surrender on April 9, 1865. His tragic death at Ford's Theater, April 15, 1865, when he attended the performance with General Grant as a sign of appreciation of the latter's valiant work in holding the Union together, ends the picture. C.R.C.

A Pound for a Pound—ESSANAY—FEBRUARY 16.—The atmosphere of the northland is excellently created by the settings in this production and the story itself is of the virile type. Albert Roscoe, a recruit from the speaking stage, makes his initial appearance and, while slightly camera conscious, gives promise of becoming a screen favorite. A realistic struggle between Wallace Beery and Harry Dunkinson, in which the two men roll down a snow-covered hill, is one of the features. Mr. Beery's make-up is slightly over-drawn and is liable to excite laughter in some houses. Nell Craig makes a pleasing heroine. The plot tells how Jack Thorpe attempts to secure food during a famine in the far North. Buck Gibson, a bully, refuses to sell him any unless his wife pays more money for it. When Thorpe steals food from Gibson he is sent into the wilderness to die, but is followed by his wife and a faithful half-breed and saved. Later Buck is in need of food, and when Thorpe refuses to sell to him he also steals. When Gibson is about to be punished as Thorpe had been, the latter saves him and tells him to leave the district forever. C. J. C.

Love Versus Chickens—KALEM—FEBRUARY 16.—The love affair between Mable Diggs and Chester Spriggs is interrupted when Mable's father accidentally kills a chicken belonging to Chester's mother. The children are refused permission to see each other thereafter and though locked in rooms in their own homes, both Chester and Mable escape and make a bee line for the minister's house. The parents pursue, but arrive too late. They eventually make up and all ends well. On the same reel is:

You'll Find Out—KALEM—FEBRUARY 16.—Jones accepts a position as a nurse-companion to Mrs. Welkins, who is mentally deranged. When he arrives at the home the previous nurse is just departing and tells him "you'll find out" when asked why she is quitting the job. Jones is told that he must humor Mrs. Welkins in every whim and when she imagines him to be a dog he must act like a dog and if she declares him to be an elephant he must act the part. Battered and bruised Jones realizes the meaning of the former nurse's words and quits the job on the run.

A Double Role—LUBIN—FEBRUARY 16.—Reginald Quail marries without his wife learning his real profession. He is leading man of a stock house, which is one day visited by Mrs. Quail and her chum. The chum is much taken with the leading man and wishes to visit him. The ladies finally invite him to Mrs. Quail's home. Quail then appears as his real self and expresses a desire to kill the actor he asserts the ladies are waiting to meet. After thoroughly frightening his wife, and teaching her what he believes a needed lesson, he discloses his real identity. Raymond McKee featured.

Bill Haywood, Producer—SELIG—FEBRUARY 16.—Because its rough and tumble action is really funny, this film will undoubtedly draw many laughs. The acting—or rather actions of Tom Mix and the players who support him also add much to the fun. Mix was a whirlwind at the old western melodrama and now that he has undertaken comedy he seems to exert even greater enrgy and to show more daring. His offerings belong in a new class which should be called "speed farces." This film shows him as a ranch owner, who attempts to produce motion pictures when he meets the leading man and woman of a stranded theatrical company. Several incidents showing how wild horses running loose, explosions, fights, etc., break up every attempt to take pictures, occupy the main portion of the reel, furnishing laughs and thrills alternately. In the end the ranchman decides to give up the picture business and marries the leading lady.

O'Garry of the Royal Mounted—(BROADWAY STAR FEATURE) — VITAGRAPH —(THREE REELS)—FEBRUARY 16.—Clarry O'Garry and Jan Larose, partners in a mining claim, quarrel when Jan becomes jealous of O'Garry's friendship for Marie. Seeing he is causing trouble, O'Garry leaves the camp after ordering Pitah, an Indian whose life he had once saved, to watch over Marie. O'Garry enlists in the Royal Mounted police and a year later is stationed at Fort Resolute. Looking over the records one day he comes across a photo of Jan Larose, who is wanted for murder in Quebec and who has deserted his wife and two children. O'Garry goes to arrest Jan and the two men fight on the edge of a cliff, Clarry being thrown into the river below. Marie, who sees the struggle, lets herself down the side of the cliff with a lariat and while she is in mid-air Jan cuts the rope and she falls into the icy water. Larose is about to shoot the two in the river below when Pitah creeps up behind him and stabs him. Marie and the Indian rescue O'Garry and after declaring her love for him Marie eventually permits him to return to the fort, he promising to come back in the Spring and make her his wife. Edith Storey and Ned Finley featured.

The Mystery of the Tea Dansant—KALEM—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 17.—Another episode of the girl detective series in which Ruth Roland is being featured. Marguerite Wheeler, an heiress, disappears and her mother receives a note demanding $5,000 for her return. Ruth, the girl detective, and Harry Warrington, whose life she saved in a previous story, and who has now become her assistant, find that the trail leads to the Tea Dansant, conducted by Marmaduke. From Marmaduke's assistant, Darby, they learn that Marguerite is being kept a prisoner by Marmaduke, who is in financial straits. Darby agrees to assist the detectives and Ruth proceeds to fascinate Marmaduke and is invited to his office. Knowing Marguerite to be in an adjoining room, Ruth accepts the invitation. Ruth draws her revolver on Marmaduke, and when he overpowers her he is shot by Darby. Marguerite is then released and returned to her mother.

A Spiritual Elopment—EDISON—FEBRUARY 17.—Mr. Banks objects to Jack Newclothes' suit for his daughter's hand, and emphasizes his opinions on the matter by ejecting the handsome lover from his house when he comes to call on Evelyn. The way the girl and Jack overcome father's objections by playing upon his superstitions furnishes no end of fun. Arthur Housman, Viola Dana, and William Wadsworth featured.

C.R.C.

The Fable of the Cold Gray Dawn of the Morning After—ESSANAY—FEBRUARY 17.—Mr. Rounder wakes up in the morning with a dark brown taste in his mouth. After a grape fruit and a couple of drinks he goes to the office. About ten o'clock the effect of the drinks and grape fruit is wearing off, but a friend comes in and they visit a nearby cafe where more drinks are absorbed. This continues until afternoon and a big supper in the evening, with grapefruit and drinks as side issues, leads to the same taste in his mouth the "morning after." He then swears off and decides to avoid his two vices in the future. Rapley Holmes featured.

The Rainy Day—LUBIN—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 17.—A young wife sacrifices everything that her husband may keep up appearances in his business, and when he really does secure an increase in his salary, she still saves for a "rainy day," and when he finally becomes rich she is still penurious. He finally meets the "other woman" and finds the contrast a delightful one. When his wife discovers what is happening, she visits the other woman and begs her to give up her husband, though when the other woman refuses to do so the wife spends a great portion of the money she has been saving on furnishing their house up lavishly and making herself attractive, thus eventually winning back her husband. When he finds his home more attractive than that of the other woman his wife tells him she is through with him forever, and he goes to his room despondent. Outside a storm comes up and prevents her leaving immediately and as a result a reconciliation is finally effected, the long awaited "rainy day" having apparently arrived. Ormi Hawley and Earl Metcalfe featured.

The Black Diamond—SELIG—FEBRUARY 17.—A melodrama, the climax of which holds the interest in splendid fashion. Double exposure work used throughout, Guy Oliver playing opposite himself as a father and his son. Stella Razeto and Jack McDonald appear in supporting roles. The woman playing the part of the boy's mother, though not cast, does some exceptional emotional acting. It is the kind of film which is always popular in the majority of houses. The leader of a band of crooks at one time betrayed the confidence of a girl but another man married her, thus saving her good name. The son of the girl and crook grows up and becomes a detective ignorant of his father's identity. He traces the band led by his father to the "Black Diamond" cigar store but is captured. Before he is put to death his father learns of his identity and gives his own life to save him, blowing up the building. He gives the detective a letter for his mother, telling who it was that freed their son. The mother gives the letter to her boy to read but he tears it up, as he does not wish to know his mother's secret. C.J.C.

Some White Hope—VITAGRAPH—FEBRUARY 17.—Gathered around the stove in a country store in the little village of Hoshkosh, Hiram Limburger and his cronies are discussing prize-fighting. Hiram maintains that he can lick anybody in the room and, later, full of hard cider Hiram goes home and falls asleep. He dreams that he attends a hypnotic exhibition where he is himself hypnotised and told that he is a white hope. Hiram knocks out the professor and starts a riot in the theater, knocking down several policemen who attempt to arrest him. Noting a sign advertising the appearance of Sam Bangford and Torpedo Smith in a 20-round bout, he enters the building and when Smith fails to appear Hiram announces himself willing to take Smith's place. After a fast round he knocks out the colored man and as he is being congratulated one of his seconds empties a bucket of water over him. Hiram awakes to find himself in bed with his wife, who is pouring water on him to bring him out of his nightmare. Donald MacBride featured.

The Box of Chocolates—BIOGRAPH—FEBRUARY 18—Old Lorimer is enraged when George Thorne, his clerk, makes love to his daughter, Alice. George calls with a box of chocolates and Lorimer has him arrested. Meanwhile Alice's maid admits two thugs into the house and they endeavor to find her diamond necklace. Alice, fearing the men will find it, tears out the stones one at a time and hides them in the chocolate creams. When the thugs enter the room she is calmly munching chocolates and before the maid discovers the hiding place of the diamonds George and her father arrive. When Alice explains the diamonds were saved by George's chocolates, old Lorimer shakes the clerk's hand. Charles West and Clara McDowell featured.

Snakeville's Beauty Parlor—ESSANAY—FEBRUARY 18.—This comedy is a little different than the general run of Snakeville pictures and will probably draw even more laughs than the others of this series have. Harry Todd is a beauty doctor, who attempts to set up a shop in the village and hires Slippery Slim as his assistant. Margaret Joslin, as Sophie Clutts, comes to the shop and Slim attempts to perform an operation on her face which results in the shop being raided. The fun is fast and furious from this point to the finish, the film ending with both Slim and the doctor being run into jail. The work of Victor Potel is especially amusing. C. J. C.

Her Martrydom — LUBIN — (THREE REELS)—FEBRUARY 18.—Jim Reynolds is told by his doctor that he has tuberculosis and must go West. Jim is engaged to Dolly Daniels, stenographer in the same office, Dolly being beloved by Hamilton, her employer. Since Jim has no money Dolly asks Hamilton to advance the necessary sum, and for his love of her he gives her $200 which she turns over to Jim. As time passes Dolly secures more money from Hamilton, and finally consents to marry him, though Hamilton, knowing his wife does not really love him, is always considerate of her. Eventually, however, Dolly finds her love for Hamilton far greater than it ever had been for Jim, and still does not believe it right to let Jim know of her marriage. Accordingly she keeps her old apartment at which she receives letters and writes him such letters as he would expect to receive from her. In time Jim returns and happens to visit her in this rented apartment, where she explains that she is Hamilton's wife. Jim declares that he has the letters written since her marriage and that he will sell these to her at one thousand dollars each, otherwise he will turn them over to Hamilton. She is tempted to sell her jewels, but knows Hamilton would miss them. Jim offers to come to the house after them and leave the letters if Dolly will give him the key. That night Dolly hears Jim enter and later a crash awakens Hamilton, the two men struggle and Jim is killed. Hamilton fails to recognize him and as Dolly appears, tells her the man was only a thief in the night. Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe featured.

A Terrible Break — MINA — FEBRUARY 18.—Harry, who is a great reader of society novels, yearns for society life, and accidentally securing an invitation to a reception decides to visit it. Encountering a drunken gentleman in a full dress suit, Harry acquires some glad raiment and then marches to Mrs. von Pickle-field's mansion. His behavior at the reception, his refusal to take off his hat, his mad dash for the dining table and his odd antics create a general up-roar in the midst of which a chase begins that leads up-stairs and down-stairs, across country, railroad tracks, garden fences and finally into the lake. On the same reel is "Great Americans," cartoon pictures of some of our presidents in various moods.

The Quality of Mercy—VITAGRAPH—FEBRUARY 18.—Harry Van Courtland, wayward son of Jacob Van Courtland, tenement house owner, asks his father to forgive him, but the old man refuses. Van Courtland's secretary, Bratton Powers, loves Eileen, Van Courtland's daughter, but the father frowns upon the match. Eileen visits the tenements one day and finds her brother. She returns home and pleads with her father for forgiveness and aid for her brother, but he flatly refuses both. Eileen then sells her necklace to provide for her brother and the same day Van Courtland sends Powers with a letter to Gantling, a politician, enclosing a check as a bribe for Gantling, to prevent the condemnation of the Van Courtland tenements. Meanwhile Van Courtland discovers the absence of the necklace and when Powers returns, having been unable to deliver the letter, he accuses him of stealing the necklace. The policemen insist that all the papers found on Powers must go to headquarters and Van Courtland, knowing he will be exposed in his bribery attempt, has to withdraw the charge and eventually permits Powers to marry Eileen. Edith Storey and Antonio Moreno featured.

Their Village Friend—BIOGRAPH—FEBRUARY 19—Rose Gray, a dramatic critic, has all but forgotten the village in which she was born, her single connection with the old place being her sweetheart, Dan. Effie, her former school friend, calls on her with a play she has written and Rose tries to dodge her. Effie is alone in Rose's rooms when Dan enters and Rose, returning, discovers them with their heads together and she becomes jealous. She is mistaken, however, for they are planning to dispose of the play she has written and surprise Rose. In a theatrical agent's office Effie meets Norton, a star, who is won by her personal charms and accepts her play. Dan, Effie and Norton then visit Rose and she discovers her mistake. Vivian Prescott and Isabelle Rhea featured.

Her Husband's Son—EDISON—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 19.—Robert Conness, Gertrude McCoy, and Harry Beaumont featured. Willard, a widower, marries a girl much younger than himself. His son, Robert, who attends college in a distant town, refuses to recognize her as his stepmother. Willard decides to put an end to Robert's extravagances, and answers his request for money with which to pay his gambling debts by a curt refusal. Dorothy, his wife, sends the boy a note telling him that she will be glad to furnish him the money he needs, if he will let her know how and where to send it. He writes back, saying that he will meet her in front of the house at a certain hour that night. Willard finds the letter, and, thinking that Dorothy is unfaithful follows her when she goes out to keep her appointment with Robert. In his anger at seeing the man embrace his wife, Willard shoots him, not knowing until later that he has wounded his own son. Robert's wound proves to be slight, and a reconciliation takes place.

An Amateur Prodigal — ESSANAY — (TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 19.—A young millionaire receives several letters sent to another man, whose name is the same as his, asking him to come home at once as his mother is dying. At last he goes and, as the mother is blind and the sister was an only child when her brother went away, he is received as a member of the family. A love affair develops between the millionaire and the girl which ends happily, despite the fact that the real brother returns. A complete review will be found on page 247 of the February 13 issue.

A Melodious Mixup — KALEM — FEBRUARY 19.—Although Ham and Bud are bosom friends they fall out when both begin to admire Tottie, the soubrette of a burlseque troupe. When Ham goes to Tottie's dressing room to present her with an apple he finds Bud ahead of him with a bouquet of flowers and the two enter into a rough-and-tumble battle. Bill Jones starts to interfere and both Ham and Bud attack him. After the fight is over Ham and Bud discover that Tottie is none other than Jones' wife and leaving their lady love they head for the nearest river.

The Little Detective—LUBIN—FEBRUARY 19.—Kitty, a boarding school pupil, is over fond of detective stories, and is much teased by her schoolmates. When Jim Blake introduces Nell, his accomplice, into the school as his ward, as part of a plot to rob the school, Kitty overhears them and is able to foil Nell, who is making her getaway with all her booty, and as a result Kitty becomes the heroine of the institution and all the young people praise her for her cleverness. Louise Huff featured.

The Lady Killer—SELIG—FEBRUARY 19.—A woman impersonator, named Hugh Vernon, has the leading role in this picture which deals with the taming of a lady killer by a number of clubmen. Mr. DePeyster, a man of wealth, is a great favorite among ladies who use poor judgment in selecting their friends. He infatuates the wife of a clubman and Leslie, a friend of the woman's husband, bets $500 that he can drive DePeyster from the town. He enlists the aid of a female impersonator, with whom De-Peyster promptly falls in love. By a cleverly arranged plan the lady killer is exposed in a ridiculous position and the affair given publicity in the newspapers. He flees from the city and the woman returns to her husband, thoroughly penitent. The offering, while not exceptionally strong, has many good comedy situations and will prove excellent entertainment.

The Madcap Adventure—VITAGRAPH—FEBRUARY 19.—Tommy Webb, a wilful, head strong, but very lovable girl, keeps her aunt Sarah on the jump. After Josephine Hall, Tommy's greatest friend, becomes engaged to Dick Birch, Tommy meets Guy Dunbar, a friend of Dick's. George Hilton, a society rounder, after Tommy's money, fascinates the girl and eventually becomes engaged to her. When Guy later learns that Hilton is frequently seen in the company of Pearl Courthorpe, a burlesque actress, he makes the fact known to Tommy. The girl refuses to believe it at first, but when she learns from a letter written by the burlesque actress that Hilton and she are frequently seen in a certain cafe Tommy, dressed in men's clothing, visits the cafe and breaks off her engagement with Hilton. Two thugs, who have seen her flash a roll of bills, follow her and Guy succeeds in rescuing her when they attack her and soon he and Tommy are engaged. Dorothy Kelly and James Morrison featured.

The Cowboy's Conquest—BIOGRAPH—FEBRUARY 20—John Brayton, a wealthy New Yorker, seeks forgetfulness on his western ranch. Dressed in cowboy attire he meets the Van Pelt touring party and loses his heart to Edith. Edith's foreign suitor reports developments to the girl's parents and Mr. Van Pelt wrings a promise from John that he will abide by Edith's decision after she has seen him in her own sphere, away from the glamour of the cow country. Dressed as a cowboy he goes to New York and all of Edith's friends snub. John, though Edith is not ashemed of him. Eventually they are quietly married and at a reception given in the Van Pelt home John turns up in conventional evening dress, looking the aristocrat that he really is, and all of Edith's friends change their tune. Ivan Christy and Isabelle Rhea featured.

The Voice of Conscience—EDISON—FEBRUARY 20.—Here is a story of a woman who imagines herself neglected by her husband, and is about to elope with another man when her conscience intervenes, causing her to abandon her wild idea and return home. Frank McGlynn, Sally Crute, and Richard Tucker do commendable work in the principal parts. Much of Dr. Theodore Yorke's time is given to his profession, and when his old friend, Jack Cravin, arrives for a few weeks' stay the doctor welcomes him, thinking that he will be good company for Helen during his absence. Jack takes advantage of the situation and induces Mrs. Yorke to elope with him. She promises to meet him at the railroad station. Yorke learns of their plans, but an urgent case at the hospital prevents his delaying to talk to Helen about it. After performing the delicate operation, Yorke hurries to the station, and is about to shoot Jack when he sees Helen motion to him to take her back home. She pleads forgiveness for her lack of faith, and promises never to judge by appearances again. C.R.C.

Broncho Billy and the Vigilante—Essanay—February 20.—At the opening of this picture some wonderful views of western prairies are shown which will excite admiration. G. M. Anderson, in his well-known role, Lee Willard and Ernest Van Pelt do creditable acting. The story deals with the attempt of the vigilante to lynch a cattle rustler whom Broncho Billy has captured. The sheriff, however, protects his man, but eventually the mob make both Broncho and the rustler prisoners and proposes to lynch the latter. There is considerable tension at this point but, by a clever ruse and with the assistance of the old inn keeper, Broncho manages to effect the outlaw's escape. There is a sudden change to comedy at this point of the story, which is rather detrimental to its finish, though the whole is a meritorious offering. C. J. C.

The Engineer's Peril—Kalem—February 20.—Another of the "Hazards of Helen" series, in which Helen, the girl operator at Hobart, is able to warn her friend Anna, the operator at Montville, that Tim Hudson, a notorious swindler, is headed for Montville. Anna brings about Hudson's arrest when, posing as a minister, he attempts to swindle the people of the town. Anna marries Tom Binfield, a locomotive engineer, and later when Hudson escapes from jail he secures a position as fireman on Tom's engine and boards at Tom's home. Though Anna fails to recognize him, Hudson is filled with an insane desire for revenge upon seeing her. Failing in an attempt to shoot her, the convict determines to punish Anna through Tom, and next day, just as the train passes the Binfield cottage, the fireman strikes Tom over the head with a wrench and believing his victim dead leaps from the engine. At the frightful risk of her own life the girl, who has seen Tom's body hanging over the locomotive cab, succeeds in rescuing him. Helen Holmes and Anna Nilsson featured.

It All Depends—Lubin—February 20.—Clara Dean, a wealthy young woman of musical taste, has been carrying on a secret correspondence with Senor Marchese, principal tenor of the opera company, though Clara's mother is desirous of having her marry Harold Flint, a wealthy young man who calls on her. Senor Marchese engages the apartment directly above the one occupied by the Deans, under the name of Conti, and there with his accompanist does much rehearsing. Mrs. Dean, who is subject to headaches, objects to the noise and tells the janitor. When he fails to quiet the disturbance, Harold agrees to see what he can do, but likewise fails, and Clara finally visits the apartments herself. Coming face to face with Senor Marchese, she at once recognizes him and without saying a word rushes down stairs. Marchese follows her, and is amazed to find his pictures scattered all over the place. Soon Marchese does all his practicing in the Dean apartments with Clara as his accompanist, and the noise they make is objected to by all the other tenants in the building. Later, when the landlord discovers the importance of his tenant, the tenants unite in declaring his music wonderful, and congratulate Clara on her engagement to him, the moral of the tale being that it all depends upon the viewpoint. Ethel Clayton and Joseph Kaufman featured.

Love and the Leopard—Selig—February 20.—Some of the situations developed in this film, made by the Jungle-Zoo Company, are real thrillers and while the plot is not entirely convincing the excitement is kept at a high pitch throughout. Edwin Wallock who has the leading role, appears to take desperate chances with the animals. Clever photography also does much to make the film realistic. The story deals with the love affair of an African hunter and his sweetheart. The hunter falls in love with an English girl, who is visiting in the jungle and she tells him to bring her a leopard skin. Attempting to do this he almost loses his life, but is saved by his sweetheart. He then realizes his mistake. C.J.C.

Twice Rescued — Vitagraph — (Two Reels)—February 20.—After being rescued from a shipwreck by Stephen Royston, son of a farmer, Nana, orphaned by the catastrophe, is adopted by the family and both Stephen and his brother, Godfrey, fall in love with her. Stephen who loves to paint, is berated by his father for such foolishness and Godfrey, realizing that Nana loves Stephen and desiring a clear field, so arranges matters that Stephen is ordered to stop painting or leave the farm. Stephen goes to the city and, though unable to pay a model, secures Elsie, a poor flower girl, to pose for him. Stephen's letters to Nana are intercepted by Godfrey, but Nana still remains faithful and securing a small sum of money goes to the city to seek Stephen. Elsie has become weak and ill and one day while Stephen is absent for a doctor Nana arrives and seeing Elsie thinks she is Stephen's wife. Leaving a note saying she now understands his silence, the girl, who is despondent, wanders down to the river and jumps in. Stephen, passing, hears her cry, leaps over the pierhead and rescues her from drowning the second time. He explains all, convinces her of the truth and a joyful reunion occurs. James Morrison and Dorothy Kelly featured.

Mutual Program

Across the Way—Princess—February 12.—Sparks learns, upon visiting his fiancee, Bianca, an art student, that his friend, Tom Brown, a writer, is living across the court. He notices that Bianca and Brown are mutually attracted and plans to play a joke upon his friend. He persuades Bianca to help him and they enact a murder scene before the drawn curtain. Brown, seeing all of this silhouetted on the shade, rushes over only to find Bianca peacefully reading a book. He begins to think his eyes have been playing tricks with him. A few evenings after this Bianca is attacked by a burglar. Brown, who has learned that the other evening's performance was planned by Sparks, thinks that this is another attempt to fool him. However, he goes stealthily to investigate and arrives just in time to save the girl, who breaks her engagement with Sparks and marries Brown.

The Death Dice — Reliance — (Two Reels) — February 13.—Baptismo and Sellers quarrel over a card game. Baptismo gets the worst of it, and determines to kill his opponent. Bass, a newcomer, and Sellers are rivals for the hand of Florence Steel, the daughter of a neighboring rancher. They have a violent disagreement over her, and she, fearing results, compels Bass to surrender his knife to her. Sellers tries to kiss Florence, and she threatens him with the knife. The cowboy strolls away, whistling "The Dying Cowboy." In horror, the girl drops the knife and runs into the house. When, an hour later, Sellers is found, stabbed in the back, Bass and Florence believe each other to be the guilty one. Popular opinion is against Bass and he does not deny the crime. Lafe Johnson, ex-sheriff, observes the unnerving effect that his humming "The Dying Cowboy" has on Baptismo, and he has the Mexican arrested. Johnson suggests that the two men's lives be staked upon the dice. The others agree, and the ex-sheriff, by a clever trick, makes fate decide against Baptismo. The Mexican then confesses.

The Escort—Royal—February 13.—Two young married couples find life intolerably dull. Even Rose, the maid of one of the couples, is unable to endure the tomb-like gravity of the household, and leaves. Just after this Eddie Rose, an old friend of the bridegrooms, invites them to accompany him to a prize fight. There is considerable confusion over the name Rose, and the wives, to entrap their "faithless" husbands, induce the janitor to act as their escort. As the latter is struggling into a dress suit, the husbands unexpectedly return. He takes refuge in the dumb waiter, but is finally captured after pulling himself up and down until he is tired.

Music Hath Charms—KOMIC—FEBRUARY 14.—Nell has two admirers, Jim and Jed. The former aspires to become a great singer and is favored by Nell's father. Jed is a pianist and is the suitor Nell favors. She and her father decide to wait six months and then try out the suitors on the strength of their musical abilities. Jim discovers an Italian laborer who has the voice of an opera singer, and hires him to sing behind the curtains while he goes through the motions in view of Nell. Jim is accepted and all goes well until the Italian partakes of some punch in the kitchen and begins to sing on his own account. The sounds penetrate to the parlor. Jim's ruse is laid bare, and Nell turns her affections towards Jed.

How Hazel Got Even—MAJESTIC—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 14.—Here is a Majestic drama of unusual strength and merit. It is graphically staged and tells a gripping story of ring life, its environments, and the effect which victory or defeat may have upon the prize fighter's loved ones. Dorothy Gish, W. E. Lawrence, Eugene Pallette, and Fred Burns do convincing work in the principal parts.

In the Twilight—AMERICAN—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 15.—A story founded on the song "Love's Old Sweet Song" in which two brothers fall in love with two sisters, though later one brother takes the downward path and proves faithless to his love. Years lears, the old song restores him to his boyhood sweetheart, and all are happy again. See review on page 277 this issue. N. G. C.

The Other Man—RELIANCE—FEBRUARY 15.—Arthur Matthews, a successful writer and a man of broad sympathies, singles out of the breadline Kerwood, an unkempt wreck of a man, whom he discerns to be a person of good education and breeding. He takes him to his home and makes him his secretary. The startled look of recognition that passes between Kerwood and Mrs. Matthews on their meeting is not noticed by the writer. The servants become aware of the clandestine meetings between Kerwood and their mistress and Matthews overhears some of their gossip. One night he surprises the couple just as they are about to leave the house together, and is about to shoot Kerwood when his wife clals his attention to a note which she has left on the table. From it Matthews learns that Kerwood is his wife's reprobate brother and that she was about to take him home to her father to beg forgiveness for the wayward youth.

The Happier Man—BEAUTY—FEBRUARY 16.—Irving Cummings makes his debut as an American star in this production, he playing the role of William Summer, supported by Virginia Kirtley and Joseph Harris. A young newspaper reporter visits William Summer, a recently arrived millionaire bachelor, and interviews him on success in life. He tells her that years before he and Harry Warren, boyhood friends and business partners, both loved Lucille Page. Losing their fortune in the stock market, the boys both went west in search of gold. Harry wrote daily letters to Lucille, while the other was too busy with his work to write. One day a miner is found badly injured and ere he dies he bequeathes half his fortune to the two men who befriended him. The boys realize that it will be better for one to return home to Lucille, while the other shall have the mine and wealth, and Harry unselfishly gives Billy first choice. The latter's greed for gold decides him and he takes the mine, while Harry returns to marry Lucille. As the interview is finished, Harry and his wife call with their two children and Billy declares that though he has wealth unlimited, the other is the happier man. N. G. C.

A Man and His Work—MAJESTIC—FEBRUARY 16.—Connolly, a detective, eats breakfast with his wife and children and leaves for headquarters, not having the slightest idea of what ventures the day will bring forth. The chief assigns him to run down Smitty, a crook with a most unsavory record who, the night before, robbed a safe and almost murdered a night watchman. Connolly disguises himself as a yeggman, succeeds in locating the hang-out of Smitty and his pal, and, after a desperate fight, captures them. He dresses his wounds, changes his clothes and returns home to his family and supper, saying nothing of his experiences of the day.

A Man of Iron—THANHOUSER—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 16.—Caleb Masters, president of a big manufacturing company, realizes that luxurious living is ruining his children and allows his company to become bankrupt. He then takes a position as manager of a quarry. His son, Ben, works under him and his daughter, Belle, acts as housekeeper. Wholesome, hard work molds the boy and girl into the industrious, dependable type of man and woman. Mrs. Travers, a wealthy widow, helps Masters back into his former position in the business world; and, after Ben and Belle have married worthily, becomes his wife.

Saints and Sinners—AMERICAN—FEBRUARY 17.—A typical small town drama, treating of the small souls of the average village gossip, and beautifully enacted by such players as Ed Coxen and Winnifred Greenwood. Mrs. Money, a wealthy woman, calls herself a Christian, since she gives large sums for charity, though she brutally snubs her most needy neighbors. In the same village lives a gambler, big hearted and generous, but in the opinion of the villagers, an atheist, since he professes no religion. To the village comes one of God's unfortunate ones, weary and discouraged, with a child of a few months old in her arms. All those to whom she appeals for help turn her away, and Mrs. Money is one of those who particularly treats her with scorn. When the gambler learns her story he takes her into his own home, and there gives her shelter. He is attacked by a number of village gossips who demand that he drive the evil woman out of the village. He orders them from his premises and the following Sunday amazes all by taking her to the little village church, where their attendance creates consternation. N. G. C.

Shorty's Secret—BRONCHO—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 17.—Shorty's pal, Bill Forbes, is in love with Nell Compton, the banker's daughter, but Judge Tuttle, a rich suitor, is the one favored by Nell's father. During an excursion to town Shorty becomes intoxicated, and is arrested. In the cellar of the jail he discovers a gold mine. On being bailed out he learns of his pal's predicament, and schemes to be arrested again. He hands out enough gold to Forbes to enable him to meet the qualifications imposed by Compton. Forbes also buys the jail, and Shorty serves his term of six months in the cellar of riches, supplied with all of the comforts and delicacies of the season.

The Deputy's Chance That Won—RELIANCE—FEBRUARY 17.—Mollie Owens, Rick Calvert's sweetheart, is taken captive by Monk Turgis, an outlaw, and is imprisoned in "death cabin." As deputy sheriff, Dick is sent out on the bandits' trail. He sees one of them going into an old cabin, shunned by everyone because of two mysterious murders that were perpetrated in it, and, in investigating, is seized and bound. While the bandits are forcing Mollie to write another appeal for money to her mother, Dick manages to slip a note in Turgis' back pocket. This he drops in town. The clue is taken to the sheriff, who organizes a posse, rides to the cabin, captures the outlaws, and rescues the lovers.

The Secret of the Dead—DOMINO—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 18.—Donna Carrillo and her daughter, Maria, descendants of an old Spanish family, are reduced to poverty. Don Jose Domingo, who holds their notes, insists on either immediate payment or Maria's hand in marriage. A party of excavators from the East discover the body of a petrified Indian on the Carrillo estate, and from the breast of the mummy take a paper revealing the location of an immense treasure. Domingo does all he can to prevent their unearthing the treasure, but finally falls a victim of his own scheme and is killed by an Indian chief. Tom, the son of the professor at the head of the expedition, falls in love with Maria, and they become married, and share the treasure.

Mr. Silent Haskins—Kay Bee—(Two Reels)—February 19.—Priscilla Miller, a New England girl, goes West to take over her late uncle's business in Arizona. To her astonishment she finds that the "business" is a large saloon, with a gambling and dance hall attached. She orders the establishment closed. Jim Black, a gambler, and Lon Haskins both propose to Priscilla, but neither of them receives a definite reply. They decide to gamble for her. By a trick Lon wins, but, thinking that Priscilla does not care for him, says nothing about it. She decides to go back home, and writes Lon a note, telling him that he is as welcome to her uncle's "business" as he would have been to her had he asked. Lon jumps on a horse, overtakes the stage, and rides off to a minister's with Priscilla.

Ethel Gets Consent—Komic—February 21.—This is chapter seventeen of the "Bill" series. Ed's mother finds a note written to Ed by Ethel, and, thinking that it is meant for her husband, decides to go out and see who it is that he is taking to lunch. Meanwhile Ed has called on his father to obtain his consent to marry Ethel. Later Ed calls for Ethel and takes her to lunch. A few minutes later his father enters Hadley's office to try to talk Ethel out of the marriage, and, seeing a girl (one of Hadley's clients) leave, he follows her. They enter the same restaurant in which are Ed and Ethel. Ed sees his father and hides under the table. Father approaches Ethel's table, and in a short time is engaged in an interesting conversation with her. Ed's mother enters the restaurant, and father ducks under the table, where he is brought face to face with his son. Ed, Sr., gives his consent to the young fellow's marriage to Ethel, and in return Ed, Jr., squares things for father with mother.

The Lost Lord Lovell—Majestic—(Two Reels)—February 21.—Molly, a slavey in a New York boarding house, is in love with Herbert, the butler in the house next door. Beth, an actress in search of a rich husband, dislikes Molly for no reason whatever, and tries to make life miserable for her. The rest of the boarders all pick on the poor girl in trivial ways, but Beth, especially, tries to make things hard for her. Just about the time that the newspapers run special articles on the disappearance from England of Lord Lovell, a strange man comes to live at the boarding house. He bears a slight resemblance to Lovell, and both Beth and Molly think it is he. Beth secures the stranger a place in her company, and the manager finds it a big drawing card to advertise the personal appearance of "the lost Lord Lovell." Meanwhile Molly and the butler have been married. The butler is greatly surprised to hear of the big hit made on Broadway by "Lord Lovell"—for he is the true Lord Lovell. He proves his identity much to Beth's chagrin and the impostor's disgrace.

Universal Program

Animated Weekly No. 153—Universal—February 10.—Bundle day in New York City to help the unemployed; funeral of Constante Garibaldi, a victim of the war, in Rome; the International Ice Carnival at Saranac Lake, N. Y.; Hotel Knickerbocker bread line, New York City; Lawrence Sperry demonstrating an automatic balancer for use in U. S. navy; making cavalry saddles for the Allies' troops in Waco, Texas; war section showing views of the English coast which was recently bombarded by the enemy's air fleet and other recent and important events; cartoons by Hy Mayer.

The Son of His Father—Imp—February 15.—John Wilson, a blacksmith's son, wins a scholarship to a college, the same one attended by young Van Buren. The latter spreads the story of John's poverty, the result being that the poor boy is shunned by his classmates. One day Van Buren insults John, who demands an apology. Van Buren refuses and, in the fight which follows, a fellow named Sadler is knocked down. He revenges himself on John by leaving his watch in his room and then accusing him of stealing it. Van Buren takes John's part when he learns from Sadler that it is a put-up job. The two bury their past differences and become fast friends.

Fooling Father—Joker—February 15.—Brown is a stingy and cranky man. One day he strikes Tom with his cane on finding him talking to Mandy in the garden. Tom drops as though killed. Brown rushes into the house and confesses his crime to his wife. She hides him and goes out to investigate. A policeman happens along and the four decide to scare Brown out of his selfishness. Mamma disguises herself as a seeress and demands money from the frightened Brown. He surrenders his wallet. When he discovers that it is all a hoax, his joy at finding Tom uninjured more than balances the seeress' extortion, and he resolves to be more liberal with his money.

The Unexpected Honeymoon—Victor—(Two Reels)—February 15.—Mrs. Wallace Guilford entertains at her country home. Among the guests are her sister, Irene, and Lane Manning, who is in love with Irene but backward about declaring this fact to her. Mr. Guilford, a prominent lawyer, is detained at his office and Mme. Tribly, who was to furnish the entertainment, is prevented from keeping her engagement by the stormy weather. One of the guests suggests a "mock marriage," and Irene and Manning draw the marked cards. Mr. Guilford arrives just in time to witness the finish of the marriage ceremony and informs the couple that they are legally married by the laws of the state. Dumfounded, Irene and Manning lock themselves in their own rooms and refuse to speak to anyone. Later, one of the guests suggests that they all go to her house, leaving the "unexpected honeymooners" alone. In the morning each receives a letter explaining the desertion. They make the best of the situation and in time fall in love with each other and go off on their belated honeymoon.

Changed Lives—Gold Seal—(Three Reels)—February 16.—While attached to the hospital corps in Europe Maggie Cline becomes intimately acquainted with Clara Grosvenor. The latter is killed by a shell and Maggie gathers her personal effects together to send them to her relatives. While thus engaged she receives a telegram addressed to Clara telling her that she has inherited a fortune on her uncle's death. Maggie decides to impersonate Clara, knowing that her grandmother has never seen her, and, on presenting her credentials to John Holdworth, the attorney, is welcomed as Clara Grosvenor and becomes mistress of the uncle's rich estate. After a time Maggie invites the grandmother to come and live with her. The lady notices the difference between her signature and that on Clara's other letters, and becomes suspicious. Her fears are confirmed on meeting Maggie by a few remarks about the Grosvenor family which pass between them, and she sends for Holdsworth. In the meantime Mrs. Grosvenor's servant, James, has begun to fear that his theft of the old lady's jewels will be discovered and, knowing that she is the only one in a position to convict him, he gives her an overdose of headache medicine. The grandmother dies before Holdsworth's arrival. Maggie's secret is safe but James is taken into custody by the authorities.

A Voice in the Night—Eclair—(Two Reels)—February 17.—Rex Malden, star reporter on the Times, while out walking late at night, passes a girl, and is struck by the look of terror in her face. A short distance down the street he sees a couple struggling. A shot rings out as he arrives on the scene, and Pollard, a man prominent in politics, falls to the walk, dead. The masked man covers Malden with his gun, says: "I am in the cause of right—it will be best for you to say nothing of what you have seen," and passes on. Malden follows, sees him hide the mask and gun, and takes them. The sergeant, a friend of the reporter's, finds the body, and at Malden's request, allows him to handle the case, betting that he will not get the man. Malden accepts the bet, relying entirely upon his remembrance of the murderer's voice. Some time later Malden is assigned to cover a trial. He hears the judge sentence the man, and realizes that it is the voice of Pollard's murderer. Securing the mask and gun he calls on the judge in his anteroom, first notifying the sergeant that he has found his man. Confronted with the evidence of his crime the judge tells Malden the story of how he killed Pollard to avenge a wrong done his sister. Outside, Malden refuses the sergeant's money, explaining that he has forgotten the voice. A look of understanding passes between them.

Almost a Scandal—L-KO—FEBRUARY 17.—Peggy goes wading, and Oscar, a fair and furious admirer, finds her slipper. He fights with the constable and later learns that the officer is the father of the slipper's owner. Father has the head constable in mind as Peggy's future husband, and naturally does not welcome Oscar. The latter, however, is not to be defeated so easily and starts developments which involve the head constable in a series of unpleasant and undignified scrapes.

It Might Have Been Serious—NESTOR—FEBRUARY 16.—Bob makes an engagement with his sister, Mary, telling her to bring her husband, Ben, whom he has never met. Mary calls at Ben's office and leaves a note telling him to meet her at Clarke's. A widow with whom Ben has been flirting destroys Mary's note and writes another that leads to a series of embarrassing, not to mention troublesome, incidents. In the end Ben learns Bob's identity and he and Mary become reconciled.

An Example—BIG U—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 18.—Joseph Bohn, ex-sheriff of Gray Gulch, Arizona, resides with his daughter and her husband, a miner. He notices the girl's growing indifference towards her husband, and divines that there must be another man in the case. His conjecture proves correct, and he orders the man to leave. Taking his daughter back to the cabin, Bohn sits down beside her before the fireplace and tells her the story of the tragedy in his past. He returned home one day to find that his wife (her mother) had offered hospitality to a man who was badly battered up and seemed to be in unfortunate circumstances. The stranger stayed with them until well, when he induced the sheriff's wife to elope with him. The half-crazed husband followed and found them on the desert, dead from thirst. The baby, however, still lived and the sheriff took it back home. Bohn then turns to the girl and tells her that she was the baby. The story has the desired effect. When the miner returns home he is greeted with smiles and kisses by his wife.

The Adventures of a Sea-Going Hack—REX—FEBRUARY 18.—Dallas receives and accepts an invitation to dine with his friend, Daisy, and on the same night Mrs. Dallas attends the Plymouth reception. Later Dallas and a group of friends, all intoxicated, see an apparently deserted cab standing at the curb. Dared by the men, Dallas mounts to the cabby's seat and drives off. In the meantime, the butler and a band of crooks rob the Dallas home of its valuables. They are chased by the police and hail a cab, but find it too slow, leave the loot in the vehicle and make their escape. Mrs. Dallas hails a cab, not recognizing the driver, and asks to be driven home. A policeman stops the cab, finds the silverware in it, and arrests both passenger and driver. Dallas narrowly escapes exposure and grasps the opportunity to reprimand his wife for her conduct.

The Fox Trot Craze—STERLING—FEBRUARY 18.—Two hallroom boys decide to attend a dance in their hotel, and Harold sent out his only suit to be pressed. Percy attempts to press his own, but burns it, and steals Harold's from the bell-boy. Harold tires of waiting, finds out that Percy has taken his suit, and strides into the ballroom to recover it, clad in a portiere. In the struggle which ensues both lose their coverings and roll out on the ballroom floor in plain sight of the horrified guests. The hallroom boys swear off on dancing and ballroom fights forever.

An Oriental Romance—IMP—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 19.—Hop Kung, son of a wealthy Chinese merchant, returns from college with his chum, Dick Fenton. Lian Kung dislikes his son's intimacy with the whites, especially with Dick's sister, Clara, and warns the young fellow not to forget his race. Dick loses heavily at gambling and falls into the clutches of Heapley, who conducts a money lending business for Lian Kung. Hop Kung learns of his friend's trouble and induces his father to release him from his obligations. In Dick's presence Hop tears up the other's notes. A month passes. The attachment between Clara and Hop Kung begins to attract attention. Dick grows angry at the thought of his sister marrying a Chinaman, and upbraids Hop Kung for forcing Clara to love him. He agrees to cure the girl of her love for him and, though it breaks his heart to do it, he makes love to all the girls at a party, giving Clara the impression that he was merely flirting with her.

How Doctor Cupid Won—NESTOR—FEBRUARY 19.—This is one of Al Christie's laugh-getters that is bound to make a hit. Cupid in the guise of a doctor is successful in his conquest, but not without endless trouble. Eddie Lyons, Lee Moran and Victoria Forde featured.

Three Bad Men and a Girl—101 BISON—(TWO REELS)—FEBRUARY 20.—Three pals, Joe, Jim and Shorty, are mistaken for three "bad men" who have been terrorizing the district, and, after a series of ludicrous happenings are captured, disarmed and ordered to leave town. The girl, who was the only one brave enough to approach the men before their capture by the crowd, takes a great liking to Joe. The three men come across the three desperadoes and capture them. They are heralded as heroes by the citizens who formerly banished them. The ending leads us to believe that Joe and the girl will soon be married.

The Counterfeit—VICTOR—FEBRUARY 19.—The police captain is mystified by the operations of a counterfeiting gang that is circulating an almost perfect variety of ten dollar bills. Broadway hotels, banks and stores without number are listed among the victims. One day he is "tipped-off" to the location of their rendezvous by "the kid" and succeeds in rounding up the whole gang.

Love and Law—JOKER—FEBRUARY 20.—Tom and the judge are rivals for the hand of Mandy, whose mother favors the judge's suit. Mandy meets Slippery Sue, who is trying to escape from the police and dons her cape and veil to save her. The policeman pays no attention to Mandy's pleas and takes her to the court house. In the meantime the judge has had Tom arrested for some trivial offense and, to get him out of his love path, sentences him to six months in the workhouse—unless he will agree to marry the first woman brought in. Tom chooses the latter and is married to Mandy. The judge and Mamma are more than astonished when the girl raises her veil.

A Martyr of the Present—POWERS—FEBRUARY 20.—William and Clay Strong are bankers. The bank examiner discovers a shortage and William learns that his brother is the thief. To save Clay's wife and family from disgrace William throws suspicion on himself by leaving town. He takes up residence in an out-of-the-way village near the sea and later marries Maria, a fisherman's daughter. On his deathbed, Clay confesses. His wife and the doctor seek out William and induce him to return to his home town. William is ashamed of his plain wife. He consents to take his son back home to place him in a school. Maria is broken-hearted on realizing that her husband hesitated to return home on her account, and rows out to sea in an open boat. Later William sees an empty row boat drifting.

The New Dress—Eclair—February 21.—A man and woman and their three children move into the house next to that occupied by the old miser. The children try to make friends with the old man, but fail. The next Sunday will be the wedding anniversary of the father and mother, and the man decides to buy his wife a new dress. He steals the money from the miser. The latter misses it and suspects his neighbors on seeing the woman wearing a new dress. He enters the house accompanied by the sheriff, and comes face-to-face with the woman. They recognize each other as sister and brother. The miser is the family's guest at the anniversary dinner.

Their Last Haul—L-Ko—February 21.—At the girl's request, two crooks promise to reform after turning one more trick. It happens that they both plan on robbing the same safe, as do a gang of burglars. The result is that the safe is suspended from a twenty-story building with a man and a time bomb locked inside. The explosion teaches them that the laws of the city and of gravity are worthy of consideration.

Threads of Fate—Rex—(Two Reels)—February 21.—Two children, a boy and a girl, come into the world at the same time but grow up in circumstances that are almost opposites. The boy yearns for the real beauty of life and, despite his immense wealth, dons the attire of a street musician, and travels from village, finding in the simplicity of the farmer folk that which he has sought in vain in the higher planes of life. The girl, raised in poverty, goes to the city to become the protege of a rich aunt and is introduced to society. Here she meets a profligate count whom her aunt presses her to marry. She runs away and in the woods meets the wandering violinist, who charms her with his music. They keep their real stations in life secret, each judging the other by appearances. After several meetings the inevitable happens—they fall in love. In the meanwhile the aunt keeps insisting on the girl's marrying the count. Realizing the hopelessness of her love the girl consents, later regretting it. In an effort to forget the musician returns to the city and throws himself into the whirlpool of life and gaiety, but without the desired result. He travels abroad and again meets the girl. By mutual consent they evidence their love for each other and determine to elope. The count discovers their plans and they rush away to their death. The threads of destiny lie severed.

Feature Programs

Alliance

The New Wizard of Oz—Oz—(Five Reels)—A film version of the famous musical comedy and book presenting the Scarecrow, the Tin Woodman and Dorothy, the Kansas Girl, in the many adventures which made them popular with the public. Frank Moore appears as the Scarecrow, Pierre Couderc, as the Tin Woodman and Violet Macmillan as Dorothy. There are many distinct novelties, some of which were obtained by means known only by Mr. Baum and his associates. The story follows closely that of the book, which is too well known to be repeated.

Box Office

The Bracelet—White Star—(Three Reels)—George Reed, a wealthy bachelor, quarrels with his fiancee, Mary Clark, at a ball and goes out to the garden. There he sees a face peering through the bushes with a pistol pointed towards him. Instantly he recalls the past, in which he visited a little fishing village while on a trip some time before and persuaded Ethel Burton, a fisher girl, to elope with him. He brought her to the city and gave her an expensive bracelet, but never married her. Later he left her and she returned home and died in the arms of her brother, John, who vowed he would kill Reed. Later he learned where he was and came to the house that night. He kills Reed and escapes. Mary Clark, heart-broken because she believes Reed committed suicide on her account, goes to the fishing village, where she meets John. He sees on her the bracelet which his sister formerly wore and he tells her the story of Reed and then confesses his part of the affair. Later they fall in love.

Seeds of Jealousy—Nemo—(Three Reels).—Ralph Morgan and his young wife, Anita, attend a masque ball in similar costumes to those worn by another pair and when they see the pair making love each believes that the other is unfaithful. Anita returns home and decides to go to the gypsy camp, of which she was formerly a member and with whom she was traveling when she met her husband. Ralph confronts the man whom he believes is making love to his wife and learns his mistake. When he returns home he finds that Anita has gone and is heart-broken. He follows her to the gypsy camp, where he believes she has gone. He finds her there, explains matters, and she, sorry for her action, goes to his arms.

The Awakening—White Star—(Three Reels).—Herbert Randolph, an author and the son of a Louisiana planter, is engaged to the daughter of a neighboring planter, who is indifferent to his attentions. He comes to New York and attempts to succeed in the literary world. Jane Conway, daughter of the publisher to whom Randolph goes to sell his books, learns that his love scenes are lifeless and determines to force him to succeed. His southern fiancee visits him and Jane, who has forced Randolph to care for her despite himself, forces the other girl into believing that he is leading a life of dissipation, thus breaking their engagement. Jane visits Randolph's room and kisses him while he sleeps, this inspiring him to write a book which at once meets with the approval of Jane's father. When it is published it proves a great success and Randolph then turns to Jane and asks her to share his triumph.

General Special

The Accounting — Essanay—(Three Reels)—February 18.—Another secret service story in which Francis X. Bushman appears as Gordon Bannock, a U. S. sleuth sent to Retrograd to secure a treaty being signed between that country and a neighboring kingdom. After many exciting adventures, Bannock succeeds in his mission, and wins as his wife, Olga Petroff, the cleverest spy in the employment of Retrograd. Complete review will be found on page 271 of this issue.

Paramount

Buckshot John — Bosworth — (Four Reels)—Buckshot John is a leading member of Bad Jake Kennedy's gang, and after the band is dispersed he is the only one who can tell the express company of where the treasure was cached. He, however, refuses and begins his prison term. After serving fifteen years of his thirty-year sentence he is still unshaken in his determination and prays for the chance to restore the money to its rightful owners. Meanwhile Dr. Gilmore, a quack, seeks to win Ruth, the daughter of a state official. His rival is Jimmy Dacey, a reporter, whom Ruth loves. Jimmy interviews Buckshot John and the story he writes causes much comment. Through the reporter Buckshot John learns of Gilmore's hypnotic powers and tells him of the cache. When Gilmore tries to trick Buckshot, Jimmy is the one who prevents him. Buckshot escapes, pursues Gilmore, secures the money from him, and returns it to the proper owners. Jimmy exposes Gilmore's true character as well as establishing that of Buckshot John, and in the end brings happiness to Buckshot John and wins Ruth for himself. Hobart Bosworth appears as Buckshot John and Courtney Foote as Gilmore.

Her Triumph — Famous Players — (Five Reels)—Gaby, a humble chorus girl in a Paris company, attracts the manager of the company by her diligence and ambition and becomes understudy to Mlle. Simonde, the famous star. Claude Devereaux, the leading man, falls in love with Gaby and this further arouses Simonde's jealousy. She attempts to have Gaby discharged and, when she fails, resigns from the company herself. This gives Gaby the opportunity she desired and she becomes a star. Simonde attends her initial performance expecting to see her understudy fail, but when Gaby scores a tremendous triumph she attempts to shoot her, but the bullet strikes Claude instead. He is but slightly wounded and Gaby's attention to him increases his love. Mlle. Simonde determines to cause Gaby's downfall and has Victor, her lover, attempt to ruin her. For a time it seems as though Victor's plot will be successful, but Gaby scores even greater triumphs and causes the downfall of her enemies. The play ends happily. Gaby Deslys and Harry Pilcer featured.

The Bachelor's Romance — FAMOUS PLAYERS—(FOUR REELS)—David Holmes, a literary critic and book-worm, hates the opposite sex and is happy only when secluded in his study. At the death of a cousin he is given charge of the latter's ten-year-old daughter, Sylvia. Not wishing to have her near him, she is placed on a farm with an aunt, where she remains until she is twenty-one years old. She then visits him and he is astonished by her beauty. She forces him to attend many social events with her and he finds that he actually enjoys them. When his sister's husband attempts to kiss her one night David comes to her rescue and this incident draws them closer together. A rumor becomes current that a young society man is loved by Sylvia and David, thinking he is too old and influenced by the taunts of his sister's husband, decides to give up his ward to the young man. She believes that he does not love her and agrees to marry the other man, but before the ceremony is performed they discover their mutual love and all ends happily. John Emerson featured.

Pathe

The Betraying Mark—PATHE—(THREE PARTS).—Mlle. Fromet, one of the best child actresses in Europe, has one of the principal parts in this picture. Double exposure photography is used to perfection in the climax. Being young and wealthy, Mrs. Elsie Chapin, a charming widow, has many admirers, among whom is Ralph Dorling, a clubman burdened with debts. She, however, favors the Viscount Maurice Byard, and at a birthday party given by her little daughter, Helen, announces their engagement. Dorling is chagrined at losing the rich widow. On returning home he surprises a burglar in his rooms. Capturing the thief, he finds that it is a woman, and that she bears a wonderful resemblance to Mrs. Chapin. An idea occurs to him, and the burglar promises to help him carry it out. They decoy Mrs. Chapin away from home, imprison her in an old castle, and Dorling's accomplice impersonates her, living at her home. Even little Helen does not suspect her identity until she sees a strange mark on her arm which she had never noticed on her mother's arm. Mrs. Chapin escapes from the castle, and with the viscount's aid exposes Dorling and his accomplice.

For Her People — PATHE — (THREE REELS).—This is a London-made film featuring Florence Turner and Jack Raymond. The subject, labor trouble, is not a pleasant one, but the story contains much that is meritorious, and affords unusual opportunities for good dramatic and character portrayal. Joan, an employe in a big mill, develops into a labor leader when a wage cut is announced. Knowing that if the men strike hard times and bad tempers will lead to acts of violence, Joan induces them to resume work at the lower wage, promising that at the end of the six months stipulated their old rate will be restored to them. Leslie Calder, the manager's son, is attracted by Joan, and falls in love with her, breaking his engagement with Dorothy Arnold, the mill owner's daughter. At the end of six months Arnold proposes to cut the wages again instead of raising them. To prevent this, Joan sacrifices her love for Leslie, and by a noble effort induces Arnold to allow the mill employes to resume work at their fromer wages. Convinced that she has done right in refusing to allow Leslie to marry out of his own class, Joan devotes the rest of her life to the welfare of her people. C. R. C.

Pathe News No. 10—PATHE—Powhattan, Standard Oil boat, grounds in the East River, New York; Edna Grube takes motion pictures of New Orleans from an aeroplane; Chciago attempting to find work for its unemployed; a cotton dress graduation at a New York high school; the President's barge; ready for a trip to the Panama Canal, in port at Portsmouth, N. H.; the trying out of a new automatic fire escape in Washington, D. C.; relief work being done for the Red Cross society in New York City for the European sufferers; fire in spice factory of the J. G. Gruman Company, Newark, N. J.; war section, showing numerous views of the French troops both at home and on the battlefield.

A Wolf Unmasked—PATHE—(THREE REELS)—Wayburn , and Ryan, crooks, plan to rob a bank and Wayburn learns that the cashier is Roy Barton, his former college chum and that Roy's father is the president of the bank. He is taken to the Barton home, where he meets Florence, the banker's daughter. Wayburn secures Ryan the position of butler in the Barton home and the two manage to get the combination of the bank safe and the keys to the building.

Roy loses heavily in a card game at his club the same night that Wayburn and Ryan rob the bank. Wayburn elopes with Florence at once and circumstantial evidence causes Roy's arrest for the crime. When Florence hears of her brother's trouble, she forces Wayburn to return with her. Wayburn and Ryan then attempt to rob the safe of the banker's home, but are discovered by old Barton. Roy flees from the detectives and arrives at home in time to assist his father in overpowering Ryan, but Wayburn escapes. The crook later returns to the house and falls into a trap laid by Florence, but he again escapes, this time, however, being captured when the automobile in which he is riding is wrecked by a train. Ryan subjected to the third degree confesses his crime and Roy's innocence is established.

Rods of Wrath — PATHE — (THREE REELS)—Wolf Erickson, captain of a "hell-ship," upon his return to port ill-treats his son. He is a man of a hasty temper and is continually brutal to both his wife and boy. Left alone in the room he falls asleep. Ten years roll quickly by and John, now a man, takes his sweetheart to a dance. Wolf, still a tyrant brutally, chastises him again. John runs away from home and goes to the city, where he falls in with denizens of the underworld and is shanghaied for his father's ship. Wolf again treats him in a brutal manner and the son resents this. In a struggle which follows a lamp is upset and the ship takes fire. John reaches shore in safety and returns home. When his father later returns home the two engage in a death struggle. John attempts to shoot his father, but kills his mother instead. With a start Wolf awakes and realizes that he is dreaming, but determines that he shall never let his wrath get the best of him again.

The Nemesis—Pathe—(Two Reels)—This picture is of more than the ordinary interest. It has been well staged, and abounds with human interest. Its photographic properties are excellent. Perhaps one of the most attractive qualities of the production is the splendid judgment that has been exhibited in the casting of the players. One of the best handled roles in the picture is that of the butler, who is a former convict and who proves a Nemesis to the man who was his prison pal in years gone by, but who has risen to a position of trust among people by whom he is admired and looked up to. The close of the picture shows the tragic death of the butler in a fall from a train as he is trying to make his way into the compartment of the man from whom he seeks to extract money in return for his silence.

Woof, Woof — Pathe — Reggy and Rags, two tramps, find begging most unprofitable and take without asking. Their haul, about a mile of frankfurters, suggests an idea, and they rig up a big box, put it on wheels, and Reggy rents it to a butcher as a magic sausage-maker. Rags sits inside of the box, and every time the butcher throws something into the funnel he (Rags) throws a couple of links of sausage out through the top. Spiegleburger is delighted to find that he can turn old shoes, bones, and pieces of wood into frankfurters by means of the magic machine. Mrs. Spiegleburger's dog bothers the butcher one day, and, in his anger, he tosses it into the machine. The rumpus that follows almost exposes Reggy's treachury, but the two tramps manage to elude the pursuing crowd, and in the last scene are seen dividing the proceeds of the machine's sale.

Runaway June—(Episode Four)—Reliance—(Two Reels)—Vandyke follows Marie, June's maid, to the hotel and is discovered there by Ned, the runaway's husband. Ned attempts to corner Blye but he escapes, and, when the husband returns to the hotel, June has left and goes to the home of Mrs. O'Keefe, the mother of one of the bell boys. Later June secures a position in the Wiles home, but Mrs. Wiles' extravagance causes her husband to become bankrupt. June goes to an employment agency to secure another position, and at the end of the installment is again walking into a trap set for her by Blye. A review appears on page 241 of the February 13 issue.

Runaway June — Reliance—(Two Reels)—(Episode Five)—February 10.—June goes to the address given her by the woman in the employment agency, and, too late, discovers that she is employed in a gambling house. Meanwhile, Marie, June's maid, has been seen in the market place by the Moore servant, Aunt Debby, and a scene results. Marie escapes without giving the colored woman any clue as to June's whereabouts, and Ned, when notified later, is unable to follow the trail from the market place. June's sympathy is aroused by the predicament of Gwendolyn Perry, one of the patrons of the roulette resort. The woman tells her the story of how she lost at bridge and tried to recoup her losses at the roulette table, her husband refusing to raise her allowance. June proves to be a true friend by foiling the woman's attempt to commit suicide and effecting a reconciliation between her and her husband. Blye learns that the police intend to raid the house, and instructs one of the girls to burn some rubbish in the basement. The police forget about the raid in their attempt to extinguish the blaze. June and the others escape during the confusion. A review appears on page 273 of this issue.

Thanhouser Syndicate

The $20,000,000 Mystery — (Episode Thirteen)—Thanhouser—(Two Reels)—Zudora and the mine superintendent are again captured and placed in the sanitorium by the conspirators. Jim goes to South Africa where he is investigates Zudora's mine. He secures a valuable diamond from Bruce as the latter is about to steal it and returns to America. The conspirators get the diamond again, however, and the chase which follows leads Jim, Storm and Hunt to the sanitorium. Here they find Zudora and though they capture three of the band the fourth escapes with the diamond. The girl is again safe but the superintendent dies. A review appears on page 283 of this issue.

United

The Burglar and the Mouse—Smallwood—Ethel, the daughter of a judge who is visiting in the country, receives a letter while at a friend's home, from her father saying that he will return to their city home the next day. She goes home that night and finds a burglar in the house. She convinces him that she is there for the same purpose that he is and they agree to split the spoils. He leads her to his den and by means of a paper dropped from the window she attracts the attention of her sweetheart, who lives across the street. He comes to her assistance, and, in a fierce struggle which follows, her sweetheart manages to overpower the burglar. Ethel and her lover then return to her home and he is telling her what a brave girl she is when a little mouse runs across the floor and the "brave girl" hastily leaps upon a table.

Courting Trouble—Gaumont — Brown and Green, lawyers, advertise for a stenographer. Many apply, one of whom completely captivates them. She is immediately employed and given a desk beside Agatha, the old hatchet-faced retainer, who has been their only employe for years. In their efforts to win Edith's favor, Brown and Green do many foolish things. Finally Green changes the new stenographer's desk with that of Agatha and Brown places his candy, with an invitation to the matinee, on Agatha's desk. Brown, however, finds a way out of it, by turning the tables on Green. It might have been allright, had not their wives decided to lunch downtown and inadvertently strolled into the very same cafe, where Brown and Green were entrtaining their stenographers.

Universal Special

The Master Key—(Episode Thirteen)—Universal—The end of the twelfth installment leaves Ruth, Dore, and Sir Donald fleeing from the frenzied mob, who seek vengeance for the raid made upon the sacred temple. Sir Donald's servant escapes from the inner recesses of the temple, and warns the party hiding on the hotel balcony of the proximity of the mob. They make their escape through a rear entrance leading out into a walled court. Here Ruth recognizes the beggar whom she had befriended a few days previous. He hides the party in market baskets and carts, and wheels them through the streets to safety at a camp frequented by fakirs, friends of the beggar's. They spend the night here, entertained by feats of Indian legerdmain and mystery. At dawn the high priest sends the sacred idol to a hiding place in the mountains. Wilkerson learns of it through the newspapers, and, aided by his guides, reaches the place, kills all but one of the Hindu priests, and secures the image and the secret of the Master Key mine. The priest who escapes hurries back to the temple to report the attack.

A Daughter of the People—DYREDA—(FIVE REELS)—Arthur Stillman, senior member of a firm of cotton manufacturers, conceives a plan to corner the cotton market. He closes his mills but secretly buys cotton and stores it away. Dell Hamilton, daughter of a dyer, and a favorite among the working people, is very much oppressed, as both her lover, Sam, and her father are thrown out of work. Sam discovers the underhanded work of Stillman, and tells the working people, who plan to secure either justice or revenge. Dell warns Stillman of his danger and he agrees to right conditions if she will marry him. For her people's sake she does this and Stillman has a mock marriage performed. They go to his country home to live. In time Stillman's love for the girl becomes true and he fears that she will learn of the illegal marriage. Dell returns to her people and finds that they have all turned their backs on her and that Sam has married another girl. She overhears a conversation between Stillman and Sam and realizes that her husband is a real man and that he truly loves her.

The Adventures of a Boy Scout—WORLD FILMS—(FIVE REELS).—Tom Slade, a tough youth left to shift for himself by his worthless father, scoffs at the neat-looking and orderly boy scouts until he comes to realize that they are just as strong and manly as he, but are without the air of bravado and the inclination for mischief which rules him. Tom becomes a scout, and grows up to be a cleanly built, clean-minded young fellow. In time John Temple and his son, Wilfred, are converted to the movement, and its influence even reaches Tom's father, causing him to reform.

Miscellaneous

Alice in Wonderland—NONPAREIL—(FIVE REELS).—This subject is an adaptation of the famous play by the same name, which delighted the children throughout the country. The scene effects and costuming are but two of the things which make this a wonderful film. In her wanderings, Alice visits the animals' convention and finds mice, owls, lions, lobsters, caterpillars, rabbits and all the other dumb creatures. She is also a witness at the trial who stole the queen of tarts; the visits to Looking Glass land, where everything moves backward; she views the fight between Tweedledee and Tweedledum and is nearby when Humpty Dumpty falls from the wall. These are but a few of her adventures while in Wonderland, the others being far too numerous to be recorded.

The Fight—LEDERER—(SIX REELS).—An adaptation of the play by Bayard Beiller which excited so much comment in New York, because of its theme—white slavery. The fight is staged in a western town, where women may be elected to office. Jane Thomas, at the death of her father, inherits a bank, and believes she is now in position to kill vice. As she is a born reformer, she hopes to be made mayor on a platform that will crush Vance, the leader of the underworld forces. This starts the fight which affects many whom the public had never before suspected. Among those is Senator Woodford, who has been secretly drawing money from the traffic and who is suddenly brought to his senses when his own daughter is caught in the trap. Vance and his henchmen, seeing that Jane is winning the fight, plan a run on her bank. This almost defeats Jane, but luckily the bank is saved and she is elected mayor. Vance is killed and with the new government in power everything points to the end of vice in the town.

Souls Enchained—TRUE FEATURES—(FIVE REELS).—The story of this picture tells a tragic tale of a married man and a woman who loved him so much that she could not forget him and who, at length, persuaded him to run away with her. He becomes sick and they fall into deeper and deeper poverty. In Paris he dies and she comes to her end in a hospital bed, her only consolation being that her passion lived until the last and even during her dying moments she refused to care for the man who had always loved her, but with whom she had quarreled.

The Strikers—APEX—(FOUR REELS).—Thomas Mansell, who has been raised by Buttingford, a mechanic, because his parents had died as a result of an unjust prison sentence to his father, has invented a blasting machine which the directors of the iron works desire to purchase. The employees at the works threaten to strike and the directors offer Mansell $50,000 for his invention providing he quiets his fellow workmen. Instead, Mansell urges them to strike, but later, when they threaten the lives of the president and his daughter, Mansell quiets them, saving the man and the girl. Buttingford steals Mansell's invention and attempts to blow up the works, but Mansell prevents this, being badly injured in the attempt, however. He is arrested as an anarchist, but Buttingford steps forward and accepts the blame. The president's daughter takes up the men's cause and manages to have her father and Mansell brought together. The young workman effects a compromise and in recognition of his ability he is appointed superintendent of the iron works and marries the girl.

A Woman of Impulse—GREAT NORTHERN—(FOUR REELS).—Magda, the wife of a baron, spends much of her time with another man, and the latter's uncle, Sir John Holck, decides it would be best to send her away. This leads to a divorce and after quarreling with the other man she telephones Sir John asking permission to return home, but he tells her she is an exile forever. Magda then accepts a position of secret agent of Ambassador Donaldson and the latter instructs her to learn what she can about certain bombs from Count Von Schonau. She infatuates the count, secures the papers pertaining to the bombs and places the blame on a musician who has been annoying her. At a restaurant Magda sees Sir John and his son, Percy. She infatuates Percy to avenge himself on his father and the young man breaks an appointment he has made with the minister of war that he may visit her. The father, having learned of what has happened, rushes to Magda's apartments and takes his son away, leaving Magda to her fate.

shows how the husband of the beautiful Foscarina was forced to flee from Venice in the early days when the city was ruled by the Council of Ten and how he took his wife's jewels with him and hid them in an underground tomb. The actual story begins about the present time. A Russian woman, a descendant of Foscarina, comes to the ancient palace of her ancestor, to make her home there with her maid. A ghost-like creature steals her necklace the first night she is in the palace and she secures the services of Argo, a noted detective. After carefully investigating the case, Argo learns that two persons are responsible for the robbery and catches them in the act of breaking into the underground tomb, in which Foscarina's husband hid the jewels years before. One of the criminals is captured after a chase and another chase takes place when Argo attempts to return to the castle before the other thief can secure the gems of Foscarina. The detective wins out, but the jewels are again stolen from the Russian woman and this time the detective catches the thief, who proves to be the woman's maid.

Was He a Coward?—Plaut—(Three Reels)—The spendthrift son of a wealthy father is sent from home because of his actions. Fate deals harshly with him and he is sentenced to prison for a crime which he never committed. In time he escapes and conceals his identity. Later he saves a banker's daughter. He is on the road to prosperity and happiness when he is recognized by a detective and, though he is vindicated of the charge for which he was imprisoned, he is again placed behind the bars for breaking jail. When he has served his sentence the banker's daughter is still firm in her desire to marry him, but he feels that the shadow which has fallen on his own life will also blight hers and goes away.

The Blue Mouse—Photoplay Production Releasing Company—(Six Reels)—A European made comedy, founded upon the famous play of the same title, in which an employe of an insurance company arranges to have "the Blue Mouse," a music hall artiste, appear as his wife in order to fascinate his employer, who is in the habit of showering favors upon such of his employes as have pretty wives. Numerous mix-ups in identity occur, all of which are mirth provoking and it is not until the end of the sixth reel that everything is straightened out, though at that time each one of the characters has accomplished his purpose. A review appears on page 279 of this issue.

Stop Thief—George Kleine—(Five Reels).—Mary Ryan and Harry Mestayer appear as co-stars in the Kleine film which has been made from the Cohan & Harris farce, "Stop Thief." The picture was given a special private showing at the Palace Theater in Chicago on Tuesday, February 9, and, judged by the ripples of laughter that wafted themselves through the audience, the film is just as great a success as was the play. The story, as everyone knows, concerns the doings of Nell Jones and Jack Doogan, her fiance, two light-fingered individuals who invade the home of Mr. and Mrs. Carr in search of loot and after taking certain articles of value so shift them about and "plant" them on the persons of other characters in the story that one or two of these other characters believe themselves victims of kleptomania. From start to finish the picture is a riot of fun. N. G. C.

The films of all the companies are now being submitted to the National Board of Censorship and when approved by them bear official stamp which is shown above. Screen productions having been thus approved are certain to entertain an audience of any kind without offending even the most sensitive person present.

The Temple of Rogues—Apex—(Three Reels).—Paul Grant, chief of the Temple of Rogues, learns of a shipment of gold and plans to procure it. Brown, chief detective, is in personal charge of the shipment and decides to carry it by motor instead of train. He sends a telegram to this effect, which falls into the hands of Grant and the outlaws' plans are changed accordingly. While the motor trucks are passing through the country they are blown up by bombs dropped from an aeroplane and the gang rush their spoils aboard a wharf. Brown escapes with his life and takes up the pursuit. One of the members of the band becomes jealous of Grant's attentions to his sweetheart and tells Brown of the outlaws' plans. The detectives arrive too late, however, as the gold has been removed to a ship. The traitor is thrown overboard, but is picked up by a passing ship. Arriving at the wharf, he tells the detectives of their destination and the representatives of the law follow the ship. A desperate battle takes place, which ends with the capture of the outlaws, but which causes the death of the man who betrayed their secrets.

The Press Agent Says—

That while directing "The Campbells Are Coming" at Universal City, Francis Ford provided himself with twenty-five round silver dollars. "Now boys," said Ford to the soldiers and cavalrymen whom he was rehearsing for a cavalry charge, "each one of you who stages a realistic man-and-horse fall before the camera this afternoon gets a solid silver dollar in addition to his regular salary." Ford's offer was greeted with a cheer. The camera began to whirr. Thirty yards from the busy cameraman they began to fall. The enemy's guns were getting in their work. They fell to the right, they fell to the left. But such falls! Remington should have been there to get the action. Each and every cavalryman not only threw himself with wild abandon from the back of his mount as shells burst about, but in addition pulled up their horses so suddenly that the animals poised for an instant on their hind legs, then quivered and fell on the battlefield—dead. Needless to say, the boys got their dollars.

That E. H. Calvert is especially adapted by training for the leading role in "The Crimson Wing," the Essanay six-reel photoplay from the novel of H. C. Chatfield-Taylor. He takes the part of the Count Ludwig von Leun Walram, a military officer, who is actively engaged on the field. Mr. Calvert is a graduate of West Point and was a Captain in the U. S. Army for years, which accounts for the exactness with which he interprets the part.

That thousands of visitors to the South Wales art academy at Cardiff, particularly Americans, have been greatly interested in a large and beautiful painting typifying the American cowboy, which was very recently accepted and hung upon its walls. J. Warren Kerrigan of the Universal is the original of the painting.

That Mary Pickford, the Famous Players Film Company star, has been extended the most signal distinction ever conferred upon a motion picture star, by the board of education of Kansas City, Mo. In compiling a list of the world's celebrities, the greatest names of history, science and philosophy, among whom are Dante; Isaac Newton; Balzac; General Bernhardi; Ulysses; Lord Roberts; Villa, since the dawn of civilization were included.

That a strange little visitor arrived at the Pathe studio in Jersey City recently—a fourteen year old boy from Los Angeles, Calif. who had crossed the continent to see Pearl White. The boy, George Krakorian, had been saving his pennies for nearly a year in order to take the trip, and when he had got $31 decided that he could wait no longer.

That some real white mice played the principal roles in "Hubby's Cure," a Joker-Universal picture. The latest reports say that Louise Fazenda, Gale Henry and William Franey are considering sending in their resignations. Professional jealousy!

That Harry Myers, the genial Victor-Universal director, while rehearsing a scene in "Saved by a Dream," leaned against the door of a wooden safe, slightly ajar, and as he walked away he felt a weight on his coat tail. Said weight was none other than "the safe," locked tightly, and not a soul in the studio knew the combination. Poor Harry struggled for two hours and then someone suggested that he take his coat off! And he did. He's still saying some unutterable things under his breath!

That Jimmie Morrison, one of the juvenile leads of the Vitagraph stock company, was accused of being a palmist soliciting trade on the street by one of New York's finest, not so very long ago and was headed for the nearest police station when a friend, who also knew the officer, interposed, and Jimmie was allowed an explanation that cleared the atmosphere. It seems that Jimmie was studying hands so as to get an idea for a character in which they played an important part, and was standing on one of Broadway's busiest corners, paying particular attention to the movements of the hands of nervous persons. What first aroused the suspicion of the officer was the fact that Jimmie, in shaking hands with several acquaintances who happened along, turned their hands up so he could see their palms, and the natural conversation between friends was construed by the zealous officer into the solicitation of trade by a palmist.

Edison's Exciting Railroad Drama

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

THE Edison release of March 3 is to be "A Tragedy of the Rails," a two-reel adaptation of "33 Runs Wild" which appeared some time ago in Short Stories magazine. Although not a photoplay that one would enthuse over, it contains considerable good story matter, is fairly well staged, and its action works up to a thrilling climax.

It is only just to the good parts of the picture to criticise those that do not come up to the standard. The beginning of the story, which was evidently carried by dialogue in the original lacks substance in its presentation; the crowd assembled at the enginemen's dance does not, in the least, typify one that would be found in a small railroad town; and the exhibition dance of three steps and a revolution given by Belle and Tony does not necessarily signify that the girl has jilted her old lover and transferred her affections to Tony as it is supposed to do.

The second part offers direct contrast to the lack of depth in the first part of the production. Here the plot excites interest, develops rapidly and consistently, and culminates in a climax in which Gertrude McCoy is seen to leap from a speeder, grab the handrails on a speeding engine, and swing herself up into the cab. Whether or not trick photography is employed is a secret between Miss McCoy and Director John Collins. On the film the feat is realistic to the last detail. The photography is fine. Its clearness in the scenes showing the runaway engine adds to the thrills which the spectator is bound to experience on seeing the wild locomotive tearing around sharp curves and up and down steep grades, headed directly for a passenger train.

Gertrude McCoy is seen as the heroic telegrapher, Belle, and Augustus Phillips takes the leading part opposite her as Bob Hillman, her engineer sweetheart. Carlton King's characterization of Tony Malone is good as regards his acting, but his make-up is a bit too dapper to represent the raiment of a section boss. There are but few scenes in which this trio needs support, and then it is given earnestly by a large cast of supers.

Bob Hillman and Belle Manning, sweethearts, both live and work in a small railroad town. Bob is an engineer and his fiancee is the telegraph operator in the station. The enginemen hold a masquerade ball, and the two lovers attend, neither telling the other how they are going to be dressed. Bob obtains a domino costume, and Belle borrows her brother's overalls, jumper, and cap for the occasion.

At the ball some of the girls dare Belle to test her costume by sauntering into the smoking room. Her entrance attracts no attention, but gradually her general appearance and manner of speaking causes the men to suspect her sex. They gather around poor Belle and tease her, and Bob insists that she smoke a cigar to prove her manliness. This test proves too much for Belle, and she doubles up in a paroxysm of coughing. This amuses the men greatly, Bob, especially, until she jerks off her mask. Bob then feels humiliated because of her entrance in the smoking room and scolds her for her rashness. Belle thrusts her engagement ring into his hand, and leaves in a huff.

Tony Malone, a section boss, takes advantage of the quarrel between Bob and Belle, and his pretended sympathy for the girl prompts her to use him as a means of punishing Bob through his jealousy. The engineer feels her indifference keenly, but does not begin to think that it is more than that, until he learns that she has allowed Tony to accompany her home. The next day the section boss strolls into Belle's office, and attempts to renew his familiarity of the night before, but is repulsed. In a vengeful mood, he leaves the office.

Later Tony sees Bob climb into the cab of his engine and decides to seek revenge. He catches up to the moving locomotive, knocks Bob unconscious with a lump of coal, and opens the throttle wide. His gun, cocked in his pocket, accidentally goes off, killing him. At the key, Belle learns from Sheltonville and Divisionville that Number 33 is running wild. Using an electric speeder, she meets the engine, backs along beside it, and, by a daring leap, catches the handrails and mounts to the cab. Belle reverses the throttle just in time to prevent a head-on collision between the lone engine and a passenger train. The crew revives Bob, and he and Belle return home together, settling their differences on the way, and planning for their coming wedding.

Mary Fuller in Edison Feature

As the third feature under the new Edison policy of putting out weekly a feature film in the regular service, "The Master Mummer," in which Mary Fuller is featured, will be released Monday, March 15. The film was made when Miss Fuller was with the Edison company and was done in five parts. It was intended to place this picture as a five-part feature in the special service of the General Film Company, but with the change of program to include weekly features, the exhibitor will profit by Edison's cutting it down to three parts, which retain the vital and big situations of the play. It is adapted from the popular book by E. Phillips Oppenheim. The story is one of royal intrigue and gives Miss Fuller splendid opportunities.

As the fourth offering in weekly features, Edison has secured the rights to the four-act melodrama, "A Deadly Hate," which has passed into theatrical history in England and in the English colonies as a classic in genuine thrillers of a wholesome type. The play, however, has never been played on the stage in this country and will afford a good opportunity to see the best play of the noted dramatist, George Roberts, who has also written the successful plays, "The King's Highway," "At the Mercy of the World," "A Night's Folly," "An Irish Girl," and "Shamus." This photo version will be done in three parts and released the latter part of March.

Metro Decides on Policies

The directors of the Metro Pictures Corporation this week concluded all preliminaries and settled upon a definite method of procedure, and plan of action, at the offices of this company, 1475 Broadway, New York City.

Primarily, the plan of the Metro organization is the eliminating of unnecessary expense, the distribution and dissemination of the producing companies products with a minimum of energy, cost and time—thus making the parent body act as the direct route from the studio door to the portals of the exhibiting consumer and thence affording to the consuming exhibitor, at equitable terms and consistent standard, a program promised to be equal to any now existent.

Metro, as a parent body, with various producing allies, intends to secure products from its producers, contingent upon each individual producer making his individual picture equal to the standard set by the Metro. The term of agreement between the Metro and the producer is a long period one, yet each individual production must be scrutinized by a separate board—created by the actual directors of Metro—whose duties will be to supervise the manuscript before it is produced, to consult the producer as to the star and cast of the picture and when the picture is finally made—to judge whether it comes up to the standard set. This board will be composed of three exchange-men, three laymen and three successful exhibitors.

The releasing policy of Metro will be one picture a week. These will be supplied in part by the companies allied with it, while the remaining, or open dates, will be filled with material selected from the open market, which measures up to the standard demanded by Metro from their allies.

No set figure or limit is made by Metro. No price is said to be too great for the procuring of a picture deemed worthy of distribution.

Metro is a closed corporation, with no stocks or bonds for sale. The directors receive no pecuniary considerations for their efforts and the affairs of the company are entirely in the hands of experienced, trustworthy exchangemen of practiced business ability.

A further announcement of the release dates, titles of productions and associated companies will be forthcoming within a few days.

Director Nowland at Washington

Director Eugene Nowland of Edison left New York Monday for Washington, D. C., where he expected to be about a week, making a film in conjunction with the government and pertaining to the civil service. With him went Gladys Hulette, Mrs. Wallace Erskine, Patrick O'Malley and a number of "extras."

American's "The Decision" a Pleasing Film

Robert courts Ida.

BECAUSE the script of the American Film Manufacturing Company's two-reel release of February 22, entitled "The Decision," called for acting rather than action, the fate of the production was placed largely in the hands of the players. And because the director carefully selected the types for each character and the players entered into the spirit of the part assigned them with enthusiasm, the finished picture will prove a delight to those who enjoy a comedy picture made along dramatic lines.

Winifred Greenwood, Ed Coxen, John Steppling, George Field and Josephine Ditt have the most important roles. Each introduces original bits of business which make the five characters they interpret appealing and true to life. There is not the least suggestion of over acting, but every situation is taken full advantage of. Mr. Steppling does an excellent character, that of a jolly lawyer known as Judge Clark. In a scene with Mr. Field, where the latter attempts to get him intoxicated, but where the judge outdrinks him the comedy element is well put over. There may be many who object to this particular incident, however, but it is handled in a most inoffensive manner. The love scenes between Mr. Coxen and Miss Greenwood and Mr. Steppling and Miss Ditt are also pleasing.

The settings are uniform with the story, the only exceptional one being a court room scene, which is not very large, but is cleverly arranged. The photography is clear and sharp.

The first few scenes of the film show Ida Price consulting her attorney, Judge Clark, about appealing a decision of the lower courts, which robbed her of the inheritance which should rightfully be hers. Her cousin Charles, by clever juggling of the laws, managed to secure the fortune. Ida is displeased at the seeming inability of the judge and leaves him half determined to take the case out of his hands.

Ida refuses Charles' compromise.

As she passes out of the office she meets Robert Graham, who is going to see the judge about securing a position, as he has made a failure of everything he has thus far attempted. They are mutually attracted, but neither speak. Robert enters the judge's office and secures a place as his assistant, while Ida goes home to think over the course she will pursue.

The next day Ida reaches a decision in regard to changing lawyers and goes to Clark's office. Upon entering she sees Robert studying diligently and at once changes her mind and decides to leave the case in the judge's hands. The three talk the matter over and decide to appeal to the supreme court. Ida and Robert becomes better acquainted and their attraction for each other grows. Upon returning home Ida is visited by Charles, who attempts to effect a compromise, but the girl refuses and tells him that he will have to fight the matter out before the higher court.

Ida has a spinster aunt who is being courted by

After outdrinking Charles the judge arrives in court.

The judge surprises Ida by the fee he asks.

Judge Clark and when both the judge and Robert visit Ida's home one evening many laughable human interest situations develop. At the close of the visit Ida and Robert are both certain that they are in love, while the aunt and the judge have become engaged.

The day to file the papers for the appeal arrives and Charles and his lawyer plan to trick the judge so he cannot secure the appeal. Charles meets Clark and takes him to the club, where he tries to get him drunk. The judge, however, turns the tables and leaves the young man intoxicated, while he arrives in court in time to file the papers. The case is presented before the supreme court and the decision of the lower court reversed. When Ida asks what the fee will be she is surprised at the judge's high rate, but when he says that both he and Robert want to get married she understands and gladly pays the amount asked.

Censor Law Favored by Ohio Exhibitors

Despite the general belief that exhibitors in the state of Ohio strongly opposed state censorship, a vote taken at the fifth annual convention of the Ohio branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America held at Columbus last week showed that about two-thirds of them favored it. As a result it is believed that no action will be taken to abolish the law.

The election of officers at the convention resulted in Max Stearn, owner of the Majestic theater, Columbus, assuming the president's chair. Sam Morris, Cleveland, was elected vice-president, Otto Ludeking, Cincinnati, treasurer, W. R. Wilson, secretary and M. A. Neff national vice-president.

Marion S. Pearce, national president was on hand, and addressed the convention, congratulating those present on the success which attended their efforts to unite. On Wednesday, February 10, a warm session was held previous to a vote on the censorship question, during which numerous speakers held the floor both for and against the support of the law. After the question had been thoroughly thrashed out, the chair called for a vote.

The members who voted the affirmative were: O. J. Sibert, Marietta; D. P. Larkins, Ashtabula Harbor; H. A. Hill, Athens; T. C. Weber, Marietta; Max Stearn, Columbus; Charles Weigel, Cincinnati; H. Q. Alexander, Dayton; J. H. Binower, Canton; J. M. Kaufman, Gallipolis; Paul Stuffer, Columbus; J. H. Broomhall, Hamilton; M. A. Neff, Cincinnati; D. T. Richards, Columbus; R. S. Stueve, Canton; G. D. Spragg, Bellaire; W. H. Shull, Martin's Ferry; R. E. Jacobs, Findlay; A. B. Hatch, Columbus; W. W. Miller, Mt. Vernon; S. Lawrence, Findlay; J. W. Nichols, Somerset; Ed Kohl, Cleveland; B. S. Leeds, Middletown; S. B. Dempsey, Columbus; W. D. Belknap, Columbus; J. W. Dusenberry, Columbus; W. C. Bettis, Toledo; Miss M. Van Vleerah, Ada; Mrs. Minnie Ely, Urbana; Otto Ludeking, Cincinnati; J. A. Maddox, Columbus; J. A. Ackerman, Cincinnati; H. L. Flory, Eaton; L. S. Miller, Cincinnati; W. I. Dusenberry, Columbus; John Hubner, Cincinnati; H. D. Kruse, Cincinnati and Lula L. Riefsnider, Urbana.

The following voted in the negative: A. L. Thomas, Newark; B. J. Sawyer, Cleveland; L. Smith, Alliance; Frank Beverstock, Mansfield; Thomas Beverstock, Mansfield; A. R. McCandlish, Cleveland; E. Schwartz, Cleveland; E. Sindeler, Cleveland; G. W. Heimbuck, Cleveland; S. Awbley, Cleveland; L. P. Stinchcomb, Cleveland; W. C. Adams, Cleveland; J. H. Simpson, Cleveland; W. H. Horsey, Cleveland; F. M. Kenney, Cleveland; Sam Bullock, Cleveland; August Kansek, Cleveland; W. J. Slimm, Cleveland; S. E. Morris, Cleveland; E. N. Downs, Cleveland, and L. Israel, Cleveland. Three members, W. R. Wilson of Columbus, W. Raynor of Dayton and F. L. Emmert of Cincinnati cast no ballot.

Throughout the convention the exhibitors manifested good feeling towards each other, and all pledged their support for the welfare of the organization. At the close of the meeting the president thanked the members for their hearty co-operation and expressed a desire to have them always remain intact.

Lubin Destroys Bridge

In the presence of fully three thousand people the Lubin Company, last week, dynamited the historical old covered bridge across the Chester River, at Upland, Pa., as a climax for a three reel drama called "On Bitter Creek," written by Emmet Campbell Hall and directed by Edgar Jones.

The bridge was about one hundred years old and was located opposite a colony of old houses in one of which William Penn was a frequent visitor. Of late years the bridge, through old age, has become unsafe and the township authorities decided to have it demolished and build a modern structure across the river. The Lubin Company secured permission to do the actual destroying and Mr. Hall wrote a special three reeler that fitted in well with the type of country in the vicinity of the old bridge.

The actual blowing up of the famous old bridge was in itself a thrilling climax. No one knew exactly what the old bridge would do when the large amount of dynamite stowed in it was touched off. The camera men intrenched themselves in and behind all sorts of things for protection while two motor driven cameras were stationed close to the bridge. When Jones gave the word there was a terrific report, the bridge shot upwards in the middle and then the entire structure dropped into the river and the debris started floating down stream.

Vocaphone Saves Elaine from Harm

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

HAVING seen such scientific marvels as thermite, the oxyacetylene flame, twilight sleep and the seismograph illustrated in such a simple manner that the average layman can fully understand their workings, one is not surprised to behold in episode nine of the Pathe serial "The Exploits of Elaine" another scientific apparatus fully demonstrated. This time it is the vocaphone, an apparatus for attachment to telephones, which enables a speaker at a great distance to make his voice heard very plainly in a large room in which is installed the instrument at the other end of the wire.

Craig Kennedy makes use of this apparatus in this installment of the exciting serial to save the life of Elaine, when she is attacked by the Clutching Hand, the criminal whom Craig has been pursuing for some time, in an endeavor to apprehend the murderer of Elaine's father.

The vocaphone is installed.

The picture opens with a comedy scene in which Kennedy makes use of the vocaphone installed in his room to awaken Jamieson, his friend, who is sleeping in his own apartment some distance away. Jamieson is amazed to have the voice of Kennedy call him, and awakens to seek the one who has entered his room to awaken him. It is only when Kennedy calls through the vocaphone to look on the sofa that Jamieson discovers the scientific apparatus which has been used to confuse him.

Having thus aptly illustrated the use of the instrument, Kennedy calls on Elaine and after explaining to her the new scientific marvel, installs one of the machines in the suit of armour which stands in the library of her home. This machine is connected by wire with the telephone in Craig's own apartments.

A day later Elaine chances to discover a secret spring in a certain panel in the wall of the library, which, on being pressed, opens the panel to reveal within a hiding place for valuable documents and papers. Amazed, she investigates and there discovers the papers disclosing the identity of the Clutching Hand and on account of possessing which her father was murdered.

Elaine, without delay, calls up Kennedy's apartments to inform him of her valuable find, and the Clutching Hand, who has visited the apartment in Kennedy's absence, receives this startling information.

He promptly arranges with other members of his gang to delay Elaine, who is going on a shopping tour that afternoon, and sends one of his minions to her home for the purpose of securing the papers.

Elaine is delayed by a small boy, who pretends to be nibbling at a crust of bread he finds upon the street, and out of sympathy the girl takes the boy to his humble home and undertakes to provide food for his invalid mother and consumptive father. The chance arrival of a charity worker discloses to Elaine that these people are grafters, who beg as a profession, and, later on, when she runs down a man on the street with her car, and is arrested and taken to the hospital, where the injured man is given treatment, she learns with surprise that this individual is also a professional victim of accidents, and has frequently fooled others unfortunate enough to encounter him.

All the time that Elaine is away from home, the minion of the Clutching Hand, disguised as a window washer, is seeking an opportunity to admit the Clutching Hand himself to the house. When the butler goes to answer the telephone the window washer admits the Clutching Hand, who at once operates the secret panel, and is about to lay his hands on the papers when Elaine returns home, discovers him and screams.

The charity worker tells Elaine the truth.

The Clutching Hand and his assistant.

The noise of the struggle between Elaine and the Clutching Hand is borne over the vocaphone to Kennedy, and the latter, realizing what is happening, goes to his own instrument and yells lustily for help, his voice resounding through Elaine's home and bringing other members of the family to her assistance.

Terrified, the Clutching Hand and his window washer assistant escape, just before Elaine's mother, the butler, and, later, Kennedy and Jamieson appear on the scene.

Assembles Fine Cast

Donald MacKenzie is making for Pathe a picture which gives every promise of being particularly fine. It is a three part drama and is being acted by an excellent cast, most of whom are making their debut in pictures.

Miss Thais Lawton is the leading woman and this picture marks her entrance into the motion picture field. She will be remembered as the leading actress with the New theater company, and also for her work with John Drew, Henry Miller, and Robert Mantell.

Percy Standing (son of Herbert and brother of Guy Standing) late leading man with Ethel Barrymore in vaudeville, and formerly with Nat Goodwin and Mrs. Fiske, is another star stolen from the stage by Mr. MacKenzie to work in this picture. Howard Hall, who played important parts in "Damaged Goods" "The Poor Little Rich Girl," "Within the Law," "The Stranger," and "The Climax" and the complete list of whose successes is as long as one's arm, is another to make his first appearance in pictures. To round out this fine cast is W. T. Carleton, famous for years as an opera star, and now achieving new laurels on the screen.

The scenario was written by George Brackett Seitz, the Pathe scenario editor, who, before he went into picture work, was a successful short story writer and playwright, having written "The King's Game," James K. Hackett's starring vehicle of the season 1908-1909. Mr. Seitz has written hundreds of the Pathe photoplay hits.

Enlarge Laboratories

Owing to the tremendous amount of new business received in the past three months, the Commercial Motion Pictures Company, Inc., has been forced to increase the size of its laboratories, as well as its factory equipment.

In the past eight weeks the little factory at Grantwood, N. J., is said to have turned out over 2,400,000 feet of positive prints.

The combination of tints and tones used, under the personal supervision of Charles Hirliman, the laboratory superintendent, has made a great reputation for the concern.

Warning to Exhibitors

We have been informed on very good authority that a new species of advertising slides is about to be sprung on the unsuspecting exhibitor, answering the name of "Nov-ads.' Joseph F. Coufal is the ingenious perpetrator of this novel sensation and stands sponsor for its existence. It is the latest offspring of this notorious master of the slide art. For bill of particulars consult the Novelty Slide Company; the official records give its address as 67 West Twenty-third street, New York city.

Thomas A. Edison in Films

Thomas A. Edison, the great inventor and electrical wizard, passed his sixty-eighth year post Thursday, February 11, and to record the occasion in a memorable way a motion picture of Mr. Edison, still hale and hearty and in the harness more than ever, was taken at noon in his plant at Orange, N. J.

Mr. Edison was taken with all the officials and principals of the organization, and shown shaking hands with those who wished him the good wishes of the day. Every one of the officials, as did also the thousands of his employes, wore a button with Mr. Edison's picture with two streamers attached, bearing the date 1847, Mr. Edison's birth year, and 1915. Standing on the steps of his famous laboratory, Mr. Edison was shown receiving the felicitations of his oldest employee, John Ott, who is older than Mr. Edison and has been with the organization forty years. Mrs. Edison had presented to each of the principals a souvenir carnation which was worn in the lapel. The motion picture will be saved in a collection which records many interesting and momentous incidents and periods in the great inventor's life and career.

Passes Without a Cut

C. Lang Cobb, Jr. manager of sales and publicity of Ramo Films, Inc., visited Columbus, Ohio on February 1, for the sole purpose of having "The War of Wars" an American made feature passed upon by the Ohio Censor Board.

With one exception the entire board was present and complimented Mr. Cobb on the excellence of the picture. "The War of Wars" is a strong photoplay which is said to have cost the Ramo Company $22,000 to produce. The states of Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Illinois, Missouri and Texas are the only states unsold for this feature.

State Buys Projection Machines

Jack Williams of the Mid West Theater Supply Company, 30 North Dearborn street, Chicago, recently visited Springfield, Ill., where he acted as operator and displayed some twenty-one reels of Illinois industrial subjects, which will be displayed in the Illinois building at the Panama Pacific Exposition. Mr. Williams, before leaving Springfield was given an order by the state of Illinois for two Precision machines, which it is presumed will be used for the projection of these industrial pictures.

New Film Renovating Fluid

Letters of endorsement and praise are steadily flowing into the office of the Githcil Chemical Company located at 220 West Forty-second street, New York City, as a result of the first distribution of its new "Githcil Film Renovator." It is a non-combustible, non-inflammable fluid that cleans, softens, and renovates films. A most favorable report of it was made in the analysis of the Bureau of Fire Prevention of the City of New York.

Sing Sing Sees "Alias Jimmy Valentine"

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

THE ordinary way of being Warden Osborne's guest in Sing Sing is to arrive prepared for a long visit, and accompanied by a body guard and a recommendation from the courts. On Sunday, February 14, the prison received about forty guests, booked only for the afternoon, recommended by Lewis J. Selznick, vice-president and general manager of the World Film Corporation, and accompanied by Jacob Wilk, publicity manager of the concern. The latter way of visiting Sing Sing is the more desirable, though Mr. Osborne is no mean host in either case.

The occasion of the excursion to the Ossining prison on Valentine's Day was the initial showing of "Alias Jimmy Valentine," a five-reel adaptation of the famous stage success produced at the Peerless studio by the World Film Corporation, with Robert Warwick in the title role. A number of the exterior scenes were taken inside of the prison walls, showing the men at work in the quarry, marching to and from the shops, and at recreation in the yard. In one of the interior scenes Jimmy Valentine is seen eating in the enormous dining hall, and in another, leaving his cell and recreating on the balcony in the cellhouse.

This is the first time that motion pictures have been taken inside of the prison buildings. In reciprocation for the liberties and courtesies accorded him by the officials and the co-operation he received from the inmates during the three days he worked within Sing Sing's walls, Mr. Warwick promised them that they would be the first ones to view his picture—and he kept his promise.

The chapel, located directly above the dining hall and connecting at right angles with the cellhouse, was packed with convicts long before the appointed time, one o'clock. Shortly after Mr. Wilk and his party piled out of their special car at the station and climbed the steep hill to the prison, Mr. Warwick and his party arrived, having motored up from New York City.

A one-reel Bert Levy picture was shown first, and then "Jimmy Valentine" began his screen career. The picture was an instantaneous hit. It opens with an introduction of Warden Osborne at which the men slapped, whistled, stamped, and shouted in their appreciation of the work of the man who, as some of the old residents later said, "made the place like a palace." Robert Warwick, introduced next on the screen, again set the place alive with applause.

Several parts of the pictures elicited unusual response from the spectators. The scene showing the convicts at work in the quarry got a big laugh, as did Valentine's debut through the big iron gate, and jokes were distributed all around as the men recognized each other in the line of marchers going to and from the shops. Gasps and murmurs of approval were plainly audible as Valentine, in a scene of unusual tensity, files his finger tips to the quick and feels out the combination of the safe in which the little girl is imprisoned.

The pictures were projected by a 6A Powers under the supervision of W. C. Smith, assistant general manager of the Nicholas Power Company, and were accompanied by selections on the piano by one of the inmates of the prison. Between the second and third reels one of the "boys," as the Golden Rule Brotherhood officers call them, sang Sing Sing's favorite song, "Don't You Wish You Were Back Home Again," and responded to two encores.

Every now and then during the performance the names and numbers of some of the men were called, summoning them to the screen-divided room off of the entrance to receive visiting relatives. As the last scene faded out one of the men introduced Robert Warwick who made a short speech in which he gave Warden Osborne credit for much of the picture's success, thanked the men for their co-operation, and expressed his happiness at being able to afford them any pleasure.

After the feature a one-reel comedy was shown, and then everyone hurried to the station to catch the 4:01 train—and did by a margin of one minute. Sandwiches, grape juice, ginger ale, cigars, and cigaretttes were served on the train under the waitership of no less a person than Jake Wilk who proudly spurned tips.

Indiana Exhibitors Oppose Censorship

There were two bills introduced in the Indiana Legislature during the present session, one of which legalized the films censored by the National Board of Censorship. This bill was introduced by Representative Cleary. The other bill, introduced by Representative Jedson, was a most vicious bill, inasmuch as it proposed censorship by granting the Board of Commission full power to censor all pictures and placed the state to an expense of twenty-five or fifty thousand dollars a year. Everyone who knows and has studied the censorship question knows how malicious is this movement to organize censorship and that the whole moving picture industry must and will be completely annihilated if every state has a separate censor board.

The Indiana exhibitors, through the Indianapolis Association, called a meeting of all the exhibitors of Indiana and asked for a hearing before the Committee on Public Morals, to which the bills were referred. This hearing took place on Wednesday, February 10, and was attended by a large crowd of exhibitors from Indianapolis and all over the state, by many ladies, ministers of the gospel, and others who were interested in the censorship question. J. W. Binder of the National Board of Censorship came from Columbus, Ohio, to assist at the meeting and pointed out that the only true and correct way to censor moving pictures was a voluntary board of censorship such as the National Board of New York City. Mr. Binder gave a splendid address and what he had to say carried conviction to all his hearers. Rev. Stansfield, Representatives Jedson and Cleary, and several ladies representing the Women's Christian Temperance Union and other moral uplift societies made talks and the motion picture exhibitors voiced their opinions through Dr. J. M. Rhodes and F. J. Rembusch who explained the situation from a practical standpoint.

The meeting was productive of much good and was carried on in a very sensible and dignified manner. The belief is that the knowledge obtained and the explanations made were such that the bills will never be reported out of the committee and Indiana exhibitors can certainly be gratified if this is the case. Indiana exhibitors have always shown a disposition to work together in perfect harmony and have resented the idea of legalized censorship at all times. The exhibitors will hold another meeting on Wednesday, February 17 at the Claypool Hotel, Indianapolis, at one o'clock, at which time a more permanent organization will result.

Zech to Talk

The next regular meeting and dinner of the Reel Fellows' Club of Chicago, will be held in the West room, banquet floor, of the Hotel Sherman, Wednesday evening, February 17, at 6:30 p. m.

The speaker of the evening will be A. H. Zech, of the Essanay Film Company, who will talk on advanced motography. A very interesting, as well as instructive talk from Mr. Zech is anticipated, as he is one of the best known photographic experts in this country. He recently conducted successful experiments, whereby he obtained photographs of musical notes, and it is claimed that he is the only one in the world who has been able to accomplish this wonderful result. We might also add, that Mr. Zech recently perfected a device, which has been adopted by the United States Government, whereby the naval experts are able to ascertain in advance by Mr. Zech's photographic process the exact speed a battleship will be able to make before the ship is actually built.

To Wear Old Gowns

In "The Lily of Poverty," the Bret Harte photo-drama now being filmed by the California Motion Corporation, Beatriz Michelena wears, in her scenes, at least two gowns which date back to the days of '49. They are interesting relics of two generations ago,—the period when crinoline made our great grandmothers look like perambulating parachutes. Miss Michelena wears in the mining camp scenes a simple dress, as befits the belle of the rough mountain village. In the ballroom scenes in Paris, Miss Michelena wears elaborate gowns, at least one of which is sixty years old. The others will be modeled after treasured frocks kept in old California families as heirlooms.

A "Craig Kennedy" Night

The University Club of Brooklyn had a "Craig Kennedy" night on Saturday, February 13, and the Glee Club of the organization sang a song especially composed on "The Exploits of Elaine." Among the guests were Arthur B. Reeve and Charles Goodard, collaborators in the authorship of the drama; Arnold Daly, who stars in it; Jas. K. Hackett, Will Foster, the artist; and E. A. MacManus of the International News. It was generally agreed that "The Exploits of Elaine" was some picture. The gathering proved conclusively that motion pictures are now appealing to the "highbrow" element.

"The Blue Mouse" in the Loop

On Saturday, February 20, the Star theater on Madison street, one of the big all-day-run loop picture theaters of Chicago will put on the six-reel feature "The Blue Mouse" for which the Photoplay Productions Releasing Company, has the Illinois rights. Aaron Gollos, president of the Photoplay Company, announces that the picture has been rented indefinitely and it is anticipated that a long run will result.

Beautiful Scenery in Thanhouser's Serial

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

THE exterior scenery in episode fourteen of "The $20,000,000 Mystery" is such that for several scenes one almost completely forgets the action that is going on.

Seldom has a more beautiful effect been worked into a dramatic picture than in a woodland scene, where an ice-covered waterfall, situated in the heart of a forest, forms the background for a chase scene in which James Cruze and Sidney Bracy pursue two players, impersonating a pair of crooks, during a snowstorm. That a camera should record a scene of this kind with every detail clearly emphasized is itself worthy of mention, and persons interested in pictures of beautiful bits of scenery will find something to enthuse over. In addition to this exceptionally beautiful scene there are several others of the snow variety preceding and following it which will also excite admiration.

The plan to trap Villiers. Madam Duval's reception.

Aside from the beauty of the settings this picture contains considerable that is of interest to those who enjoy thrills, excitement and action, in the motion picture sense of the word. The plots and counterplots of the conspirators and the friends of Zudora again monopolize one's attention and several encounters take place during the unreeling of the two thousand feet. The well known stars who have been in the recent installments again appear and the acting of all is of standard quality. Considered as a whole this episode should certainly be classed among the "bring 'em back" kind—a variety of films which has come into vogue among exhibitors since serials attained popularity.

Radcliffe and Madame Duval.

The opening scenes show Detective Hunt and Jim Baird in consultation with John Storm. Their attention is centered on the gold mines in Montana which belong to Zudora, but which they have every reason to believe are being tampered with by the conspirators. Taking Jim Baird with him Hunt hastens to investigate, while John Storm, Zudora's sweetheart and her attorney, writes a letter to a certain Marcus Villiers, a wealthy mine owner, asking for information about Zudora's father's will, also inquiring whether Mr. Villiers has any papers belonging to him.

Meanwhile Madame Duval learning from her agents that Marcus Villiers is expected in New York, with papers relating to the ownership of the Zudora mines invites him to be her guest at a big dinner party. Posing as Zudora she hopes to gain information from him, that will enable her to get absolute control of the coveted mines.

While they are waiting for the western capitalist's arrival, another member of the band reaches New York. It is Bruce, who has made a hurried trip to South Africa to get possession of certain gems, which he had left behind on his previous visit. Bruce saunters nonchalantly down the gang plank smoking a huge calabash pipe, although he knows that he is an object of suspicion by the customs officials. He airily invites them to inspect his baggage thoroughly, which they pass after a painstaking search. It never occurs to them, that under the tobacco Bruce is smoking with such evident relish, diamonds of immense value are concealed.

In the meantime Captain Radcliffe, disguised, has gone West. He has instigated a plot against Hunt and Baird and he determines to see that his plans are successful. Thus it happens, when the two champions of Zudora's cause arrive, the trap for their reception is set. The chauffeur of the superintendent of the Zudora mine is in the play of the conspirators, and when the two get into his car, they do not realize that they are being led into as desperate an adventure as any they have ever experienced.

Following his instructions, the chauffeur drives them to a deserted mine, where a number of the band, who have accompanied Captain Radcliffe, set upon them. There is a terrific struggle in a raging snowstorm but the superior fistic talent of Baird and Hunt enables them to escape, although badly mauled, and return to the railroad station. There, after a consultation, they decide that their trip west has been in vain and they hurriedly return to New York, where they realize there is urgent need for their presence.

Arriving there, Hunt learns from one of his men that Bruce has reached the metropolis and also that the capitalist, Villiers, has arrived. They do not know, however, that the latter has received a dinner invitation from Madame Duval, signed "Zudora," and that he has accepted it. Bruce's trail leads them to the old garage, used by the conspirators as a secret entrance to Madame Duval's mansion, and here they take up their posts to await developments.

It happens that their arrival is most opportune.

Zudora has received a note to which Madame Duval has forged Villiers' name, asserting that he is a prisoner at 122 Riggs street, the address of the garage, but is still in possession of the precious papers. As a matter of fact Villiers is just then enjoying the hospitality of Madame Duval, posing as Zudora. Zudora and Storm set out for the garage.

In the meantime, Hunt and Baird observe two burly ruffians lurking in the shadows of the garage. They are preparing to attack them, when the men disappear within. Their disappearance is followed an instant later by a woman's screams. Running to the door, Baird and Hunt find that the pair have attacked Storm and Zudora. Their advent compels the conspirators to turn and battle for their own lives, while Storm carries Zudora out to safety.

Fan Bourke, Thanhouser Favorite

Fan Bourke, of Thanhouser, is recognized in theatrical and motion picture circles as that ideal rarity, a good comedienne who can play heavy emotional parts well. She was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., and as soon as she was old enough was sent away to school. With that departure for a Canadian convent was born in the young girl's mind the wanderlust that was to lead her around the world and to many a stage, to see her make audiences laugh with and at her in Texas and sob with and over her in the far-flung reaches of the north country. Once she had taken the plunge into pictures, however, all the call to adventure and excitement in her veins was answered. After a few weeks in the Thanhouser studios, Miss Bourke settled down. The wanderlust left her, expelled by this newer and greater interest. At first the directors cast her only for comedy parts. But recently her native and acquired emotional ability won recognition.

Fan Bourke.

Forthcoming Alliance Releases

President Andrew J. Cobe announces that the Alliance Films Corporation has completed its tentative list of forthcoming releases. The Masterpiece's Film Company's production of "Jack Chanty" with Max Figman and Lolita Robertson which will be released Feb. 22, is to be followed by Carlyle Blackwell in the Favorite Players Production of the political romance "The High Hand."

Max Figman in Edward Peple's charming play "The Prince Chap" will be assigned a date and also be released on the Alliance program. Preparations are also under way at the studios of the Masterpiece Company for the production of "Lord Loveland Discovers America," while Carlyle Blackwell is busy with the first stages of "Jason," from the Justus Miles Foreman novel.

World Film's Birthday Party

On February 14 the World Film Corporation reached the first mile-stone of its career, touched it hurriedly, and started off on its second year with the same speed and aggressiveness that has marked it since its birth.

The World Film Corporation celebrated its birthday and the safe return of its vice-president and general manager, Lewis J. Selznick, from the Pacific Coast, with a beefsteak dinner at Healy's uptown cafe on Broadway. Cocktails made their appearance at about eight o'clock, and then the trays bearing the steak-laden toast began to make their rounds while a soloist, flanked by a quartet of the fair sex, entertained with songs.

After the last of the singers had responded to his third encore, the orchestra struck up "After the Ball," and loud demands were heard for a speech from the composer, Charles K. Harris. At the end of Mr. Harris' little talk Arthur S. Kane, assistant general manager of the World Film Corporation, assumed the duties of chairman and introduced President Van Horn Ely. Mr. Ely's speech was brief and to the point for, as he said, corporation presidents were only to be seen, not heard. His introduction of Lewis J. Selznick was more in the way of an announcement than a presentation, for the vice-president and general manager needed no introduction.

Mr. Selznick's speech was forceful and interesting, lit up here and there with flashes of humor as he related some of his experiences while organizing the present corporation. He gave the history of the company from its birth; told how, in seeking support, he had once solicited as small an amount as $46; explained the policy of the firm and the benefits of his profit-sharing plan; and laid particular emphasis upon the loyalty of his partners and employees.

Mr. Selznick ended by stating that his religion is the World Film Corporation, and that he is more than satisfied with its progress and the work of those who are contributing to it. He ended by saying that stories about him and his picture appeared in all of the newspapers in the West, and then introduced Jacob Wilk, manager of the press department, whom he accredited with the publicity.

Congressman Joseph L. Rhinock and W. A. Pratt, both members of the board of directors, next gave short, punchy talks, and were followed by William A. Brady.

Brief, snappy speeches were heard from Britton N. Bush, treasurer, Milton E. Hoffman, the man with unlimited ability but without a title, Jim Hoff of the Moving Picture World, W. A. Johnson of the Motion Picture News, C. F. Zittel of the New York Journal, Leon Bamberger, assistant sales manager, George F. Bell, cashier, Wen P. Milligan of the Billboard, Fred J. Beecroft of the Dramatic Mirror, Gustave Frohman, president of the Frohman Amusement Corporation, Maurice Tourneur, director at the Peerless studio, William L. Sherrill, vice-president and general manager of the Frohman Amusement Corporation, Wid Gunning of the Evening Mail, Alec Lorimore of Bishop, Pessers, and Lorimore, and Jeoffrey Konta of the law firm of Simpson, Thatcher and Bartlett.

A number of the speakers mentioned Jules Brulatour, now at the Pacific Coast, as being responsible for much of the excellence in the production end of the firm, and all congratulated Lewis J. Selznick on the wonderful progress of the World Film Corporation under his management, and wished him wealth, happiness, and unlimited success in the future.

Daredevil Tom Mix Again Performs

BY NEIL G. CAWARD

THOSE who revel in the hair breadth escapes and wonderful daring of Tom Mix, the Selig star, will find much to interest them in "A Child of the Prairie," the two-reel Selig release of Monday, March 1.

This melodrama is a typical Tom Mix picture in which the famous cowpuncher-player enacts a role which enables him not alone to appear as the hero of the story, but also to demonstrate not a little skill in riding and the sort of daredevil stunts for which he is famous. He is ably supported by Louella Maxam, a recent acquisition of the Selig forces and by E. J. Brady, who bids fair to become one of the best "heavies" of picturedom.

The big thrill of the picture comes in the second reel, when Mix is able to overtake a team of runaway horses, and rescue the helpless heroine, just before the buggy in which she is riding is overturned and smashed to bits. He saves her when she leaps from the rapidly moving buggy to the back of Mix's horse, as the latter drives alongside.

Tom Martin, a young rancher is the role enacted by Mr. Mix, and when Martin is absent from his home, a gambler, who has infatuated his wife, calls and persuades the woman to elope with him, taking with her her three year old baby.

The gambler shoots Tom.

Martin, in town, is shot in a quarrel over a game of cards, the gambler having arranged the revolver beneath the card table in such a way that when he pulls a string, the weapon will be discharged, and as a result Martin is badly injured and laid up in the hospital for some weeks.

The gambler urges Tom's wife to leave the baby.

The gambler and the unfortunate woman who consented to elope with him are attacked by wolves when in the mountains, and depart from their camp so hurriedly, that they have to leave behind the little girl, who has wandered some distance away. Some cowboys, hunting wolves, later come upon the child, and, later, adopt it.

Tom is released from prison.

Years later Martin, who has overcome his grief and been made sheriff of the county, receives a letter telling him to arrest the man whose picture is enclosed. He recognizes the portrait as that of the gambler, who years before had eloped with his wife, and starts out to find the man.

Riding over the brow of a hill, he sees below a runaway, and after noting that the runaway team is attached to a light buggy in which a helpless girl is riding, he hastens to her assistance. Riding alongside he commands the girl to jump into his arms, and a moment after she has accomplished this feat the buggy is smashed to atoms in rounding a corner on two wheels as the terrified horse plunges on.

After taking the girl back to her home, he is amazed to note her resemblance to his wife of long ago, though he tells her nothing of his sad story.

Chancing to meet the gambler face to face on the street of a settlement, a revolver duel follows in which the gambler is killed, and, ere dying, he tells Martin his wife had died of grief over the loss of her baby daughter, who had been abandoned to the mercy of the wolves. This story leads one of the settlers to remark that the girl whom Martin had rescued had been picked up when a baby in the mountains.

It is easy to put two and two together, and thus conclusively prove the girl whom Tom rescued was none other than his daughter, and eventually father and child are re-united.

The Selig Diamond Specials are released through the special feature department of the General Film Company.

Those Wright Letters

Readers of the Selig Weekly Press News, that breezy little house organ of the Selig Polyscope Company, which is mailed to exhibitors throughout the country, as well as to most of the editorial offices, find probably as much to interest them in the feature letter by William Lord Wright, who has long been known as a writer of quality photoplays, and more recently as a conductor of the photoplaywrights' department in the columns of the Dramatic Mirror, as in the synopses of the various Selig productions and the newsy items pertaining to the activities of the various Selig companies.

Mr. Wright's weekly feature letter gives interesting information about projected photoplays of the Selig brand, and is withal so newsy and timely that editors are frequently wont to quote it in their own columns. In addition to his other numerous duties, Mr. Wright has been selected as one of the numerous judges for the comedy prize contest being conducted by the Right Off the Reel page of the Chicago Tribune, and in this work is to be assisted by George Fitch, the famous Peoria humorist, and Bert L. Taylor, the conductor of the Line 'o Type column in the Chicago Tribune. The prize winning stories will be produced as comedies under the Selig brand, and prizes to the amount of $500.00 will be divided among the four authors whose stories are adjudged best.

New Chicago Manager

M. F. Beier has succeeded S. C. Bestar as Chicago manager of the Picture Playhouse Film Company's exchange. While Mr. Beier is new to Chicago he is understood to have had a varied experience covering a period of nearly ten years and been connected with some of the largest eastern concerns, besides having headed an enterprise of his own in New York City. He assures for Chicago exhibitors patronizing the Picture Playhouse exchange treatment of the most courteous kind, and offers to co-operate with them in every possible way for the betterment of the business.

In following out its recently announced intention of opening new branches, it is announced that the Picture Playhouse Film Company has opened a Boston exchange at 23 Piedmont street and installed John Curran as manager. The new office opens with a full set of eighteen feature releases and the first bookings in the new territory promise well for the success of the office. It is rumored that branches will also be opened in St. Louis, Minneapolis, Indianapolis and Kansas City, as soon as the right people can be found to manage them.

Chicago Kriterion Exchange to Open

Arrangements were made the past week for the opening of an exchange in Chicago, which will exclusively handle the Kriterion service. Messrs. Belford and Leverton, formerly operating the Lea-Bel Company, a feature exchange, are interested in the new venture, and will utilize the entire third floor of the Schiller building on Randolph street, as their exchange. An exhibition room is being installed, and modern equipment arranged for, so that by March 1 when the exchange opens, advance exhibitions of Kriterion releases may be given each week in the Chicago exhibition room.

On the same date the Kansas City Kriterion Service will also be opened. This exchange is also being backed by Messrs. Belford and Leverton. Quarters have not yet been selected, but suitable offices, it is expected, will be secured this week.

President Wilson As An Actor

To Director Eugene Nowland of the Edison Company will go the "scoop" long prized by all motion picture directors—that of getting President Wilson in a film as an actor in a real motion picture story, according to news from Washington, where the newspapers are giving column length, first page space to the feat, notably the Washington Herald. The President has promised to be a real actor and although his appearance before the camera is always of interest, the weaving him into the story gives the occasion and the film especial interest. In the film, he will appear as a sort of Cupid's assistant as he lends his encouragement to the love affairs of two young people.

The story will be a heart interest one written around the civil service. The hero, Pat O'Malley, comes to Washington to enter the government employ through the civil service. In his wanderings, he meets with the young lady of his choice, Gladys Hulette, already in the government employ. The scene of their courtship carries them onto the White House grounds where President Wilson enters on the stage and has a conversation with the pair, shaking hands with them.

The officials of the civil service were so delighted with the accurateness of the scenes describing the workings of that system that they joined in with enthusiasm and used "influence" that allowed Director Nowland to snap the President who was too shy to succumb to the regular request. These same officials got to work on Secretary Tumulty and in that way arranged for the President's appearance.

Book on Noted Photoplay

Motography is in receipt of "Damon and Pythias" in story form, issued by Messrs. Grosset & Dunlap from the scenario of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

The book is beautifully decorated and handsomely bound, containing sixteen single- and one double-page illustrations from scenes of the photoplay. This book is selling at the Grosset & Dunlap recognized popular price of 50 cents, and a far-reaching campaign has been inaugurated through the Knights of Pythias lodges throughout the country, as well as the book stores and the Universal exchanges.

This is the first time this widely known story has ever been issued in book form, and it is the first novelized story of the screen to which the Universal has lent its co-operation.

Des Moines Office Moves

The Peerless Film Exchange, whose Des Moines office was formerly located in the Observatory Building, has found it necessary, because of an increased number of customers, to take larger quarters and has moved the exchange to the Family Theater building.

H. E. Brient, president and general manager of this company, is at present in Des Moines and states that it is his intention later on to go to Denver and open another office there.

We wish to congratulate this young, enterprising firm on its rapid development and to wish it every success for the future.

Runaway June Secures New Situation

BY CHARLES R. CONDON

THE sixth installment of "Runaway June," entitled "The Siege of the House of O'Keefe," does not mark another epoch in Blye's pursuit of the runaway bride as do the preceding chapters; instead, it leaves one suspended in mid-air, heightening and suspending the spectator's interest at the same time. In each of the foregoing installments Blye's and Ned's chase was brought to a climax which resulted in their defeat and spurred them to greater efforts to try to locate June, one actuated by selfish motives and the other by love. In this release Ned is more mystified as to his wife's whereabouts than ever before, while Blye is most successful in leading June into his net, and the end of the installment leaves him master of the situation and just about to spring his trap.

The picture contains several beautiful interior settings, and a number of exterior scenes taken in the lower part of New York City. The wardrobe of Norma Phillips and Marguerite Loveridge, not in this installment alone, but in all of the others as well, is worthy of special mention and is sure to attract much attention, at least among the female patrons of the houses booking this Reliance serial. One is more than willing to overlook the fact that June, running away, would not be likely to have such a large variety of suits, furs, and gowns in order to see her and "Tommy" Thomas dressed in stylish and becoming clothes which are distinctly lacking of "property" appearance. Clothing does not make a picture, but it goes a long way in establishing it as a de luxe production.

The preceding installment ends with June's escape from the gambling house, Blye and Ned following her. She succeeds in losing them, and reaches home safely. Owing to the fact that she is the widow of the most popular man on the force, Mrs. O'Keefe is a great favorite with all of the policemen, and when she tells them that her roomers, meaning June and her maid, Marie, do not want to be found they promise to do their best to see that the girls are not disturbed by visitors. Shortly afterwards Blye, hurrying along, inquires about June and is misdirected. Ned, following later, receives the same treatment.

At length Blye realizes that he has been duped, and decides that Tommy Thomas is the very one to help him in his search. She consents, and the next morning appears in the neighborhood of the O'Keefe house in a taxicab. June, on her way to an employment agency, is accosted by her, and invited to ride to the agency. On the way Tommy stops at a drug store, calls up the agency, and instructs the woman to send June to Mrs. Villard, a friend of Blye's.

June and Mrs. Villard, by whom she has been engaged to act as companion, become greatly attached to each other, and the runaway bride begins to think that at last she has found pleasant employment unmarred by Blye's presence. One day while accompanying Mrs. Villard on her tour of rent-collecting she becomes acquainted with the domestic troubles of the Groggs. Al Groggs is a heavy drinker, and on pay days spends his money in drinking and treating, invariably bringing home a plant bought with his last dollar. June's sympathy goes out to Lou Grogg, the wife, and she tells the poor woman how to cure her husband of his ways. The next time Grogg attempts to vent his ill humor on his wife he is met with a storm of wrath, punctuated with missiles, that inspires him with respect and fear for Lou. Thereafter he is a model husband.

Meanwhile, Ned's detectives locate June's home, and station themselves in front of it. They do not stay long, however, for at Mrs. O'Keefe's request two policemen eject them from the premises.

Mrs. Villard holds a reception one evening, and June is surprised to see Tommy Thomas among the guests. Later, during supper, she discovers Blye peeking through the portieres. This places her on her guard, but, as the man does not appear again later, she forgets her fears in her enjoyment of the evening. The next day June leaves for Mrs. O'Keefe's to get her wardrobe.

Players Assist Real Policemen

Richard Stanton, Shorty Hamilton and some others of Director Ince New York Motion Picture Corporation companies recently found out what it was to attempt the ejection of "boes" from railroad trains. They were in San Bernardino, Calif., enacting some big scenes for "The Man at the Key," a Domino release, when a veritable drove of hoboes rode into the city on freight trains. The Inceville actor-director and his company were just finishing a scene depicting a wreck at night. Members of the company were preparing to go back to the hotel to remain until the next day and Stanton was paying off his "extras." Suddenly Dick Bright, superintendent of the San Bernadino Santa Fe station and a friend of the actor approached and offered the information that the "boes" were coming into the town. He asked Stanton to join the volunteer brigade of police to meet the unwelcome visitors.

Gathering the men of the company together, Stanton joined Bright and they stationed themselves at the entrance to the yard. Each was armed with a gun. When the freight pulled in the officers boarded it and placed the bedraggled ones under arrest. In all there were 103 hoboes and the San Bernardino jail was scarcely large enough to accommodate them.

Mutual Camera Gets Stars in Mob

Mary Pickford and James Kirkwood, her director, recently became impromptu players in the mob scene of the four-reel Majestic-Mutual feature, "The Lost House," an adaptation from the novelette by Richard Harding Davis. W. C. Cabanne was putting on a fire scene and had stretched a fire line around the burning structure. Police officers and firemen were gathered in front of the line. Miss Pickford and Kirkwood were driving along in a machine and, seeing the crowd, alighted to watch the proceedings. They were in line with Cabanne's camera, and when the picture is released in the Mutual program Miss Pickford and Kirkwood will be seen in the mob.

Sennett's Plans for Keystone

Mack Sennett, Keystone's chief director, has made known his list of comedy creators for the coming season. It leads off, of course, with Mable Normand. Charley Murray has signed again with the Keystone aggregation and Harry Gribbon, formerly with Morosco, is an addition from the legitimate stage. Ford Sterling, too, has been received into the fold again. Sid Chaplin, of the famous English family, Chester Conklin, and Mack Swain complete the list.

These players will be seen in single and two-reel comedy releases in the Mutual program, with Mack Sennett in command of productions. Sennett's ability to cut out and put together a film after the pictures are taken, as well as his skill in directing, have done much to make Keystone popular.

Correction of Edison Announcement

Due to a misunderstanding, it was recently announced that the Edison program would, beginning March 1, release both a three-reel and a two-reel drama every week. This is a slight error. It was meant to announce that every week there would be a three-reel feature in the regular program which would be released on alternate Mondays and Fridays and a two-reel drama released on alternate Fridays. During March this would therefore make their release schedule: Monday, March 1, a three-reel; Friday, March 5, a two-reel; Monday, March 8, one reel; Friday, March 12, a three-reel; Monday, March 15, a three-reel; Friday March 19, a two-reel; Monday, March 22, one reel; Friday, March 26, a three-reel; and Monday, March 29, a three-reel drama. "In Spite of All," a photoplay version of Mrs. Fiske's great stage success, will be the first of the three-reel Edison features in the regular service and will be released March 1. The second three-reeler will be "On the Stroke of Twelve," a melodramatic society play of refined power. In both plays, Gertrude McCoy is entrusted with the leading roles which afford uncommon opportunity for intense emotional expression.

Edison Leading Lady Worried

Viola Dana, the little Edison leading lady, is suffering many anxious moments as she scans the latest war news from two different war zones, for her two sisters, Leonie and Edna, are situated in dangerous territory, the former in Mexico and the other, Edna, in London, playing with the London Film Company. The daily reports of raids near London, and impending bomb-dropping visits to London of the German Zeppelins, is the cause for well-founded anxiety on the part of the little Edison lady. Leonie is playing in "The Poor Little Rich Girl" in the border cities of Texas. The last letter from Leonie told of her having been in El Paso when a raid in Juarez across the border sent some stray bullets flying around the Texas city streets.

New York Film Through Mutual

In response to the many inquiries received, as to how "On the Night Stage," the four-part feature film recently completed and starring William S. Hart, Rhea Mitchell and Robert Edeson, would be released, the New York Motion Picture Corporation has announced that it will be a part of the Mutual Program, to be given the exhibitors in their regular service, together with multiples from all the other Mutual companies. Two of these features will be released each week, beginning in the near future.

Duncan McRae, who is often cast for the heavy roles in Edison films, is a brother of Bruce McRae now playing with the Ethel Barrymore stage success, "In the Shadow."

Regulations for Shipping Films

OUT of the office of Chief Inspector B. W. Dunn of the Bureau of Explosives, New York City, comes the following letter addressed to motion picture exchanges and their employes:

Your attention is directed to the enclosed bulletin issued by the Bureau of Explosives of the American Railway Association, and you must at once realize the great importance to your interests that may follow any action taken by the railroads throughout the country in regulating the movement of moving picture films.

There is now a demand from many railways that moving picture films shall be carried from and to exchanges only by means of express service, and the situation as recently developed shows that there are many good reasons why this should be done wherever practicable.

Some of the practices of runners or messengers for moving picture exhibitors are not only faulty but constitute a serious menace to the safety of passengers on railway trains.

Briefly, the following are some "don'ts" that should be observed.

(1) Don't ship by express a package of inflammable films unless it is in a case that complies in all respects with the I. C. C. Regulations.

(2) Don't carry on a train any package of inflammable films unless the package complies with the I. C. C. Regulations for a shipping case.

(3) Don't carry inflammable films in hand or other baggage on any railway whose rules prohibit it.

(4) Don't take inflammable films into a smoking car, sleeping car or a compartment in any other car in which smoking is permitted even if not prohibited by railway rules. One messenger must not attempt to carry more than two packages and they must not contain more than a total of nine reels.

(5) Don't examine or exchange films on railway property.

(6) Don't place packages of inflammable films near steam pipes, electric heaters or any other source of heat.

It is absolutely necessary that exhibitors should cooperate in this matter or drastic measures will be taken which may seriously interfere with their business.

The bulletin mentioned in the first line of the letter is dated December 21, 1914, and captioned "Moving Picture Films in Smoking Car." It purports to be a history of the accident to a passenger car on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, November 24, 1914, when a suburban smoking coach was burned and a number of persons injured. This case we reviewed at the time.

The bulletin of the Bureau of Explosives deliberately places the entire blame for the fire upon a package of films carried by a man in the smoking car. It says "a puff of smoke arose from the package, which was instantly followed by a burst of flames. . . The films were evidently ignited by a lighted match, cigar or cigarette."

Our report of the accident shows that according to testimony accepted in the coroner's hearing, the package of films in question not only did not cause the fire, but that the flames actually started in the roof or ceiling of the car. The man with the films stated under oath that after the fire started he picked up his package and started for the door, but was knocked down in the rush and lost it. The Bureau of Explosives bulletin, then, appears as a deliberate attempt to frighten exchange men into compliance with its rules by distorting facts to make them compel a lively sense of danger. Possibly it is thought that the end justifies the means.

We realize that so long as the present exaggerated view of the dangerous qualities of celluloid is prevalent, it is really the duty of all motion picture men to comply rigidly with all reasonable regulations. The letter of the Bureau, reproduced in full above, is reasonable. No exchange should object to its suggestions. But the bulletin accompanying it we consider objectionable and unnecessary. It tends to increase rather than allay the disposition to blame the films for every fire occurring where they are present.

Almost any fire has mysterious features because it destroys its own evidence. The electrical interests had a hard fight for years to overcome the general tendency to ascribe all fires to "crossed electric wires," and even yet, where there are no films to take the blame, that is apt to be the cause ascribed. The motion picture is simply passing through the same period of suspicion. It should be the effort of intelligent persons, and especially those in a position which gives weight to their utterances, to treat the subject with the cool and moderate consideration to which it is morally entitled.

Motion pictures are well able to shoulder the responsibility for all fires honestly traced to their agency. The fact that nearly twenty thousand theaters operate constantly with practically no loss by fire is ample proof to the judicial mind that the films are libelled when they are blamed for those occasional conflagrations which occurred before motion pictures were invented and perhaps always will occur. Civilized life is full of combustible material, of which motion picture films constitute only a small and inconsiderable part. So it is manifestly unfair to make them shoulder any unproved responsibility.

Give Chicago a Non-Censorship Mayor

CHICAGO is soon to elect a new mayor and several aldermen. While it is not our province to interest ourselves editorially in local political matters, motion picture conditions in Chicago are such as to make it advisable for local exhibitors to do all they can to change them. The censorship incubus which has grown up under the present administration is a curse to the entire industry and a reproach to civilized communities. At least one of the candidates for mayoral nomination has signified his desire to reform the Chicago censor board and its methods. Common business sense dictates that a candidate who interests himself in this subject and shows a disposition to be equitable and reasonable deserves the support of all exhibitors.

The support of exhibitors, as we have pointed out before, means not only their individual votes but all the influence they can bring to bear on their patrons. In this the screen gives them an unsurpassed opportunity. No other class of business men can gain the public eye as can the motion picture theater men. If they will not use this power to their own advantage they deserve to be oppressed.

Ohio Censors Have Some Friends

THE support of the censorship law by the Ohio exhibitors, as evidenced by a two-thirds vote during the recent convention at Columbus, is rather puzzling to those who have studied the situation. While it does not directly concern anyone except the Ohio exhibitors and the manufacturers its possible indirect effect on the industry can easily be foreseen.

About the only reason which has been advanced for the support accorded the law is that the men who show the films are satisfied; but why they are satisfied remains a mystery. To those who have advocated the abolition of all forms of legalized censorship the action taken by these men will undoubtedly prove unpopular.

Evidently a certain gentleman formerly prominent in exhibitors' organization work, who is known to have been circulating in Ohio recently, put something over.

Those Reformers

WHAT would become of reform if it were not for the have-nots?

The landless people take it out in making laws about land.

The unmarried and unmarrying people are the great rooters for eugenic marriage.

The childless people take it out in making laws about children.

Those folks deaf to all harmony are the ones who kick against music in the dining-rooms.

Men with feet like a ton of coal the the ones who yell for measures against the tango.

The people who never drink make the rules about rum.

The ones who howl the loudest against capital are those who are least competent to earn more than a bare living.

The noncombatants are the most violent critics of the army and the navy.

And the chief complainers against the motion picture, those who are first to accuse it of immorality, criminality and general debauch, are the ones who have never attended more than one or two shows in their lives.

Just A Moment Please

Now approacheth the time when all good men may go to the polls and nominate a mayor who is opposed to censorship. A lot of our exhibitor friends who have not forgotten it was under Carter Harrison's administration that the renowned Major Funkhouser made his debut, will undoubtedly recall that fact when they mark their ballots.

Speaking of elections and such things, we lamp by the reports from Columbus that a lot of the "dope" on what was going to happen at the Ohio convention of picture men went wrong. However, the boys had a great time, so what's the odds.

ANOTHER LETTER.

In times long past we have presented to our readers some of the strange, odd epistles which find their way into our office. Perhaps, however, the letter reproduced below is a still odder specimen. It comes from war-wracked Europe, dated in Charkow, Russia, and reads as follows:

Dear Sirs:

Will you please be so kindly and send us a list of all moving pictures, which you have for sale. Moving pictures may be first class or second hand but with whole perforations, without rain, with beginning, end and middle part.

We are very interested in long dramas at least of three parts or more. Also we are very interested in pictures of jewish life and war. Moving picture war journal very interests us. Also we are interested in historic and byble pictures.

Will you kindly send us all scenarios to the pictures you offer for sale. Will you kindly write us how it is possible for us to get your pictures, whether by mail or otherweise.

If you have not the pictures we want, will you please be so kindly and let us know, where we can get those pictures in your country.

Will you kindly give our adress to all moving picture rent offices and factories, so that they should send us their cataloques.

Very tryly yours—

Strong Acting in Essanay Picture

BY CLARENCE J. CAINE

IT has been some time since this reviewer has been privileged to witness a more powerful portrayal of a character on the screen than is given by Bryant Washburn in the two-reel Essanay production, entitled "The Strength of the Weak," scheduled for release on Friday, March 5.

Mr. Washburn, through skillful use of the silent art, presents the struggle of a young man against the "dope" habit in a manner which is not only strongly convincing, but also entirely inoffensive. His facial expression is wonderful and during the several close-up scenes in which he appears alone, struggling to master the craving for the drug, he clearly demonstrates his histrionic power. Scenes of this variety are often fatal to a film, for unless the actor is capable they will prove dull and uninteresting. In this production, however, these scenes are by far the most gripping in the picture and Mr. Washburn's acting will hold almost any audience spellbound.

Among the prudish there has always existed a feeling of animosity against "drug" or "dope" pictures, as they are known, but when a scenario is prepared in such a manner that the finished production reflects true conditions, rather than bids for sensationalism, it seems that there should be no objection to such pictures. Of this film it can be truthfully said that its purpose is worthy, for on numerous occasions it would have been easy to inject a "thrill," but in every such case convincing acting and subtle touches of human interest are used instead.

The players in the supporting cast, including

David conquers himself and wins Lalia.

Gerda Holmes, Helen Dunbar and Lester Cuneo, are pleasing in their roles, though they are given very little opportunity to distinguish themselves. There are a few flaws in the direction of the picture, these being about the only defects which will be noticed by the casual observer. The settings in the homes of society people during the first part of the film, and in the great wilderness of the north during the last part are par excellence, the exterior scenes showing the snow-covered forest being worthy of special mention. The photography is clear throughout, but lax handling of several "fade" scenes detracts credit from the work of the cameraman.

Black determines to cause David's downfall.

The plot of the story deals with, as has been suggested, the struggles of a young man to overcome the "dope" habit. His name is David Fleming. In the early part of the story it is clearly shown that he has everything in the world to live right for—a mother and a sweetheart. He is unsuccessful in his fight against the drug, however, and is about to inject it into his arm when his mother discovers him and tells him of the horrible death his father had because of the same habit. For her sake he manages to control himself.

His sweetheart, Lalia Fenton, is also being courted by Stanford Black, whom she cares nothing for. David visits her just as Black is leaving and confesses his weakness to her. When he announces his determination to conquer the habit for her sake and for his mother's, she agrees to do all in her power to help him. Black pauses before leaving the house, learns of his rival's weakness and determines to use it to win the girl.

With the sudden death of his mother, David again resorts to "dope," but when he sees the deep love of Lalia he determines to win his fight against the habit and goes into the wilderness. Here, far away from temptation, he masters himself. Black learns of his whereabouts from Lalia and sends him a package of the drug. The girl has a dream in which she feels that her lover is in danger of again succumbing to the terrible habit. She tells her mother and both leave for the wilderness at once. David gets the package sent by Black and a supreme struggle takes place within him. Finally he conquers his desire and crushes the drug under his heel. He rushes into the forests, laughing triumphantly, and meets Lalia and her mother just as they arrive. When they learn of his triumph the girl goes to his arms, for he has proven himself the master of his weakness.

Oklahoma Retrograding Into Darkness

By Paul H. Woodruff.

OKLAHOMA'S house of representatives has passed one of those blanket censorship bills making it unlawful to exhibit motion pictures showing any act which act is in itself unlawful. The bill is broad enough to make it practically impossible to show any pictures except of scenic and scientific subjects. Even historical reproductions would obviously be barred by the letter of such a law. Pictures of the state's own pioneer days (not so very long passed) would be impossible. Section 2 of the bill prohibits the making of any pictures representing outlawry, outlaws or depredations committed within the state.

This bill is purely political, fostered by politicians, and designed for a single purpose—the suppression of the film "Beating Back," by the ex-outlaw, Al Jennings, who campaigned for the governorship of the state. It is only another example of the ruthlessness of the typical politician in power, who would injure a big industry and deprive the people of their greatest entertainment to vent a private spite or jealousy.

Al Jennings and his history are Oklahoma's own affair, and when he ran for the highest state office, Oklahoma was privileged to welcome him or spurn him, as she saw fit. The picture he produced, and the new one he is now working on, are also subject, of course, to all the usual statutes and ordinances made and provided to protect the people. But this particular bill is so obviously aimed at Al Jennings and no one else that we must conclude that either the legislators are trying to get revenge on Al or they have a very wholesome fear of the power of the pictures.

The only ray of light in a benighted condition of this kind is that the broad nature of such a bill makes it lack definiteness, and its enforcement is generally more or less slack. Then, too, it may accomplish its purpose of keeping the Jennings films quiet, and then fall into innocuous desuetude; or its enforcement may devolve upon some of Jennings' friends and so fall flat. At any rate, if it actually becomes a law, we need not anticipate that it will be enforced against all the excellent dramas and comedies which may infringe its letter and still be perfectly proper. Being aimed at certain films, perhaps its operation will be confined to them—which would be bad enough, certainly, but not so bad as it might be.

Educationals Now Available

Described by Randolph Van Buren.

IRON AND STEEL INDUSTRY, BOMBAY. — Pathe. Bombay, usually slow to adopt modern methods, now possesses an iron and steel foundry, equipped with the newest and most up-to-date machinery. In it are manufactured the various grades of steel used in Asiatic industries.

PICTURESQUE FRANCE.—Pathe. The scene is laid in Normandy, that delightfully quaint corner of Europe, famous in poetry, song and prose the wide world over for its many beauties, architecture, costumes, natural scenery and old world atmospphere. Best of all it is the fairyland Normandy that every one has heard of and that everyone wants to see. It is the springtime in Normandy, the "Apple Blossom time in Normandy." Every hedgerow, farmyard, dooryard and even the broad hills and narrow little valleys are filled to overflowing with apple blossoms. For good reasons did the poet link the apple blossom with this charming country for nowhere in the world are there so many apple blossoms, or are they seen to such advantage as in Normandy.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN MINES.—Edison. Johannesburg, the metropolis of South Africa, a progressive city of about the same size as Denver, is the center of the gold mining industry. In its vicinity are the celebrated Rand mines which annually produce more gold than any other group of mines in the world.

Views are shown of the more important mines in this group—the Joch, the Robinson Deep, and the Meyer and Charlton. In the latter mine the gold-bearing rock is mined at a depth of 3,000 feet, brought to the surface and crushed by rotating tubes, or in the stamp mill. The crushed ore is dumped into the cyanide tanks. The cyanide solution dissolves the gold from the rock, and the gold is recovered from the cyanide solution by a simple reduction with heat.

The principal diamond mines are situated near Kimberley and Pretoria. Of all of them, the Kimberley mine is the most famous. The diamonds are found in a sort of volcanic mud, known as "Blue Earth." This is removed from the mine and dumped on fields known as "The Floors," which are surrounded by an intricate system of barbed wire fences. The "Blue Earth" is allowed to weather here for a year. After it has been thoroughly broken up by the action of the elements, it is removed to the washing plant, where its soluble portions are removed by water. The remaining insoluble "diamond mud" is sent to the pulsator, an interesting series of revolving greased tables. These greased tables catch the diamonds, while all other matter is removed by gentle streams of water.

After a number of interesting views of life in the miners' compound, a portion of a day's output of diamonds, valued at $55,000, is shown.

The Press Agent Says—

That Richard Stanton's camera man Joe August, performed some hazardous stunts recently during the production of "The Man at the Key," an exciting railroad story by Thomas H. Ince, soon to be released by the New York Motion Picture Corporation. Joe hustled from the time Stanton commenced the direction of the story until the last scenes had been filmed. Perhaps his most noteworthy stunt was that of climbing to the top of a fastly moving engine cab and photographing a big "close-up" of the whistle emitting clouds of steam. He did this en route to San Bernardino, Cal., where the company went to take the wreck scenes, and, aside from ruining a suit of clothes and banging up his shins considerably, the intrepid camera man suffered no harm.

That William Wadsworth, "Waddy" of the Edison comedies, is a patient and forbearing man. He has been godfather by mail to innumerable babies—run a sort of mail order business in a way—has loaned his name to a host of newborn fans, until he fears he will have to change it, it being much the worse for wear, but he feels he must, without any undue sourness, decline the honor tendered by a certain manufacturer of pickles in Charleston, S. C., who writes for permission to name a new pickle after him.

Recent Patents in Motography

BY DAVID S. HULFISH

PATENT No. 1,067,750. Shutter. Allen C. Niles, Bellevue, Ky., assignor of parts to W. O. Forster and C. C. Forster, Dayton, Ky.

The improved shutter cuts off the light abruptly, but allows the light to come on gradually. Mr. Niles claims that this method of controlling the light operates to reduce the flicker, and to permit an equivalent picture upon the screen to be given with a smaller consumption of electric current. There are three claims, one of which is as follows:

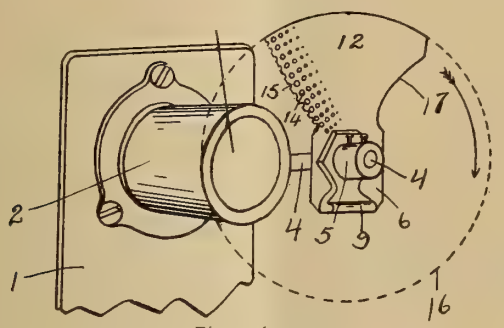

Fig. 1,067,750

3. In a moving picture machine, a revolving shutter—said shutter made plain and imperforated in one side and at its other side provided with perforations.

No. 1,067,785. Non-Inflammable Cellulose Compound and Method of Making Same. W. G. Lindsay, New York, N. Y., assignor to The Celluloid Co., a corporation of New Jersey. Application filed May 9, 1909.

The inventor says:

Heretofore, it has been proposed to substitute acetyl cellulose for nitro-cellulose in the manufacture of compounds of which celluloid is a prominent example.

I have discovered that triphenylphosphate can be combined with acetyl cellulose to produce a non-inflammable compound having great strength and tenacity, and other valuable properties, and the present invention is designed to point out to the operator a practical method of using or combining these two substances in making films and other forms of such compounds.

In carrying out my invention I select an acetyl cellulose which is soluble in acetone, a solution is made of such acetyl cellulose in acetone and to this solution is added triphenylphosphate, either in solid form or previously dissolved in acetone or other similar solvent. The amount of triphenylphosphate may be varied in proportions from ten to twenty parts by weight to each one hundred parts of the acetyl cellulose, and the acetone or other suitable solvent is added in sufficient quantity to make either a flowable solution or a plastic mass, as is well understood by those skilled in the art. The addition of triphenylphosphate increases both the strength and tenacity and also insures non-inflammability. It does not impart any color or odor to the product.

By the addition of about 1½% of urea, still greater permanency and tenacity will be imparted to my compound.

No. 1,067,997. Panic Bolt. J. M. Marty, Cleveland, O. When the handle of the door is touched the door bolts are drawn back and a locking number is pressed by a spring to lock the bolts back, leaving the door unlocked and free to open.

No. 1,068,208. Shutter. George W. Bingham, New York, N. Y., assignor to The Bingham Manufacturing Company, a corporation of Maine.

The preamble sets forth that "in taking pictures of objects moving at a high rate of speed, the images in the individual pictures are frequently more or less blurred." The "blurred" effect is desirable where the object photographed is slow in motion, but in rapid motion the problem becomes different. It is to produce sharper film images that the present invention is developed.

The improved shutter operates by moving an exposure slit across the image and nearly in the focal plane of the camera. An oscillating shutter blade is used. The exposure is made in one direction of movement and an auxiliary blade closes the exposure slit while the shutter blade returns. Means is provided for varying the size of the exposure slit in the main shutter blade.

7. A shutter for moving picture machines comprising a pair of oscillating shutter blades having their edges spaced apart to provide a light aperture between them, said shutter blades being mounted to move in unison in the same direction, and means for adjusting the shutter blades with respect to each other to vary the size of the light aperture.

No. 1,068,747. Kinematographic Film. Charles Dupuis, Charenton, France.

The film is composed of strong paper and of gelatin, instead of celluloid.

A strong paper strip is provided with feeding perforations and with windows for the film images. The film images then are made upon a specially prepared strip of celluloid and are placed in the windows by having the paper pressed upon the gelatin of the celluloid strip and then having the celluloid taken away, leaving the gelatin and its images in the windows of the paper.

A strong auxiliary coating of gelatin has been applied upon the paper and images before removing the celluloid and the resulting film is pronounced strong, durable and flameproof.

No. 1,068,912. Shutter. W. P. McIlvaine and W. S. Quinby, Bellingham, Wash.

The invention is a means for adjusting a shutter quickly, the means being such that the improved shutter and adjustment may be applied simply.

The shutter is carried by a collar sleeved loosely upon a hub, the hub being fixed tightly to the shutter shaft, and a worm wheel and worm screw locks the shutter to the hub. The angle of the shutter blade upon the shaft is changed by turning the knurled head of the worm screw. The invention is applied to a projector by slipping off the old non-adjustable hub and shutter and slipping the improved one on in its place.

7. In combination with the shutter supporting shaft of a kinematograph apparatus, of a shutter having an opening for receiving the shaft, said shutter being rotatable on the shaft, and means for rotating the shutter and for holding it in adjusted position.

No. 1,069,221. Method of Obtaining Synchronism Between a Kinematographic Performance and the Musical Accompaniment. Jacob Beck, Munich, Germany.

The claim in this patent reads as follows:

A method of synchronizing a visual performance and an acoustic accompaniment therefor, which consists, in photographing on a film the performance of the actors, and in simultaneously photographing on said film a reflected front view of a person facing the actors and directing the acoustic accompaniment of the performance, substantially as described.
